Mr. CORNELL had seen great irregularity in the journals of the previous days' proceedings—he had noticed it again and again. Some proceedings, that he thought should have gone on the journal, had no record. Another evil he had noticed was this: that members, in place of slightly amending the section, which was all they wanted, would offer a substitute containing all the old section except such slight amendment, which led to a waste of time. He [Mr. C.] did not know that it was for the sole purpose of members getting their names on the journal, but it was the fact that this was the method pursued when nothing but a small amendment was wanted.

Mr. BRITAIN—Congress adopts Jefferson's Manual the same as here, and yet the construction is different.

Mr. CRARY—I should like to see the journal of Congress presented, that would bear out the facts that have been assumed. It matters but little what rules we adopt if we behave ourselves. If we do not, it is not much matter if we adopt a good rule. The rule is a good one, as laid down in the Manual. We may adopt a different rule, and it may be a good rule generally.

Jefferson's Manual made me appear in a different light from what my views were, for I accepted an amendment which did not meet my own views, for the sake of expediting business. It was put on the journal as it should be by the rule, for all amendments accepted by the original proposer become the property of the original mover. The rule of Jefferson's Manual is a good rule; but I do not say that it is a good rule for this Convention. Suppose a member wishes to bring this Convention into disrepute before the public—he makes amendments that are a disgrace to the whole body—how will you manage it? Rule them off the journal? The very ruling and voting upon them will retain them upon the journal; because you cannot vote it off; it is there, and must so remain. It may be the better course to adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Berrien; but if it is so adopted, ridiculous motions may be made and then withdrawn.

Mr. HANSCOM—Would not the fact that they must appear upon the journals prevent ridiculous amendments being made?

Mr. CRARY—Not if a member wished to bring the body into disrepute. The journals do not show all, nor will they under the new rule. They will not tell what A, B. or C. said; they were never intended to do so. If we change it, members heretofore making amendments, will have great injustice done to them. But if we adopt the proposed system, we should adopt a new rule, and not stultify ourselves; for this is the rule under Jefferson's Manual. If we want a new rule let us make one.

Mr. BRITAIN—Mr. President, gentlemen, in their anxiety to defeat my proposition, create evils which have no existence except in their imaginations. One gentleman from Calhoun says if my amendment of the rule be made, I might send a newspaper to the chair and have it entered upon the journals. Another gentleman from Calhoun says the rule may be a good rule, but the Convention might be disgraced by the ridiculous proposition of some ill disposed member. Another gentleman proposes to send up the revised statutes, if my motion prevail, and have them entered upon the journal. Now, Mr. President, suppose the newspaper and the ridiculous proposition of the gentleman from Calhoun, and the revised statutes of my friend over the way, were all sent to the chair under the present rule, and the persons sending them refuse to withdraw them, how could you avoid entering them upon the journal? I hope gentlemen will not be alarmed at the actual existence of the evil which they had supposed could only originate from the adoption of my rule, for there is a very easy way to avoid entering improper propositions upon the journal. A motion that the gentleman's proposition be not entered upon the journal, if sustained by the Convention, would, under either rule, relieve the Convention from the necessity of an improper entry upon its journal, and as effectually under one rule as the other. Now, sir, I am confident that no evil can be produced under the new rule which cannot be produced under the present rule; and as the new rule would relieve the Convention from many evils actually existing under the present rule, the new rule should be adopted.

Mr. CRARY—Such is the parliamentary rule. If we want a new rule, let us have it; not call that law that is not law.

Mr. WOODMAN thought the matter had been discussed enough. He therefore moved the previous question.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE rose to a point of order. Could we change the rule without a two-thirds vote?

The CHAIR—A two-thirds vote is required to change the rule.

Mr. EATON did not think that the present question conflicted with the rule.

The CHAIR decided that the change in the journals contemplated might be decided by a majority vote.

Mr. WOODMAN withdrew his motion for the previous question, to give way to

Mr. CORNELL—I noticed that the peculiarities of the present rule worked evil. The same propositions appear with some little alterations, and at times I have not been able to understand the question; and I have noticed that others have been similarly embarrassed.

Mr. COOK—The practice works unequally. If a member introduces a proposition, it is debated; and if, during the time of the debate, the Convention adjourn, it is put upon the journal, although the next day it may be withdrawn, and no action upon it be taken.

Mr. CRARY—It is not put upon the journal.

The CHAIR would explain, that if during the progress of the debate, if the Convention adjourn, it stands as unfinished business, and if withdrawn the next day, it still must necessarily remain upon the journal.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—We have adopted Jefferson's Manual. We cannot change without a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BRITAIN—As we may want a new rule upon some future day, I shall call for the yeas and nays, in order to test the sense of the Convention upon this subject.

And the journal was ordered corrected, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chandler, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Marvin, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, Town, Van Valkenburg, Wait, Walker, Warden, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Willard, Woodman—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Arzeno, Axford, Beardsley, Butterfield, Choate, Church, Crary, Daniels, Dimond, Mason, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Roberts, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Sturgis, Sutherland, Tiffany, Williams, President—21.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the journal was ordered corrected by the insertion of all amendments and substitutes yesterday proposed and withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the journal was corrected as follows:

“Strike out from amendment of Mr. McLEOD to Mr. McCLELLAND's substitute for section three, 'not members of any tribe,' and insert as follows:

"Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto 'not members of any tribe,' which was accepted by the mover."

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the journal was further corrected by inserting after the amendment proposed by Mr. WHITE to the substitute for section three, offered by Mr. McCLELLAND, the following, viz:

"Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the amendment by inserting after 'officers,' 'and such territory as may be attached thereto for representative purposes,' which was accepted by the mover."

Mr. SUTHERLAND—Yesterday, on Mr. LOVELL's proposition, I made a motion to reconsider, for the purpose of introducing another clause. I claim, under the rule, to have the journal corrected. It stands as a motion to reconsider. I wish added the clause I wanted inserted.

Mr. WILLIAMS—If it is in order, I move the indefinite postponement of the whole subject.

Mr. BRITAIN—The gentleman from Saginaw proposes to put in the journal something which he did not offer, but only proposed to offer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND—I sent my statements in writing to the Secretary's desk—the motion, and what I wished to appear.

Mr. WALKER—All that the gentleman from Saginaw had a right to do, was to make a motion to reconsider; when reconsidered, he might have properly made his motion. But to enter upon the journal that he was out of order, would be a position that neither he or any other man would covet.

Mr. SUTHERLAND withdrew his motion.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved that the journal of yesterday be corrected, in which he is made to withdraw his motion to amend section 38 of Legislative Department.

A division of the question being had, and there being a tie vote, the President voted in the negative, and the correction was not made.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. MOORE: two several petitions of sundry inhabitants of St. Joseph county, praying that the legalization of the traffic in ardent spirits may be prohibited; also,

By Mr. WELLS: of A. U. Mack and 73 others, and of Asa B. Brown and 13 others, citizens of Kalamazoo county, praying a like prohibition.

Referred to the committee upon the subject.

By the PRESIDENT: of Mrs. L. J. Cardnell and 135 others, Daughters of Temperance in the village of Almont and its vicinity, praying that a clause may be inserted in the revised constitution prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors for other than medicinal and mechanical purposes; which, on motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, was referred to the select committee upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT presented a resolution adopted by the common council of the city of Detroit, requesting the incorporation of a provision in the constitution, preventing banks, rail roads and other incorporations from being exempted from municipal and county taxes.

Referred to the committee on finance and taxation.

REPORTS.

Mr. TIFFANY, from a majority of the committee on exemptions and the rights of married women, submitted the following report, accompanied by an article entitled "Rights of Married Women:"

The undersigned, a majority of the committee on Exemptions and the Rights of Married Women, to whom were referred the various resolutions on those subjects, have had the same under consideration, and would respectfully report: That after mature deliberation of the various matters embraced in the several resolutions referred to them, they are of an opinion, and so recommend to the Convention, that on the subject of exemptions no provision is required, nor is it expedient that any should be incorporated in the constitution.

The whole subject, without any such provision, being within the competency of legislative action, except so far as the same is limited and restrained by the provisions of the constitution of the United States, any constitutional provision on this subject, unless in restraint, would manifestly be unnecessary and unwise, and clearly better left to legislative discretion, so to mould the exercise of the power as to meet, without restraint, the changing circumstances of society, and enable them to grant such measure of relief as the exigencies of the time really seem to require.

In the opinion of the undersigned, on principle, except to a very limited extent, the whole system of exemptions is essentially wrong. It is followed by consequences, when adopted, to a greater or less extent, subversive of that personal economy and commercial integrity so essential to the prosperity of any people.

The changing exigencies of society really sometimes require, in this respect, legislative intervention. In most of the cases when exercised, it is injurious rather than beneficial, not only to the creditor, but also the debtor portion of community. The organic law cannot, therefore, with any safety, prescribe any fixed rule.

The undersigned therefore hope, and relying on the innate integrity of our people, have reason to believe, as the capacities and business energies of our State are developed and matured, the necessity and desire of any system of exemptions will and ought to decrease, and believe the time is not very remote when exemptions should not extend beyond the mere indispensable necessities of a household. It should be, and your committee hope it will be, the highest ambition of our citizens, to be just and absolutely punctual in all their engagements. Property is the legitimate source for the payment of debts, and should for that purpose be faithfully applied as between debtor and creditor. All exemptions, in the opinion of your committee, upon principle, operate most injuriously as a withdrawal of so much available capital from the active business of society, and can alone be justified to any extent by the most imperious necessity of family existence.

In relation to the rights of married women, the undersigned respectfully report the annexed article.

SENECA NEWBERRY,
HENRY FRALICK,
DANIEL S. LEE,
A. R. TIFFANY.

ARTICLE —.

Rights of Married Women.

1. Any real or personal estate which may have been acquired by any female before her marriage, either by her own personal industry, or by inheritance, gift, grant or devise, or to which she may at any time after her marriage be entitled, by inheritance, gift, grant or devise, and the rents, issues and profits thereof, shall be and continue the real and personal estate of such female after marriage, to the same extent as before marriage, and may be sold, conveyed, mortgaged, devised, or otherwise disposed of by her, and suits maintained on account thereof in her own name, in the same manner and with the like effect as if she were unmarried.

2. Such property shall not be liable for the debts of the husband, nor be subject to his disposal without the consent of the wife in writing, first had and obtained, duly acknowledged before such officer as the Legislature shall prescribe, that such consent was not the result of coercion on the part of the husband, but was voluntarily given by her, and of her own free will.

3. All such property shall be liable to the debts contracted by the wife, and to levy and sale on execution upon any judgment for the debts of the wife.

4. The Legislature shall pass all laws necessary to carry into effect the foregoing provisions.

Mr. WITHERELL would inquire if this was a majority report?

The CHAIR—It is.

Mr. WITHERELL—I understood that the majority report was presented some time since. Are there two majority reports?

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I did not state that the report I made was a majority report, but that a majority of the committee consented that I should make the report then.

Mr. TIFFANY—I understood that no report at all should have been presented until the day subsequent to that on which the first was presented. At that time we agreed to have both reports ready, and to present them at the same time; we did not expect the minority report so soon.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—The first proposition was that I should wait until the next morning; but having received news of the sickness of one of my family, I expected to be called home; and I understood that a majority urged that I should make the report that morning.

Mr. NEWBERRY—We wished him to wait until the next morning. He said he must go home. We told him the stage would wait. I believe it was understood by every member of the committee that he should wait; it certainly was by myself.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—The gentleman on my left [Mr. H. BARTOW] understood it the same as myself.

Laid upon the table and ordered printed.

MOTIONS, RESOLUTIONS, &c.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH presented the following protest:

Whereas, it is made to appear, by the journals of yesterday, that I withdrew my amendment to section 39 in the article Legislative Department;

And whereas, it was my intention to withdraw only my demand for the yeas and nays, and not the original amendment offered by me;

I therefore protest against the position in which I am made to appear on the said journal.

J. VAN VALKENBURGH.

And the same was ordered entered upon the journal.

Mr. WOODMAN—I move to reconsider the vote whereby leave of absence was granted to Mr. P. R. ADAMS.

Out of the thirty-two days we have been here, he has been absent seventeen or eighteen. I understand that he is not detained by sickness, but is attending to his ordinary business, while he is receiving his per diem here. It is unjust—it is not democratic.

The motion was carried.

Mr. WOODMAN moved that the Sergeant-at-arms be instructed to take Mr. P. R. ADAMS into immediate custody.

Mr. WITHERELL would inquire if that was regular without a call of the House?

Mr. COMSTOCK stated that Mr. ADAMS was sick previous to adjournment. He may be sick now.

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. ALVORD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on exemptions and the rights of married women be instructed to report to this Convention some "rule" whereby the "thunder" of each member shall remain inviolate.

A motion being made to lay the resolution on the table,

Mr. ALVORD withdrew it.

The Convention having reached the order of unfinished business, resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Legislative Department."

Mr. COMSTOCK moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the Convention refused to concur in the amendment made by the committee of the whole, striking out section 39.

The PRESIDENT called Mr. HANSCOM to the chair.

Mr. MASON believed that the Convention did not fully understand the vote they had previously given. The friends of temperance are in favor of this provision; they prefer that the matter should be left to be controlled by public opinion, rather than sanctioned by the public authorities.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—The gentleman may fully interpret the public opinion of his own county, but there is a considerable difference among the friends of temperance, and there is considerable difference of opinion in this Convention as to the best measures to be pursued. I should agree with the views of the gentleman from Lenawee, [Mr. COMSTOCK,] rather than those of the gentleman from St. Clair, [Mr. MASON.] I hope that it may stand open, that the friends of temperance may agree upon some definite action. They are not agreed now respecting the best course to be pursued; and I trust that the friends of the cause will pass the measure until the committee have a further opportunity of investigating the matter.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE believed that the general wish was that the Convention should incorporate in the constitution a provision prohibiting the Legislature from passing license laws.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—I spoke to the Grand Chaplain of the Sons of Temperance, and he expressed most decided disapprobation of the clause, without some addition; and that is the feeling of the temperance men in our county. I also spoke to a person who stands high in the temperance ranks, and he expressed a similar view to the Grand Chaplain. I wish the temperance men to take decided action, and such as the majority of the temperance men will approve. I differ with some of my friends on this subject. I believe that a bad law is better than no law at all. Then I would prefer that the clause, together with any subsequent clause reported by the select committee, might be submitted to the people together, than all going in the constitution. If they do not sustain the provision, we are thrown back upon the present law, or what the Legislature may permit. The difference is here: had we better retain the provision in the constitution prohibiting them entirely, or shall we permit it to pass into the hands of the Legislature to grant licenses or not, as they may think fit.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he disagreed entirely from the gentleman from Jackson [Mr. BUTTERFIELD] with regard to reference of this subject exclusively to a select committee. He deemed the whole Convention by far the most competent, and the question had been as amply discussed before them as was necessary. Again, he did not consider the general question of temperance as necessarily involved in the 39th section. It is a mere assertion of a principle in political economy. It is an emphatic assertion of the naked principle that our government shall not place one branch of business under different regulations from what it does another—shall not receive into its treasury a tax on a trade which it may consider ruinous or sinful—shall not compromise with mischief. He thought the 39th section should stand as it now does. He did not see why the select committee need be disturbed at all. This section was a mere negative proposition—a denial of the power in the Legislature to do with one trade what they never did with another. If the committee have affirmative propositions to make, let them be brought forward clearly and distinctly; and whatever positive action they propose, if any—whatever views they choose to embody in a separate provision, let them be laid before the Convention or the people. It is time this 39th section, he would urge again, was disposed of.

Mr. WALKER—I did not before offer any remarks on this subject, because I thought I would see what the friends of temperance asked for. In its present shape it is a hazardous proposition; and the fate of the whole constitution may depend upon it. There are many other subjects that will produce local dissatisfaction, and when this section is understood, many would prefer to vote against it rather than have this provision in it. It is said that all agree to this proposition—temperance men as well as others—but we have evidence that the temperance men themselves do not agree on this subject; that license laws shall not be passed. One portion desires that the license laws shall be abolished, and no penalties enforced; and others that the license law shall remain, leaving the prohibition and the penalties in full force.

It is well known that this has been presented for the action of the people in many sections; and that in some the license law has been permitted, in others not. It is so in the city of Detroit by the action of a majority. In my section there is but little difference of opinion. Now add all these to those who are dissatisfied with the constitution on local grounds, and it may defeat its reception by the people; and for that reason I desire it to be submitted to the people in a separate article. Our district system, and abolition of the grand jury system, has many enemies, and if we embody this in the constitution it may defeat the whole.

Mr. BAGG—I rise to say a few words, and I agree with my friend from Macomb, that the constitution will not be received. Look at the district system, and say if there is not danger. There is a difference of opinion amongst temperance men in the county of Wayne, as there is in all the rest of the State. I know well their sentiments. I have a son, who is at the head of one of their divisions. I have been in association with them ever since I went home. A large majority of those in Detroit say, do away with the odious license law; then we will come in with moral suasion. Then the coast is clear; and if hereafter the people require a law of licenses, will not the Legislature meet before the licenses run out, so that they can provide for the necessity. If it were necessary, I could go into detail and show how to stop the use of ardent spirits, but this is not the place to do so. There are two sets of temperance men—one who would prevent the drinking of tea or coffee; the other who think that ardent spirits are to a certain extent useful; and between them, we are undoing to day what we did yesterday. The chairman of the select committee has never called us together; and we thus have to wait, and nothing is perfected. I call upon the large majority of the temperance men—the St. Paul men—the men who take a little wine for the stomach's sake when they are ready to faint—I ask them to come up to the scratch, and do away with this blot that has been handed down by Great Britain. You must leave the coast clear, and let moral suasion do its work; for you might as well try to stem Niagara with a bark canoe, as endeavor to force this people. I trust that the friends will be firm, not retrace their steps, but put down this miserable principle, which is known to be wrong. Gentlemen say that it is wrong—has been so for centuries; yet if you will pay thirty dollars, you may inflict all the evils incidental to the system.

Mr. MOORE—I did hope that this matter was disposed of yesterday. Now, I think that we should not render ourselves ridiculous by changing our votes from day to day. There are two extremes, and if you take the middle line you are right. We have done so, and I hope that we shall come to a vote, and have no more discussion.

Mr. CHURCH—I believe that the traffic in ardent spirits should be under restrictions. We voted in our village “no license;” the result was, the commencement of all kinds of groceries, big and little, disreputable, and fashionable groceries. The friends of temperance proposed prosecuting, and they did commence proceedings against one that was considered the most injurious of the whole. What was the result? The entire liquor interests united their purses, for they considered that a blow struck at the least, would, if successful, be struck again at the rest. I was retained as counsel, paid a large fee, and we wore out the friends of temperance, and the prosecution was abandoned. The next year we voted “license,” made them pay a good round sum, and some few bought their licenses, and the traffic immediately assumed a different shape. It was sold under the laws of the village, and order and decency was made necessary in the establishment. I came to the conclusion that liquor ever would be drunk, and that the traffic should always be under restrictions.

I believe that this is true as applied to all parts of the State; and I believe that if a clause is inserted in the constitution prohibiting the Legislature from passing license laws; or, in other words, if the traffic in liquor is to be free, without control, that we shall see that the constitution is a Pandora's box—that it will let loose a flood of iniquity that will make the people regret the acceptance of the constitution. I hope that it will be reconsidered, and that it will be left to the Legislature to do what the public good may require.

Mr. BRITAIN—I apprehend that the question is not placed in its proper light. The question is not whether it shall be ultimately adopted in the shape it now appears, but whether it shall be submitted to the people in the legislative article or not.

The gentleman from St. Joseph [Mr. MOORE] calls upon the Convention to maintain its consistency. I was sorry to hear that call upon the Convention. If the Convention has done wrong, should they persevere in the wrong? I trust not. Then why draw the attention of the Convention from the merits of the question by addressing their self-pride?

Is the gentleman afraid to trust the people? Is the Convention afraid to trust the people with it as a single question? Does the gentleman wish to compel the people either to vote for this proposition or reject the constitution? Or what is equally objectionable, does he wish to compel the people either to reject his proposition or adopt the constitution? I do not wish to do either, and temperance men, if they are friends of human rights, should be unwilling to do either.

Sir, the State of Wisconsin a few years since, submitted to its electors a constitution having liberal exemptions and stringent bank restrictions. The bankers were displeased with these restrictions, and resolved upon procuring the rejection of the constitution. They did not, however, dare to attack the bank restrictions, but confined their attack to the liberal exemptions, and accomplished their unholy purpose.

The State formed a second constitution with similar exemptions and restrictions, but submitted them in separate articles, and both were adopted by handsome majorities. I wish to profit by the last example. Some of the best provisions in your constitution will have the most bitter opponents. I wish to confine these opponents to the true issues. If they can make your stringent bank provisions, or provisions securing retrenchment, unpopular, and procure the rejection of the constitution, it is their privilege to do so; but I would not enable them to unite with their own strength against the constitution, all the liquor makers, liquor sellers, and liquor drinkers in the State, by telling them that if this constitution was adopted, there could be no more liquor made, sold or drunk in the State. Nor would I hold out an inducement to temperance men to procure the adoption of a bad constitution, merely because it secured their favorite object.

But, Mr. President, this provision is not what its friends seem to think it to be; and if adopted by the people, does not secure to the friends of temperance what they seem to be expecting from it. It merely provides that "the Legislature shall not pass any act authorizing the grant of license for the sale of ardent spirits or intoxicating liquors." It does not repeal the present license laws, nor does it require the Legislature to repeal them, and notwithstanding the assurance with which the gentleman from Genesee claimed that in "adapting the laws to this constitution, the license laws must be repealed." I find no such guarantee. The constitution does not require the repeal of the present license laws, or even hint at such repeal. It simply professes to be satisfied with what we now have, and prohibits the Legislature from passing more. The gentleman from Genesee cannot controvert this statement. And I must say, that I have from the beginning regretted this combination of the enemies of temperance, who claim that this provision amounts to nothing, and the infatuated temperance men who claim that it amounts to everything; and I should be much gratified to see it submitted in a proper shape as a separate question.

Mr. GALE—I sincerely wish, Mr. Chairman, that this matter was got along with. This voting to have the matter reconsidered, is mere nonsense. When can we get through at this rate; reversing the decision of the House from day to day? If there is not more stability in this body, we had better go home and let the people send other men.

This is said to be a nullity. It is a nullity. It is a nullity upon our statute books. Right here, under the capitol, we can see it is a nullity. For two years past this town has voted "no license;" and what we can see here applies as well to other portions of the State. The gentleman from Kent has given us an exception. He says that they put a good round sum upon the licenses. Those that took them might sell liquor; otherwise they could not. In my own town they voted no license for two years; as that did no good, they thought they would vote license, so as to have revenue; but the persons refused to take out license, on the ground that they could as well sell liquor without it as with it. There may be exceptions, but as a general thing it is a nullity.

Mr. EATON—This discussion reminds me of a saying of the member from Monroe, that "when a thing has lost its brains it is dead;" but I find that without brains it has come to life. The gentleman from Macomb tells us that he fears if embodied in the constitution the people will reject it. Have we not petitions from all parts of the State? Have not his constituents sent petitions praying that such a provision may be incorporated in the constitution? And if the people wish it, will it make any difference in what part it is placed? Will their votes count less if they find it there, whether it is in one place of the constitution or another?

The gentleman from Kent says the license law had a good effect, and that they made them pay a good round price. Those men, then, who can pay a good price to commit crime, can commit it. It is a license to commit crime, and it is an evil. Let us leave it as we did the banking law. That gave a greater blow to banks than any thing else. So it will be with the license laws; and the good sense of the people will recoil against the sale of ardent spirits.

Mr. WITHERELL—The city of Detroit voted no license, and the dealers banded together and withstood the operation of the law. The very next opportunity we had, we voted for license; for, by that means, we could regulate them; license only being granted upon securities being given that the privilege should not be abused. License being thus granted, the dealers became a watch one upon the other. We insist that the shops shall close at ten o'clock, and that no liquor shall be sold upon the Sabbath day. Whoever breaks this regulation will be prosecuted by his fellows. They say "we will report you to the authorities;" and in that way the evil is corrected to a great extent. Now that city is as moral as any village in the State, in proportion to its numbers.

It is not a crying sin, not a crying evil. The drinking of liquor cannot be classed each time as a crime. If it is a crime, there has been a great deal committed in this village within a short time. We are taking a wrong course; every man will be warranted in doing just as he pleases. When the no license system went into operation in Detroit, many persons went into the business who could not procure license, because they had no character. Now respectable men are licensed—men of good standing.

I think that we are treading upon dangerous ground, and that we are not yet aware of the full extent of the evil. I think that the effect will be that the Legislature will not be able to touch the matter at all. I presume that ninety out of one hundred have the same desire in this Convention. Then why persist in the use of those particular words? Let us recommit and see if we cannot amend to meet the views of all.

Mr. CROUSE—I have listened for some time, and have been an impatient listener. A certain set of men are like what the Yankee soldiers are said to be—they don't know when they are whipped. Whether the section is recommitted or not, ardent spirits must be used for medicinal and mechanical purposes, and while the abuses should be checked as far as possible, the Legislature should have power to authorize the sale for the purposes for which it is just and proper.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved the previous question, but by request withdrew the call.

Mr. CORNELL moved a call of the Convention, but withdrew the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS renewed the motion, and the same prevailed.

The roll being called, Messrs. P. R. ADAMS, S. CLARK, CRARY, GREEN, M. ROBINSON and SUTHERLAND, were absent without leave.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The question being on Mr. COMSTOCK's motion to reconsider, the yeas and nays were demanded thereon; and the same was negatived by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, J. Bartow, Britain, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Cook, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyers, Fralick, Gardiner, Harvey, Hascall, Hafhaway, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Tiffany, Town, Walker, Webster, Wells, White, Witherell, President—34.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Redfield, Soule, Sturgis, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman—55.

Mr. CHURCH moved to strike from section 25 of the article, all after the word "security," in the 4th line, to and including the word "oath," in the 17th line; but withdrew the same, when

Mr. GOODWIN offered the following:

Resolved, That section 39 be committed to the select committee on the subject to which it relates, with instructions to prepare and report a section abolishing the existing laws authorizing the licensing of the sale of spirituous liquors, and prohibiting the Legislature from hereafter passing any law authorizing the same, together with a resolution providing for submitting such section separately to the people.

Mr. J. BARTOW—As there is a special committee appointed, would it be proper to forestall their action by this discussion and these instructions. We should wait a reasonable time for the report of the committee. The subject is committed to known friends, and I have no doubt that they will be just to both friends and enemies; but, having committed it to their hands, it is improper to deny them the poor privilege of making a report. If it is worthy of being so referred, it is worthy of being reported upon. We should await their action, and we shall then probably have a basis upon which all can agree.

The CHAIR is of opinion that if recommitted, it takes the article with it.

Mr. BUSH—I think the chair is correct. The Executive message, when presented, is divided, and parts given to different committees; but this is the first time that I have listened to a discussion of this nature. A subject that has been referred to a committee before it has been finally settled, cannot be referred to a select committee without taking the whole bill with it.

Mr. BAGG—After spending two days, I did hope that nothing of this kind would have come from the President of this Convention. We are at the same old sixpence.

Mr. GOODWIN then addressed the Convention. (His remarks were not heard by the Rep.)

Mr. WILLIAMS did not like to stick a pin into a bladder, as the collapse was not agreeable. But he thought the wind ought to be let out of this argument, relative to courtesy due to the select committee. If gentlemen will turn to the journal of June 11, they will perceive that on that day Mr. McCLELLAND, the chairman on the Legislative Article, made his report, embracing this section. It became, of course, the property of the whole Convention, and was fully before us. Turn to the journal of June 17, and you will perceive that the select committee was then appointed, six days later. Where, then, is the want of courtesy in our deciding a question before us, when they were appointed and never referred to them. Besides, it would make no difference what they did, or did not report. The Convention would probably adhere to the principle so solemnly affirmed. He agreed with the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE,] that if recommitted, we shall have another discussion, such as we have had twice already. If the section is recommitted, when the committee report we shall have a discussion in committee of the whole, and another in Convention. So experience teaches. His friend from Oakland, his friend from St. Clair, his friend from Wayne, and all his friends would all come up to the new discussion of this question charged to the brim. He knew that he himself should, and he gave notice he would make longer and more tedious speeches than he ever had before. He was against recommitting, for the same reason that he was against the proposition yesterday of the gentleman now in the chair, [Mr. HANSCOM,] to recommit. If we went on in such a manner, our session would be prolonged to an interminable length. For himself, he wished to urge the business and get home. He hoped the motion of the President would not prevail. So far from there being any discourtesy to the select committee, in not entertaining it, the plain truth is, that the minority, by pressing this motion, show to the majority, who have again and again decided this matter, the grossest kind of discourtesy.

Mr. WHITE moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution, the yeas and nays were demanded thereon. The Clerk having partly called the roll,

Mr. BRITAIN addressed the chair, when a motion was made to allow him to proceed, which was lost. The resolution was then lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Beeson, Britain, Butterfield, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Cook, Daniels, Desnoyers, Fralick, Gardiner, Hathaway, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Tiffany, Walker, Webster, Wells, White, Witherell, President—25.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Choate, S. Clark, Conner, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Mason, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Redfield, M. Robinson, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman—59.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

A quorum of members being in attendance, the Convention resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of this morning, the article entitled "Legislative Department."

Mr. CHURCH renewed his proposition of this morning, modified so as to strike out from the word "thereof," in line four of section 25, to and inclusive of the word "oath," in line 17.

Mr. COOK raised a point of order, "that the amendment to the section having been reported by the committee of the whole and concurred in by the Convention, it is not now in order to strike out a portion of it."

The PRESIDENT decided the proposition of Mr. CHURCH not in order.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to reconsider the vote by which the Convention concurred in the amendment made by the committee of the whole to section 25.

Mr. CHURCH—I will take the method of my friend from Genesee, rather than take an appeal from the chair. I consider all this part of section 25 as of no avail whatever; and I base this opinion upon the testimony which has been given by the Printers themselves. Secondly; even if this clause furnishes us some protection against the frauds of printers, yet the ingenuity of this same craft will enable them to discover modes of taking the public money; that is, I believe an acknowledgment of one of them, that you may do as you choose, and they will still get their pay in some manner, as yet uninvited, if you fix the compensation below a living price. If this is so, then this is certainly out of place, in a document like this, which it is the business of this Convention to prepare for the people.

All this might be inserted in a law, or might form a part of a contract between the State and the Printers, but as a part of the Constitution it is highly objectionable.

Mr. J. BARTOW—While I made the motion to enable the gentleman from Kent to present his views, I must dissent directly from the manner in which he presents his case. I do not concede for a single moment, that the Press or the Printers have a fair representation upon this floor. Upon the contrary, I believe they have been misrepresented, and that much has been said by mere typos, in reference to the craft. I consider that it is an honorable craft, and an honorable occupation, and has more influence than any other, when coupled with honorable intentions.

It is not true that the craft, as a craft, will steal from the State; standing ready to plunge their hands in the public treasury—standing as the thief stands with relation to the police officer, watching his opportunity to take advantage. Yet it has been thus represented, and by those who pretend to be of the same craft. I know it to be wrong, and I have waited patiently for the opportunity to say that it was wrong. And I do say that in the Constitution this legislation is wrong, and that it is wrong to place in this document the italics of the gentleman from Kalamazoo.

"Bills and resolutions shall be done in the usual manner, at one-third the price of solid matter."

Who ever heard of this, even in a law? And if it is at any time proper, it is only so by an act of the Legislature, prescribing their own conditions, previous to a contract being made. If you touch one amendment, you touch the whole; if you strike out a part, what will you do with the rest? It is like a pile of bricks set endways; touch one, they all fall down. But I beg leave to say it is an utter impropriety that such matters should be contained in the constitution.

It is disreputable to the people of this State to suppose that they cannot govern themselves by the usual course of legislation; to say that they are obliged to put in the original law of the land the conditions which should more properly form part of a contract between the State and the Printer. I appeal to the Convention if I am not correct; and if it is said that heretofore the Printers have had more than they ought, I say that it is disreputable to make such an argument. We are representing honorable men, and we should have full faith. I hope and credit that the people will govern themselves with ability. We should believe they will send honorable men to the Legislature.

Mr. HASCALL—My object was to so regulate the public printing that it shall be better executed than it has been heretofore. The printing of the State has been done in a manner that every printer in the State would at once condemn with regard to its mechanical workmanship. These amendments apply to the manner and way in which the work should be done; nothing has been said about the price, neither do I wish to specify the price. The price has been taken too low, so that the printers have done their work in an unworkmanlike manner in order to get a fair compensation. The object is to prevent money from being taken from the public treasury, by the constructive prices that have been heretofore paid for the printing of journals and documents. This has always been left to the Legislature, and if they could prevent these wrongs, why did they not do so before? We have no better security that the next Legislature will do any better than the former. I think that the Convention should settle it. The State Printer will bring his influence to bear, and the course of the Legislature will be fluctuating. Printers seldom come into the Legislature. The Legislature will probably not understand the present amendment; they are liable to be deceived. The gentleman from Berrien has been in the Legislature for several years, and he can tell whether they have been able to check these bad practices which have prevailed. I move, therefore, that the motion to reconsider be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. REDFIELD—I fully appreciate the motives of my friend from Kalamazoo, and I supported it at the time; yet, upon further reflection, I think it might be dispensed with in the constitution. The printing might be let to the lowest bidder, and the conditions might be specified by law; that law will be in force, if enacted before the present contract expires. We should probably be better protected than we have been in other respects. I merely make these as suggestions, for I wish to protect the interests of the State, and if necessary should vote to retain the amendment of the gentleman from Kalamazoo; but we can probably arrive at the same end by the means I have suggested, without inserting this provision in the constitution, and retain all that would be found necessary.

Mr. HASCALL—The Legislature is fluctuating. The influence of the press is such that the law might be repealed. I want to make it permanent.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Kent will prevail; I have set my face as a flint against this legislation. We are here to express fundamental principles and incorporate them in the constitution. I concur fully in the remarks of the gentleman from Genesee; we cast suspicion upon a class of our fellow citizens, and so far as I know them, I have found them honorable men, and no more liable to suspicion than any other class.

We do not legislate with regard to other matters, and I would ask why should we single out this more than others? I confess that I was surprised to hear the remarks that came from the craft. Their opportunities of knowing must be better than mine; but so far as I have had opportunities of judging, they are a high minded honorable class of citizens; and I trust that the motion of the gentleman from Kent will prevail.

Mr. J. BARTOW—The trouble with the gentleman from Kalamazoo, and ever will be, is that he distrusts the ability of the people to represent themselves in the Legislature. He shows this by his votes and motions. He distrusts the power of the people. Well, I do not give in to the common saying that 'he that doubts is damned;' yet a just confidence is due from the Convention to their constituents, and that just confidence should be shown. In his efforts to better the constitution, he has shown a suspicion that poisons the whole.

We should believe in the ability of the people to govern themselves. Why not legislate upon the public lands and other matters, as well as the printing? Yet it is manifest that it would be unjust and improper.

Mr. STOREY—I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Kent will prevail, because I don't know that anything will be saved. Contractors will make their bids according to the work to be performed. In the present system there is a good deal of what is called "fat" by the printers, and contracts are let low, at a rate at which otherwise they could not live.

Mr. HASCALL—The object is to compel the printers to do their work in a workmanlike manner.

Mr. STOREY—I do not see the force of the objection. This is an innovation upon the established usages of printers, and I do not think that this Convention should take such a step. If the motion prevails, I shall offer an additional amendment, which was contained in the report of the committee, which I think will be sufficient to protect the State from being plundered by the printers.

Mr. BRITAIN—Mr. President, that this is one of the sinks into which the treasury has been flowing, and one of the abuses which the people sent us here to correct, no man in his senses will pretend to doubt. But, Mr. President, it is extremely difficult to make these corrections. Every member of this Convention will at once see that it is no difficult task, requiring moral courage and patriotic sacrifices, to stand here and defend the printers. They will also see that to stand here and defend the people's treasury from their exorbitant charges, is quite a different thing.

Sir, why have the people demanded at your hands biennial sessions, and even limited sessions of the Legislature? Why have they demanded low salaries? Why did one general burst of indignation go out against the Legislature of 1849 for paying to Munger & Pattison, the State Printers, a few dollars extra, making in all but the same price paid to the present State Printer? Why, sir, do the people look with so much disapprobation upon every measure of their Representatives calculated to increase the burdens of taxation? Why have the words "retrenchment" and "reform" become the catch words of each party; to be used by every political demagogue who wishes to obtain the confidence of the people?

Sir, it is because the people regard with extreme solicitude all unnecessary and improper drafts upon their treasury. It is because the people are extremely anxious to decrease the burdens of taxation. It is, sir, because the people have demanded "retrenchment and reform" at your hands, and at the hands of all their Representatives.

Now, sir, I shall not be disputed in regard to these statements. No sir, all will join me in the cry of "retrenchment and reform," and one universal shout will go up from this hall. But how, I would ask gentlemen, are the objects so much desired to be accomplished? Can it be done by joining in the popular cry of "retrenchment and reform," and at the same time permitting the treasury to flow out at all of the old leaks and as many new ones as our own interest and that of our immediate friends and accomplices can create? Can it be done by neglecting to bring forward any measure of reform ourselves, and opposing, from some pretended defect, every measure of reform proposed by others? Sir, I think not; the real reformer must stand ready to correct abuses whenever they present themselves—he must stop the leaks in the treasury, although it be flowing through them into the pockets of his best friends, and even though he do it at the hazard of their displeasure. And this, sir, is one of the reasons why we have so many pretended and so few real reformers.

Now, Mr. President, if we attempt to make any of these reforms, our confidence in the people is at once impeached, and we are tauntingly told by gentlemen that "the people can manage their own matters." Sir, the people cannot come here to manage their own matters; they are compelled to entrust them to the care of agents. Now, sir, no rational man entrusts his goods or treasure with agents until he has made a bargain with them and given them instructions relative to its general management. Can the State do it with less danger than an individual? Sir, the people have sent us here for the express purpose of making and executing on their behalf a contract between them and their future agents; and it is our special duty to see that this contract contains all the restrictive conditions, stipulations and obligations necessary to secure to the people economy, efficiency and fidelity from all of their future agents.

Mr. President, how stands the case under consideration? The gentleman from Kalamazoo has attempted to secure to the tax payer a little more economy in the expenditures for public printing. His proposition is no sooner read than a general onslaught is made upon him, and we are gravely told:—1st, "that his proposition is good for nothing, because the printers could get round it and still cheat the public;" 2d, "that the people must suffer if any change is made;" 3d, "that the gentleman has gone beyond his knowledge, that he is a mere typo;" and several other things equally important.

Now, Mr. President, in answer, I would say, 1st: We do not know that the proposition of the gentleman from Kalamazoo is the best that can be devised for the correction of this existing evil; but we do know three things: 1st, that the evil actually exists: 2d, that we are in duty bound to correct it: 3d, that those who know how the printers get round it, are in honor bound to suggest such amendments as will effectually restrain them.

2d. We do not know but that the people must suffer from any change which can be made; but some of us believe that if they do suffer from any change which subjects this business of printing to the same rules which are adhered to in other industrial pursuits, it will be like the suffering of a victim while being relieved from a consuming cancer.

3d. We do not know but that the gentleman from Kalamazoo has gone beyond his ability; but if he has, and feels his inability to arrest the progress of this extravagant expenditure, he will not be alone upon this floor. Sir, I was about to say that any person who could effectually correct this evil, might with propriety flatter himself that he was capable of producing any other reform which we have been called upon to make. We do not know but that the gentleman from Kalamazoo is a mere "typo," nor do we think it important for this Convention to know. Of what consequence is it, whether the person who exposes a fraud or introduces a salutary measure, be a printer, a merchant, or a farmer?

Mr. President, what has the gentleman from Kalamazoo done to merit the remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from Genesee? Sir, I regretted to hear the allusions made by the gentleman, and was glad that the gentleman from Kalamazoo did not think proper to answer them. Sir, it is with the propositions and measures of gentlemen that we have to do, and not with the persons themselves. I here protest against the right of any individual to prejudice the propositions of any member, by creating prejudices against the man, and then, as in times of old, attempting to prove that "nothing good can come out of Nazareth." Sir, it is an unholy practice, and the Convention should never be drawn by the designing from the proposition to the man himself. Representatives have an equal right to the privileges of this hall, charged as they are with the interests of their constituents. Reflections upon the representative are reflections upon his constituency; and representatives who regard either their own duty or the rights of others, will not presume to make them.

But gentlemen say that the contract system provided for in this constitution will be an effectual remedy for all of these abuses. How easy is it for gentlemen to be in error. Have not these abuses existed under the contract system? Most certainly they have; and this is not all. The contract system is really the father of most of them.

Mr. President, I have heretofore remained silent upon this subject. I might have been silent now, had I not been called upon. But, sir, I have heard with pain and regret, these abuses, which are almost entirely the legitimate consequences of our badly digested system, attributed to the worst motives, and your printers, who, under the common prerogatives of business men, have wisely made the best bargains they could with you, and looked well to their own interests in the settlement of their amounts with you, branded as swindlers, plunderers, thieves and robbers.

Sir, I was at an early day connected with the public printing of Michigan, and I have felt a deep interest in the manner in which it has been done from that time to the present. I was two years chairman of the committee on printing, while a member of the Legislative Council, during which time we took the printing from the three newspaper establishments in Detroit, between whom it had been previously divided, and who had silently consented to receive one dollar and twenty-five cents per one thousand ems for composition, and one dollar and twenty-five cents per token for press-work. We gave it all to one of these establishments, and reduced the price to sixty-two and a half cents per thousand ems for composition, and sixty-two and a half cents per token for press work, it being a reduction of just fifty per cent in the price. And yet, sir, we received the common reward of reformers; for the two publishers losing the printing, blackened us from one end of the State to the other, because we did not reduce the price still lower.

Well, sir, I was also a member of the first printing committee appointed under the State constitution, and if my memory serves me, drew up the law under which your first State printer held his appointment, and the same prices were continued to him which had been established by the legislative council. But, sir, we only paid or intended to pay for the work actually performed, to wit: in estimating composition we multiplied the number of ems in a line by the number of lines in a page, and this product by the number of pages printed. Work ordered by the Senate and furnished both houses, was only charged to the Senate; and work ordered by the House and furnished the Senate, was only charged to the House; and these amounts united, went into the appropriation bill as the compensation for State printing. The State printing soon became an object, because it was a heavy, cash business; and various expedients were resorted to for the purpose of wresting it from the hands of the State printer, the most effectual of which was that of making the people believe that they doubled the price for all the printing done. This expedient at last succeeded, and the price was immediately reduced from fifty to seventy per cent per thousand ems, and per token. But to the astonishment of the people, the amount drawn from the treasury was not diminished by the low prices, but in some cases even increased; and here, sir, gentlemen may find, even under the contract system, the origin of the very evils of which they complain, and which they so confidently believe the contract system alone will correct.

Mr. President, I am always unwilling to attribute anything to improper motives so long as I can find any other. I do not believe the present evils originated in a desire to plunder the State. I believe the printers to be like other business men, and as honest as other business men, and as anxious to make money as other business men, provided they could make it honestly; that is, by making good bargains.

There were two parties in the State; each of which was anxious to obtain the printing, and each of which knew that the other would bid very low and run the hazard of sustaining himself, by charging double, treble and quadruple composition; that is, the State may be charged with composition and press-work on two hundred copies of Auditor General's reports, furnished the Auditor General. It may be charged with one thousand copies, ordered by the Senate. It may also be charged with fifteen hundred copies furnished the House of Representatives as per their order; and the State may also be charged with five hundred copies published in the bound volume of joint documents; thus, in fact, getting pay for composition four times, when but one actual composition had been made. The lines may also be leaded to double width, and "slugged" to three or four times the common space, as in the case of bills, and charged as solid matter; and in this way get pay for double, triple, and quadruple composition. Also, in publishing journals of one page and part of another, they can be published upon a sheet of four pages, and upon opposite sides of the sheet, making two or more blank pages, upon which composition may be charged.

In regard to press-work, it is only necessary to say that sixteen pages may be printed at one impression or pull of the press; two hundred and forty of which make a token. This sheet may be divided into sheets of either four or eight pages on a side; thus giving pay for double or quadruple press-work. Now sir, can it be at all astonishing that the amount paid for printing went up, as the price paid went down?

"Oh! but it is so dishonest," a gentleman remarks; well, let us see how dishonest it really is. Suppose yourself, or my friend on the right, who thinks it so dishonest, to have been a member of some previous democratic administration, with a knowledge of the fact that, in consequence of there being no legally established rules regulating the manner in which the printing shall be executed and the printers account made out, the crafty proprietors of the whig press had resolved upon underbidding for the public printing, and thus, by securing it to themselves, be enabled to establish an espionage over the administration, and by perverting its acts and turning every thing to the worst account, embarrass and perhaps disgrace it, would you not be anxious to see the proprietors of the democratic press bid low enough to secure the printing, and save the administration this embarrassment? And after the printer had rendered the administration and the State this service, would not they be willing to see his account so made out as to save him from bankruptcy, and encourage either him or some other patriot to step into the breach for the salvation of the State again, should occasion require it. Sir, I believe that both you and the gentleman would.

It is under this loose system that the evils complained of have been created, and fastened upon the State. Yes sir, and it is under this loose system that the State may, while contracting at a very low figure, be compelled to pay about double price for it. Do gentlemen wish to perpetuate this system? Sir, I trust not. Can they look to the contract system for the necessary correction? Certainly not; for that created it, and cannot fail to continue it, unless prevented by restrictions.

The interest of the State, and certainly the honor of the craft requires that the exact manner in which the printing shall be done and paid for, should be legally established and understood by the printers before the bids are made. This would enable the printer to obtain fair prices without fear of being underbid, and relieve him from the necessity of making those constructive accounts against the State, which were in the first place forced upon him by an apparent necessity, and subsequently, perhaps, fastened upon him by his money-loving propensities.

I had hoped that the gentleman from Jackson would favor us with a proposition to save the "honor of the craft," but he has not yet done so. I do not know that this amendment is exactly right, but until I find a better one I am bound to go for it, under a conviction that the general principles under which this branch of the public service is to be regulated, should be settled in the constitution.

Mr. SULLIVAN remarked that he was in favor of the reconsideration. It had appeared to him from the beginning, and he understood that it was now conceded by the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. HASCALL,] that his project would not save one cent to the treasury. He proposes, in substance, that hereafter there shall be no constructive printing—a printer shall be paid only for the work actually done by him. He proposes also a new mode of computing that labor. Now sir, is not the proposition a self-evident one that prices must be regulated by the amount of labor performed—that the mode of computation is entirely immaterial—that calling one page twenty pages, or twenty pages one, does not vary the matter. If you compel the public printer to adopt a new mode of reckoning his labor, he must and will charge accordingly. The gentleman from Kalamazoo insists that his project will lead to a better mechanical execution of the public printing. But, really sir, whether the mechanical work of the printer shall be executed more or less neatly, is a matter of not sufficient importance to look after in the constitution. It is all more appropriately a matter of contract between a committee of the Legislature and the public printer. It is such a matter of detail as is not inserted in any constitution of this Union, and such, he trusted, as would not be incorporated in our own.

Mr. McLEOD—As I know nothing of printing as an art, I shall say nothing of the technical terms; but for general reasons, the amendments sought to be introduced do not comport with my ideas as being proper to be introduced in a constitution. A constitution is legislation for the masses, and should not descend into detail.

The object in calling this Convention is to act upon the great frame work of government—upon the departments, the Executive—not to act upon particular trades or callings; and I see no propriety in retaining this amendment, although I think the gentleman from Kalamazoo is honest in his motives, and that in a proper place the amendments would effect their object. But in this constitution we have no more right to retain them than if the judicial bill should regulate lawyers' fees, the mode of declaration; or in the Executive department should regulate the duties of the county officers. They are more properly the terms between the publisher and the printer, than for constitution makers who are to act upon general principles in the departments of government, not upon trades or callings.

Mr. HASCALL asked the yeas and nays, and the same being ordered, the motion prevailed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Church, J. Clark, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Eastman, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Kingsley, Kinne, Marvin, Mason, McLeod, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Woodman, President—52.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Backus, Beardsley, Britain, Asahel Brown, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Crouse, Daniels, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Lee, Lovell, Moore, Morrison, Orr, M. Robinson, Sturgis, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Walker, Wells, Williams, Willard, Witherell—37.

Mr. ROBERES offered the following as a substitute for the entire section:

"The Legislature shall provide their fuel and stationery, the printing and binding of their laws and journals, and all other printing they may wish executed, in such manner as they may deem expedient."

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend the substitute by striking out the last clause, and inserting the words "by contract;" which he subsequently withdrew.

Mr. ROBERTS—I did not wish to involve myself in this discussion, but I feel called upon to say a word in defence of the art of printing. I suppose I am the oldest printer upon this floor. I have served an apprenticeship in a newspaper office where the greatest amount of printing was done in this Union; and have myself had the management of a printing and book binding establishment. I think from these various circumstances I am better informed upon these subjects than any gentleman upon this floor. I wish to say that I consider great injustice is done to the printing community by the comments of gentlemen. No printer in this State has ever robbed or plundered the State to the amount of one dollar, or has received one dollar more on the contract than he was fairly entitled to. Have your State Printers been printers? They have not.

And to go back and examine the contract system, let us go back to '43, when the first contract was given to Mr. Ellis, and see how the work was executed. Upon account of its being taken at too low a price, he could not pay workmen, and for one fortnight we could not get a journal printed; and if gentlemen will look at them as they are printed, they will perceive that they are scarcely legible.

Well, sir, who was the next? A man, sir, who did not, when he went into the editorial department, know a type from a hand-saw, or a book from a block of wood. How did he obtain the contract? In a manner that shows the beauties of the contract system; for, one bidder was two cents per thousand ems lower than the person who obtained it; and the person who was unsuccessful had all the material that was required, and could give all the security that might be necessary, but he was thrust aside on account of political favoritism. The third attempt was with Mr. Munger. He was a printer, but he could not execute the work of the Legislature, because he had taken it at too low a price; he could not pay his men at the rates for which he had agreed to do the work.

I stated, when in committee of the whole, that it had invariably failed. It has failed in Congress, and it has failed in each Legislature where it has been attempted to be established; and we must go back to the old principle of the Legislature electing their State printer, or leaving it to the people. If we place the amendment in the constitution, and elect the printer by the people, there will be but little fear that he will deceive the Legislature. His duty will be known; and I venture to say that no honorable minded printer will break the law giving him a fair compensation.

I have listened to some of the remarks made this morning, with sorrow and regret. I speak on this subject without the slightest personal feeling in the matter. I live in a territory where the question has but little influence, and I never intend to be again connected with the public press.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the amendment made in committee was amended by striking out all after the word "thereof," in the 4th line, to and inclusive of the word "oath," in the 17th line.

The amendment as amended was then concurred in.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the section by adding thereto the words "nor shall constructive composition or press-work in any case be paid for," upon which he asked the yeas and nays.

And the same being demanded, the amendment was disagreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Backus, Bagg, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Asahel Brown, Burns, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, S. Clark, Comstock, Cook, Crouse, Daniels, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Lovell, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, O'Brien, Orr, Redfield, Robertson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, White, Whittemore, Woodman, President—46.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to amend the section as follows:

Insert after "journals," in the second line of section 25, as follows: "all blanks, paper and printing for the executive departments; all advertisements of tax sales in counties where two or more newspapers are published."

Mr. CRARY moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "departments."

Mr. WILLIAMS asked the yeas and nays.

And the same being demanded, the amendment was agreed to, as follows:

Upon Mr. WILLIAMS' amendment he asked the yeas and nays, and the same was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Backus, Bagg, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, S. NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, J. Clark, Dimond, Fralick, Gibson, Hanscom, Kinne, Newberry, Roberts, Sutherland, Town, Whittemore—14.

Mr. HASCALL moved to amend the section by inserting after "lowest," in the 3d line, the word "responsible."

The motion was withdrawn.

The question recurring on the substitute proposed by Mr. ROBERTS,

Mr. BRITAIN asked the yeas and nays, and the same were taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. McLeod, Roberts, Sutherland—3.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arze-

no, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman, President—72.

So the substitute was not adopted.

Mr. WILLARD moved to amend section seventeen of the article by striking out "three," wherever it occurs, and inserting "two." He moved a call of the house; and the same being ordered, the roll was called, and Messrs. P. R. ADAMS, J. CLARK, GALE, HART, MASON and N. PIERCE were absent without leave.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—Mr. President: I hope, sir, the amendment of the gentleman from Van Buren will prevail. I intended to have moved this amendment, but the gentleman from Van Buren has taken the wind out of my sail, but he can't take away my thunder. I am in favor of this amendment, sir, because the object of this Convention is reform; we were called here to reform men out of office—to reform down the salaries, and to reform money into the treasury, and this measure is calculated to promote these objects.

It is a democratic measure, and I am a democrat; a progressive democrat; not exactly a young democrat, but of the young, old democracy, of the Barnburner Hunker species. I am of the old Jeffersonian school, and I now stand upon the National platform, with the Cass democracy. The "Tribune," when it reported me a few days since as saying, "with God and General Cass for our polar star, we should do well," reported me falsely, sir; but I do say, with the fear of God before us, and General Cass for our political leader, we shall take front rank in the States of our Union. I am in favor of this measure because it is just; it is a measure of reform due to our constituents; due to the laboring classes—the producers of our land; they expect it from us, and their expectations must not be disappointed.

The democratic doctrine is equal rights; the greatest good to the greatest number; and this is my doctrine. I have always battled in the democratic ranks—I have stood by her firm and unmoved these forty years; through weal an through woe; in prosperity and adversity; through good report, and through bad report; when she has been in the ascendant, and when in the minority. I stood by her when the fooleries of 1840 were sweeping over the country, when

"Van, Van, you'r a used up man," was reverberating from land's end to land's end; and some of our democrats, through the influence of hard cider, coon skins, two dollars a day and roast beef, with other appliances, were induced to deny the faith and go over to the enemy. I am not wedded to her, sir, through blind attachment, but because I believe in her principles, under which we have been fostered, and flourished until our government is the envy and the pride of the world. I represent, sir, in part, the noble, whole souled democracy of Oakland. When first solicited to become a candidate for the office I now hold, I very modestly declined; but when the solicitation was renewed, being like most political men of rather easy virtue upon this subject, I yielded, and was much gratified to find by the result of the canvass, that my constituents had not only given me the full vote of the party, but had pushed me a little ahead of all my colleagues. If any have cause of zeal and devotion in behalf of his constituents, I have. And I now say to them, in the language of Ruth to Naomi, "whither thou goest, I will go; where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

I support this measure, sir, because the amount proposed—two dollars per day—is sufficient, is abundant compensation. Few of our laborers get more than one dollar per day for toiling from ten to fourteen hours; and why should their servants, who think it hard to spend from six to eight hours per day in this hall, be entitled to more than this amendment contemplates? But gentlemen tell us that there are men upon this floor who make great sacrifices at three dollars per day; this is doubtless true, sir, of professional men; many of them could make much more in their business at home, pecuniarily, than they do here; but this, sir, we credit to account of their patriotism. And, think you they would be here the less on account of the pay? I tell you, no sir. Those men of mind, of talent, of influence, of patriotism, would still be found in your Legislative halls; and a class of heartless politicians, whose only object is the pay, would be excluded; the character of your Legislature would be improved, the business done promptly and efficiently, and much more saved to the people.

Sir, in looking over our manual, I find a majority of the delegates on this floor are farmers, if we include two or three merchants, &c., and the "miscellaneous" gentleman from Wayne, whom we claim; and unless they have been more successful than your speaker in that business, they have fallen far short of two dollars per day, and can make more in the halls of the Legislature at that price, than on their farms. I have often, sir, in by-gone days, seen deliberative bodies, but I have never looked upon so large a body of men, containing so much mind, so much talent, so much moral character, as is now arrayed before me. And in this Convention we find more than one-half are farmers, comparing favorably with the most talented upon this floor; men of clear heads and pure hearts; and although some of these may make pecuniary sacrifices by their attendance here, we claim for them too, some patriotism, some devotion in the cause of their country; and I pledge you, sir, they will always be ready to make necessary sacrifices for their country's good in the Legislative hall or the tented field. Many of them have done so, sir, and should the opportunity again offer, you will find them ready to sacrifice themselves upon their country's altar, should it be necessary.

In the war of 1812, your speaker had but just commenced his military career, and held the office of first private in a company of infantry; his country called, and he shouldered his knapsack and his rifle, and marched to the battlefield. In the recent war with Mexico he had somewhat advanced in military honors, and held the office of General, in which capacity he tendered his services to Gov. Wright of New York, when that State was called upon to contribute to the army; but there were so many patriots in advance of him, that he was constrained to remain in abeyance until some farther opportunity should offer; that opportunity did not offer, and he was obliged to remain at home, an inactive spectator, while my friend and colleague, [Mr. HANSCOM,] our valiant sergeant-at-arms, and others, marched to the Halls of the Montezumas and gathered their laurels.

Now, sir, I contend the pay contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Van Buren, is sufficient to remunerate any one who loves his country for his services to that country. We wish to address their patriotism—not their cupidity; and I call upon the delegate from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER,] who looks so wistfully and smiles so blandly upon the Indian country, who advocates so feelingly the interests of Montcalm, Newaygo, Oceana, and, indeed, all the north—I call upon him to come to the rescue and aid the county of Oakland in this measure of reform, if he wishes to obtain votes there; I ask my 'miscellaneous' friend from Wayne to help us with his eloquence and influence; I implore my old friend from Kalamazoo, [Mr. S. CLARK,] with his clear head and democratic heart, to aid us in this measure of reform, and to bring with him his colleague, the amiable Judge, and have him speed some of the barbed arrows from his quiver at the enemies of this measure; I call upon the venerable delegate from St. Clair, the sea-faring gentleman, with all his nautical tact to aid us in trimming the craft and steering safe into port; I ask my urbane friend from St. Joseph, the farmers' advocate, the orator of the State Agricultural Society, to join hands with us and give us a hearty lift; we ask our erudite friend from Kent to aid us with his legal knowledge and devotion in this cause of reform; I invoke to our aid the sagacious delegate from Calhoun, the military gentleman I mean, my compeer, who, they tell me, always sleeps with one eye open when the democracy is in danger—I ask him to aid us with his brilliant talents and his extensive influence in this democratic reform; we trust in the efforts of our friend from the aurora borealis district for his aid, and ask him to emit some of his lightning flashes in behalf of our cause, that it may triumph over its enemies; I call to the combat my valient colleague and orthodox friend, [Mr. WOODMAN,] who so vigilantly guards the public treasure from the “electioneering clergy,” to protect that treasury from the cupidity of exacting and insatiate patriots; I call upon my extra progressive colleague, [Mr. AXFORD,] on whose motion my resolution to suspend the pay of delegates who unnecessarily absented themselves from this Hall, was indefinitely postponed—I call upon him to do something to redeem himself from the odium of that measure, and aid us in passing this amendment; I call upon my neighbor [Mr. CHAPEL] who has heretofore so largely aided in relieving the treasury of its burthens, upon whom we can always depend when reform is the order of the day—we ask his aid in replenishing the treasury, that it may not be exhausted when he shall besiege future Legislatures; we call upon you one and all, gentlemen of the Convention, friends of reform, to come to the rescue and aid us in this reform so loudly demanded by the people—aid us in saving to the tax payers one-third of the amount heretofore paid to your legislators. Show your faith by your works—give this measure your hearty, your united support, that when you return to your homes and your constituents you may hear the good plaudit:—“well done, good and faithful servants.”

Mr. DESNOYERS—I have not been called on by the gentleman from Oakland for my assistance.

When the gentleman from Van Buren first brought up the motion, I felt very much inclined to oppose it; but the arguments of the gentleman from Oakland have nearly convinced. I think he is correct; for if the next Legislature is to be composed of members like him, I think that $2 per day will be enough, and too much, for expending the time of the Legislature in making long, foolish speeches and sermons—talking about nothing. I think that for that class of legislators a very small sum is sufficient.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I have no occasion to make Buncombe speeches for the purpose of making political capital. I stand here prepared to do what is just and proper and right in regard to this measure; and I consider that it is no more than right and just that we should give our representatives $3 per day. If any gentleman will take his pen and a piece of paper and calculate the expenses, he will find that at $2 per day he will not have $1 per day to pay for his services; and what kind of a representative must that man make whose time is not worth $1 per day at home. You can go further, and give the representatives nothing, and then you will have a class upon this floor the same as it is in Great Britain. There the moneyed class can only be represented. And I want it so that every farmer can leave his business, and come and represent the interests of the people without sustaining pecuniary loss. I shall vote against striking out, and I shall be sustained by the county that I have the honor to represent; for I only know of one man who ever complained of the votes that I have given on this question, while I have had the honor of a seat in the Legislature.

Mr. HANSCOM—I think that I know the sentiments of the people of Oakland, and I think that there is too much integrity, too much good sense in that county, to wish that any person should vote for less than $3 per day. I believe they would denounce any one who votes differently, and say that he was endeavoring to make a little capital at the expense of his own good judgment. They don't exact it—they don't wish it—and they would scout the man who should desire to reduce it to $2 per day.

Mr. ALVORD—The gentleman from Oakland calls upon us to show our faith by our works. Let him do so, and for his services refuse to take more than $2 per day.

A division of the question was ordered upon the proposition of Mr. WILLARD, and the yeas and nays being demanded, the motion to strike out was lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. BACKUS, Asabel Brown, Bush, Carr, Chandler, S. Clark, Comstock, Cook, Danforth, Edmunds, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hixon, Lovell, Morrison, Newberry, Sturgis, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Webster, Wells, Williams, Willard, Witherell—26.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinnene, Lee, Marvin, McLeod, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Walker, Warden, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Woodman, President—65.

Prior to the announcement of the result, Mr. ROBERTS was excused from voting.

Mr. BAGG proposed the following amendment to the article:

Insert after "township," line 9, 'section 4, the words "or city," and add at the end of the section, the following:

"And when any township or city shall contain a population which shall entitle it to more than one Representative, then such township or city shall elect the number of Representatives to which it shall be so entitled by general ticket."

Mr. BAGG—This is the "last of the Mohegans." I trust that this Convention will at least let the cities escape the single district system. My friend from Calhoun, in his argument in favor of single districts, made use of the argument that the people of a whole county could not become acquainted with the candidates; but this cannot apply to cities. There will be a number of cities entitled to more than one Representative before the next fifteen years comes round, and there is a necessity for cities electing by general ticket; as, however advantageous it may be considered by some in a county, in a city it leads to colonization, fraud and corrupt practices, which tend to impair the purity of elections.

Mr. ALVORD—This is a question of considerable importance. As other gentlemen may wish to express their views upon this subject, and it being the usual time for adjournment, I move that this Convention do adjourn.

Which motion prevailed, and the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, (33d day,) July 18.

The PRESIDENT called the Convention to order at the usual hour.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CORNELL submitted the following:

Resolved, That from and after to-day, the morning sessions shall commence at eight o'clock and adjourn at eleven o'clock A. M.; the afternoon sessions shall commence at three o'clock and adjourn at six o'clock P. M., until otherwise ordered.

Mr. C. said—Mr. President: I do not know that I have fixed the hours that will be acceptable to members, but I wish to establish a principle. While the weather is so warm, under very protracted sessions the physical powers become prostrated. Some portion of the time was taken up unprofitably yesterday. Members became irascible, and did not do the business with that calmness with which they attended to it in the morning. May we not protract a session so as to sink both the mental and physical powers? We have been many of us accustomed to out-door exercise, and we cannot accommodate ourselves to such long confinement as those habitually engaged in more sedentary pursuits. During the recess we want time for rest and exercise. If the resolution I have sent up is not proper in its details, I hope some gentleman will propose an amendment; anything reasonable, I am willing to accept.

Mr. HASCALL moved to strike out the words "and adjourn at eleven."

Mr. ASAHIEL BROWN moved to strike out all after the words "eight o'clock."

Mr. ALVORD said—Mr. President: I hope the motion to strike out will not prevail. It is a fact that must be obvious to the members of the Convention, that it is utterly impossible for gentlemen to sit in this Hall four hours each session, without impairing their health. I know I have impaired my own health by sitting four hours and a half every morning. I know it must operate so on a large portion of the members. These long sessions in this hot weather, in a house imperfectly ventilated, we shall find a ruinous course; as remarked by the gentleman from Jackson, [Mr. CORNELL,] after sitting here three or four hours, gentlemen become irritable; they do not do business with that freshness as in the morning; and I believe we ought to have shorter sessions in the morning. It is not profitable to sit so long; with shorter sessions in the morning, we should get along with business much more rapidly than we now do.

I am willing (said Mr. A.) to meet here early in the morning; but I would divide the time so that we should not sit over six hours a day. Experience has proved that it is as much as can be done by a deliberative body; they cannot do more for the State without violating the law of self-preservation. I hope, sir, the resolution will prevail.

The question was taken on Mr. HASCALL's amendment, and lost.

The question recurring on Mr. ASAHEL BROWN's amendment to strike out all after 8 o'clock,

Mr. REDFIELD would prefer to meet at 7 o'clock.

Mr. EATON hoped the motion to strike out would prevail. He was willing to fix the time of commencement of the morning session at six, seven, or eight o'clock; but would not fix the time of adjournment; it might work badly.

The question was taken on striking out and lost.

Mr. EATON moved to strike out "eight" and insert "seven."

Mr. AXFORD—If the gentleman will think one moment, he will see we cannot get our journals at that time, which are wanted the first thing in the morning.

Mr. WALKER suggested half past seven.

Mr. EATON accepted it.

Mr. CORNELL said there seemed to be some objection to meeting at that time. We cannot get our journals—some of the members board at a distance from the capitol; it will be difficult for them to get breakfast and get here by that time.

Mr. DESNOYERS moved to lay the resolution on the table. Lost.

The question recurring on the amendment to strike out "eight" and insert "half past seven,"

Mr. WHITE hoped it would not prevail. Under the present arrangement, it is fifteen or twenty minutes after the appointed time before the roll is called. Members should agree to meet at a convenient time and attend to it with promptness. The business before the Convention would be better done if members had time for rest and reflection. He was in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from Jackson.

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike out "and shall adjourn at eleven o'clock and at six o'clock."

Mr. HASCALL—It is always in order to move to adjourn. If any particular business were on hand at the hour of adjournment, it might facilitate business to continue beyond that time.

The motion to strike out prevailed.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to strike out "three o'clock" and insert "two o'clock." Lost.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. BRITAIN submitted the following:

Resolved, That from and after the adoption of this resolution, no member shall speak more than eight minutes at any one time, without leave of the Convention.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to strike out "eight" and insert "five."

Mr. ALVORD would add—"nor more than seventeen times on the same question."

Mr. J. CLARK was of the opinion that the members of the Convention could arrive at the object the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] has in view by adopting another course.

If members would confine themselves to the rule and speak to the subject, there would be no occasion for this rule, and he would go in favor of rescinding the resolution for calling the previous question. There would be no necessity for that; but when we are permitted to travel everywhere except in the right track, the adoption of some such resolution as the one proposed may be necessary. Sailors are in favor of keeping a direct course, and trim the ship so as not to make lee-way. If gentlemen continue to deviate as much as they have done from the course, I shall lay my compass beside me and be guided by it, and call every member to order who deviates from the rule.

A division of the question was called, and the word "eight" was struck out.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to insert "two minutes."

Mr. WOODMAN moved the indefinite postponement of the resolution; which prevailed.

Mr. ALVORD—I find a resolution on the journal which I offered but afterwards withdrew. It was my property, and I know of no reason for the Convention appropriating it.

The CHAIR—Does the gentleman move to strike out?

Mr. WALKER—The resolution is on the journal in accordance with the rule adopted yesterday. If adhered to, it will have a tendency to exclude much matter that is objectionable from being introduced to the Convention.

Mr. MASON—I believe the decision of the chair is, that any thing withdrawn by the mover is not entitled to go on the journal.

Mr. WALKER—Rules are established by practice. Yesterday we laid down a precedent to govern us hereafter.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—The rule was not changed. Out of courtesy, or for some other reason, the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] got his resolution on the journal, but I do not understand that the rule was changed.

The CHAIR—The practice has been here when resolutions and motions are withdrawn, not to place them on the journal. Yesterday it was moved to insert matter that would not have gone on the journal according to former practice. It was carried. The Secretary, considering that as an alteration of the rule, has put on the journal all matter that was sent up to the Chair yesterday.

Mr. MASON—Is it the rule now?

The CHAIR—The gentleman from St. Clair may decide for himself, whether the Convention were deciding on the rule generally, or on the particular case.

Mr. MASON—The Convention have not altered the rule, but the Convention permitted it to go on the journal. I find another resolution which ought not to have gone on the journal, as it was immediately withdrawn. It was that the Sergeant-at-arms be instructed to take Mr. F. R. ADAMS into custody.

Mr. GALE—I was opposed to changing the rule, but I begin to be in favor of it. It will show gentlemen the absurdity of taking up the time of the Convention by introducing foolish matter. Let it all go on the journal; the apprehension that it will be published in the journal will restrain members from introducing anything that may afterwards appear ridiculous or foolish.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—May we not in this way override and set aside every rule of the Convention?

The question being stated on correcting the journal,

Mr. ALVORD said he had not made a motion to correct the journal; he had merely inquired why the resolution was there. It seemed to him a species of petty larceny.

The consideration of the article entitled "Legislative Department" was then resumed.

The amendment proposed by Mr. Bagg to section 4 being under consideration,

Mr. MASON hoped the amendment of the delegate from Wayne [Mr. Bagg] would be adopted. All agree that it would be impolitic to divide a township in the formation of representative districts. In his opinion it would be equally impolitic to divide a city. The time may soon come when some townships will be entitled to more than one Representative; and there is the same impropriety in dividing them for representative purposes that there is in dividing counties in the formation of Senate districts.

One of the arguments against the present system is that the larger counties dictate to the smaller, and have virtually deprived them of their full share of representation. This has been the case in regard to the county of Wayne. It is true she has permitted the county of St. Clair to have a Senator, but for the last six years she has dictated to that county who that Senator should be, and that, too, against a majority of the delegates representing these counties in the senatorial convention. This is what has created a feeling in the county of St. Clair in favor of single senatorial districts.

Another argument in favor of the single district system is, that it brings the Representative home to the people, that they may know for whom they vote, and not be under the necessity of voting for persons of whose character and capacity they are wholly ignorant. This argument may be a good one, but it is not applicable to townships or cities; for in both cities and townships the people are generally acquainted with each other. There is also a community of interest, of feeling, and as this interest was one and common, he held it should be indivisible.

Mr. BACKUS said—Mr. President: I should be unwilling to see the amendment adopted, in relation to the city of Detroit, or any other place; or any different rule from that which applies to the other portions of the State. I suppose the sentiment expressed in the Convention is understood. That where there is a sufficient population in a territory to entitle them to a Representative, they shall form a constituency for one Representative; that the Representative shall be brought directly home to those represented. The sentiment is, that single districts shall be enforced. Why should this Convention force on Detroit, or any other place, the double district system?

The argument of the gentleman from St. Clair [Mr. MASON] is of no force. If I understand the principle, I suppose it to be this: Every constituency shall have its own Representative—that the union ticket shall be abolished. I am opposed to the amendment, because I believe the city of Detroit and every other community are desirous of having single districts. So far as the argument goes that their interests are in common, the same may be said of counties.

Mr. MASON—Is not Detroit a township?

Mr. BACKUS—No sir: it is a city, divided into wards; and if the population in the wards is sufficient in number to form a constituency for a Representative, I see no reason why they should not have a Representative. The city of New York is divided into districts. Why should not the rule apply to the people of a city as well as to any other part of the community? Believing the sentiment of the people to be decided, I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. EATON—There seems to me to be much reason in the proposition. I cannot see why the same rule should not apply to cities as well as to townships. Certainly the inhabitants of a city must be as well acquainted with each other as in a township. The argument that the electors do not know the candidate, will not apply. I believe it is a whig movement. I believe the gentleman from Springwells is the only one of the delegation, in favor of it. If there is any force in the argument that township lines should not be broken down, it will apply to cities.

Mr. BACKUS—I cannot but regret that that gentleman should indicate political opinions as actuating my conduct on this floor. If they knew my mind as well as their own, they would not judge so. I came here, sir, not to advance the interests of any party, but to do my best to aid in promoting the interests of the State. Intimations like these are discourteous. It has been asserted that such motives actuate me. I disclaim it. I hope I took a seat here from motives higher than any involved in party politics, whether democratic or whig. I represent no party, but the people of the State. If I know their interests, I shall ever be found endeavoring to carry them out; and in carrying them out I deem it as a question settled by the people of the State that each Representative representing them in these halls shall have his own particular representative district.

Mr. ALVORD—I have not the honor to reside in the city of Detroit, therefore I do not wish to oppose the wishes of the delegates from the city. The gentleman who opposes this measure [Mr. BACKUS] does not reside in the city, and I am surprised at the course he takes in opposition to the wishes of the Detroit delegation. I know the people of the city of Detroit are in favor of this measure, and I should be sorry to cast a vote in opposition to their wishes. I suppose the delegation from the city know the views of their constituents, therefore it is my duty to support the measure. I do not know what political bearing it may have.

Mr. BACKUS—I do not care about it.

Mr. ALVORD—The gentleman cares as much as I do. It has been decided that townships shall not be divided. What is Detroit but a township—a municipal corporation? What do they propose to do? They propose, sir, to cut the city in pieces. I ask them to tell me how it can be cut in pieces? Perhaps they will be entitled to five or six Representatives. They cannot do it without dividing wards. The city of Detroit should not be subjected to this rule. If gentlemen will show me how it can be divided without dividing blocks of buildings, they will throw some light upon it.

Mr. RAYNALE had no doubt the city of Detroit could be divided as well as a county could be divided, as easily as to divide counties into districts. I shall vote for this proposition, because I am opposed to the whole system of single districts; the more I have conferred with the people on the subject, the more I am confirmed in my opinion. Therefore, I can support this proposition in favor of the city of Detroit, because it accords with my feelings on the subject.

Mr. DESNOYERS said—Mr. President: I hope the amendment will prevail. The object of districting the counties is that the people may be acquainted with their Representatives. That object does not exist in the city of Detroit. The people of the city will be acquainted with their Representatives, no matter from what ward they may be taken, or if from one ward. There is no jealousy in the city of Detroit.

The general ticket would prevent much corruption in the city—corruptions that cannot exist in the counties. There are wards largely democratic, and others whig. There are many young men residing in the city with whom it is immaterial in which ward they reside. They can change their residences to accomplish some political purpose, and may easily be induced to do so in times of excitement. I believe (said Mr. D.) a large majority of the citizens, uninfluenced by the politicians, would be in favor of it.

Mr. COMSTOCK was opposed to the amendment. He considered it an entering wedge to breaking up the whole system. If it were claimed for the city of Detroit, the same might be claimed for Adrian, and on the same ground they might claim not to be divided. If he [Mr. C.] entertained the same views as the gentleman from Oakland—if he were in favor of double districts—he might be in favor of it; but, believing as he did, that the policy of having single districts was preferable, he should oppose any attempt to break in upon the system.

Mr. CHURCH—I think there is a plain distinction between the city of Detroit and some townships with which I am acquainted. You may take a township in a county, and find its population influenced by the configuration of the county. A county might be divided by separate and distinct interests. Those separated in feelings and interests should have separate representatives. If they are entitled to two representatives, they had better elect their own men. Let the character of a county be what it may, the townships at the extreme end of a county are not so well acquainted with the candidates as to render the nominations always acceptable. But, take the city of Detroit: the population is in a small space; all the individuals of any note are acquainted with each other; their interests and feelings are the same; they move as an unit; they are a mass. Why should not such a body, united as they are in every respect, have joint action on any subject? There is something remarkably distinguishing Detroit from any other part of the State, showing that the single district system is not applicable to that city.

Mr. N. PIERCE had supposed certain principles were established by the Convention; he had supposed single districts, both for Representatives and Senators, was a point settled; that biennial sessions and the pay of members were settled. He did not know but members who had been home had come back instructed differently; but he had supposed that was the opinion of a great majority of those who represent the interests of the State.

Mr. P. said he saw no reason to change the policy, or that the city of Detroit should be governed by any other principle. They are divided into wards. He could see no reason why the interests of the city should be broken down, because a Representative lives on one side of the city, and another on another. How could it separate interests that were similar?

Mr. WALKER was in favor of single districts so far as they could be carried out. He believed townships should not be divided for Representatives, or counties for Senators. What was the argument? It was that large towns overshadowed the small, and that large counties controlled the small. It was for that reason the article was reported in the shape it was, rather than having the smaller counties and towns put under the domination of the larger; but I believe (said Mr. W.) there is evident propriety in keeping a county undivided for senatorial purposes, and a township for representative purposes.

If there is a unity of interest in a township, is there not the same in a city? How often do they apply to the Legislature to regulate their police and other matters, as a municipal corporation? It is agreed that no township shall be divided. It may happen that a town may be entitled to two Representatives, while, as it now stands, they can only elect in single districts; and while we must have single districts, it cannot be divided. Ann Arbor, at the last census, contained between 4,000 and 5,000 inhabitants. The townships of Adrian and Pontiac, and various others, may be entitled to two Representatives.

I do not (said Mr. W.) advocate it for the benefit of Detroit, but as a general principle that, where a township or city shall be entitled by population to more than one Representative, they should be elected as a unit. In the corporation of the city of Detroit it will be necessary to prevent pipe laying. Many of the citizens have no fixed home in the city, and can move from one place to another. If you divide a city you leave facilities for acts of that kind.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BAGG, and carried, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Bush, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Hathaway, Kingsley, Lee, Marvin, Mason, McLeod, Mowry, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, Whipple, Whittemore, Withereil, Woodman, President—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Backus, H. Bartow, Britain, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Comstock, Cook, Daniels, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hixon, Kinne, Lovell, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, N. Pierce, E. S. Robinson, Tiffany, Wait, Wells, White, Williams, Willard—36.

Mr. LOVELL moved to amend section 13 of the article by striking out in lines 4 and 6 the words "two-thirds," and inserting in lieu thereof "a majority."

Mr. L. said—Mr. President, I am not opposed to a reasonable and proper veto power, but I am opposed, sir, to the power conferred on the Executive by this section. It will be recollected that the committee reported "two-thirds of the members present," but "present" was struck out and "elected" inserted. The committee did not contemplate that to pass a bill over the head of the Executive should require two-thirds of all the members elected. Again, sir, it is almost an anomaly. I can find but one solitary State [Louisiana] in which two-thirds of all the members elected are required. That State stands alone; but, sir, the common law does not prevail there—the code Napoleon prevails there—their situation is peculiar.

I believe, further, a majority of all the members is preferable to such as exists in our present constitution, the constitution of the United States, and the constitution of the State of New York, which require two-thirds of the House present. What constitutes a quorum? The House means a business House; a quorum is a majority. With a House of sixty-six, with a bare quorum present, twenty-three may pass a bill over the head of the Executive; if there should be a full House it would require forty-four. He did not want any such sliding scale.

He considered it anti-democratic to give one man so much power. The amendment he proposed would place it beyond all misconstruction, and it adopts the correct and right principle.

Mr. BUSH said—Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ionia. The history of the legislation of the State of Michigan fully justifies me in the conclusion to which I have come. It frequently happens that there are local matters brought before the Legislature, which of themselves are opposed to the public policy of the State. They may be sustained by but a very few members; but, sir, in the progress of the business of the session, similar matters will be brought from other locations. Separately they could not have received the sanction of a majority; but the parties are anxious to have them pass, and when none alone could succeed, they concentrate their efforts, and carry the whole through in a mass. And then each member would go home and be sustained by his constituency and receive the plaudit, "well done good and faithful servant," though he, by entering into a conspiracy, had passed acts contrary to the interests of the State. Then, sir, we see the necessity of the veto. The Governor is the tribune of the people; he is the representative of the whole people, and he cannot give his sanction as the representative of the whole people to acts contrary to their interests. In the judicious exercise of this power he will be sustained by the people.

I ask the gentleman from Ionia [Mr. LOVELL] to put his finger on the first veto message that has not been sanctioned by the people. If they think the Executive wrong, they will elect men to carry out their wishes the next session. It is the operation of a bad law that brings evil; not the neglect of passing a law. No very great inconvenience has resulted from an act not being passed, but much injury has been sustained by the passage of bad laws. The gentleman says this provision is broader than the one in the present constitution. That is true. Two-thirds of the House could pass an act of incorporation. It would be improper for a majority vote to pass it, over the veto of the Governor.

Mr. WALKER—Suppose an act amendatory to a charter should be vetoed by the Governor; how would it look to pass it over the objections of the Governor, by a majority vote?

Mr. LOVELL—How easy it would be to make a law requiring a two-thirds vote an exception.

Mr. MORRISON would call the attention of members to the 27th section. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ionia would make the veto of the Governor amount to nothing. It would be a perfect nullity in case of charters of incorporation; because it would only require the same number of votes to pass it over the veto of the Governor which had previously passed it.

Mr. RAYNALE asked the yeas and nays on the amendment, which resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. H. Bartow, Asahel Brown, Carr, Comstock, Edmunds, Green, Hanscom, Harvey, Lovell, Van Valkenburgh, Williams—11.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Marvin, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Town, Wait, Walker, Warden, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Willard, Witherell, Woodman, President—67.

So the amendment did not prevail.

Mr. KINGSLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute of Mr. McCLELLAND to section 3 was adopted on the 16th instant.

And the motion prevailed.

Mr. KINGSLEY moved that the section (3) be referred to a select committee of nine, but withdrew his motion.

Mr. KINGSLEY moved to amend the substitute of Mr. McCLELLAND by striking out all after the word "enumeration," and inserting the following:

"Provided, That the county of Saginaw, with the territory thereto attached, shall be entitled to one Representative; the county of Tuscola, and the territory thereto attached, one Representative; the county of Sanilac, and the territory thereto attached, one Representative; the counties of Midland, Gratiot and Arenac, with the territory thereto attached, one Representative; the county of Montcalm, with the territory attached thereto, one Representative; and the counties of Newaygo and Oceana, with the territory attached thereto, one Representative; and each county hereafter organized, with such territory as may be attached thereto, shall be entitled to a separate Representative when it shall have attained a population equal to a moiety of the ratio of representation."

Mr. K.—It seemed to be the order of yesterday to reconsider the votes given on propositions the day before. I would have made the motion I now make, yesterday, but the floor was occupied every moment that the Convention was in session. The part of the section proposed to be stricken out is not founded on just principles. Gentlemen cannot have considered to what consequences it may lead. We are making a constitution to remain as we may make it for many years to come. It should not be amended by another Convention within twenty years. The close followers of the advice of Jefferson will not be in favor of it until thirty years have expired; for that is the time fixed by him for a constitution to remain established. But we will say the constitution we are preparing shall remain twenty years. Now we should look through that space of time, and see if the section as it stands will not work an injury. In about twenty years some now here present will be convened again with others to amend this constitution, and they ought so to frame the present work that it will guard the interests of all parts of the State until that time. Great changes in the amount of population will take place in the State in the next twenty years. What has been the increase in the last twenty years? In the year 1830, there were in the State between twenty-eight and twenty-nine thousand inhabitants. In the year 1840, there were two hundred and twelve thousand; and it is now estimated that the population of the State is four hundred and fifty thousand. Within twenty years the population of the lower peninsula of this State will be more than one million—more than three-fourths of which will be in the south half of that part of the State; and there will be two hundred thousand in the upper peninsula. This Convention has provided that the number of Representatives shall not be less than sixty-four nor more than one hundred; but it is not expected that the House of Representatives will be allowed one hundred members. The gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] the other day proposed to limit the number to eighty, and many supported the proposition. We will say the number shall be eighty. Now, how will the matter stand? There are sixty-seven counties marked out in this part of the State, and territory enough in the other part to make eight more. We have, then, and shall have seventy-five counties. These counties will all be settled within twenty years with at least fifteen hundred inhabitants, if we can judge of the future by the past. In the last twenty years more counties have been settled than remain to be settled. When the east shall swarm again (and that event will take place within the next ten years,) the land in the north part of the State will be taken up. It will be taken up rapidly; county sites will be purchased and established, and soon the requisite number for a Representative (1500) will be in each county. The number of counties to be represented will increase rapidly, and they must be supplied, as the section now stands. How are all these new counties to be supplied? If the number of Representatives are limited to eighty, nearly the whole number will be required to furnish one to each county. To do this, many must be taken from the old counties; their representation will grow less, while their population will be rapidly increasing. The ratio of representation may now be seven thousand; but within twenty years that ratio may and probably will run up to twenty thousand. And while the ratio in the old counties will be continually increasing, it is proposed to continue the ratio for the counties on their first formation at fifteen hundred—a very small number compared with that which will entitle an old settled county to a representation. The injustice which may and probably will grow up under the provision of the article, as it now stands, is very evident. It is possible that in the thirty new counties hereafter to be organized, they may demand thirty Representatives on a population of fifty thousand, when an old county, with a population of fifty thousand, may be entitled to only two Representatives. Nor is this a very extravagant supposition. If the public lands shall be given away, as is proposed, and is very probable, those new counties will all be settled very fast, especially at and around the county seats. All those counties will have some population, though not large. The spirit of speculation will prompt that mode of settling the new counties. That is the way the counties now settled were settled; and they settled for a time very rapidly—making a small population in each county. Indeed, it might happen under the present provisions of this article, that a new county may ask for a Representative here which shall not have a legal voter in the county.

The lands may be given away, and some counties settled sufficiently to entitle them to a Representative by a population, none of which may be voters; and more than that, there may not be a foot of taxable land in the county, as it is proposed not to give deeds until after a residence of two years on the land.

It is said that territory forms a just basis for representation. It does to some extent; but there is no reason why the wilderness, sparsely settled, should have so great an advantage over the more settled part of the country. According to provisions of other parts of the constitution much local legislation is given to the counties. The power of future Legislatures will not extend much beyond the framing of general laws; and the whole people will be interested in the general law, and the principle of taxation. The people and the property will be mostly in the old counties, while the number of their Representatives must be comparatively small. Numbers and property should not be overlooked in establishing a principle of representation.

The truth is, the section under consideration establishes the system of representation on a wrong basis. It allows a new county a Representative when it shall have fifteen hundred inhabitants; and that principle remains fixed until the constitution shall be altered, while the older counties will have less Representatives, though their numbers will increase much faster than in the new counties. The evil will continue to grow worse the longer it exists. While the ratio of representation will run up to twenty thousand in the densely populated counties, still fifteen hundred inhabitants in a new county may be entitled to a Representative.

We can be liberal to the new counties now organized, without doing much injustice to the old counties; because the inequality of representation will be continually growing less. It will be more than a year before there will be any elections under the new constitution and the next apportionment; in the mean time the number of inhabitants will be much increased in the new counties to which we shall give a Representative. If some evil will grow out of the first arrangement, it will be an evil which will soon correct itself.

I beg gentlemen who are so anxious for the protection of the new counties, will recollect that they are in the south part of the State. We are now seventy miles south of the centre of the State, and there is not a member in this house who belongs north of it. The counties now considered new, will be old and populous within twenty years; and the inhabitants will be as much interested in a just system of representation as the populous counties now are. I will say to the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH], by way of prophesy, that the county of Kent in twenty years will have a population of thirty-five thousand, and the city in which he resides will have a population of fifteen thousand. And within that time this county of Ingham will contain forty thousand inhabitants.

The present constitution allowed one Representative to every county organized at the time of the adoption of the constitution, but required that the counties to be organized should have a population equal to the fixed ratio to entitle them to a Representative. I have examined the constitutions of the new States, and none have been more liberal than it is proposed to be by this amendment. Inhabitants of new counties hereafter cannot complain of injustice under this provision. It cannot be expected that we shall establish in this constitution a system of representation wrong in principle, unjust to the older counties, and which will continue to grow more unjust until the constitution shall be amended.

Mr. MASON said it appeared to him that they were making progress backwards. If the question could be taken at once, he should be satisfied. It is as liberal as we want it, but it has been before the Convention before, and rejected. It will meet the approbation of all the new counties, if those which are endeavoring to perfect an organization may by name be entitled to a Representative, and the remainder after they shall have obtained the ratio of population.

Mr. WALKER said he was not satisfied with either the section that had been adopted or the proposition that was proposed by the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. KINGSLEY], to be substituted therefor, if the reconsideration should prevail. But as he was satisfied from the former action of the Convention that the section as it stood was the most liberal that could be obtained for the new counties, and far more liberal and just than that of the gentleman from Washtenaw, he should vote against the proposition. The section as it now stands, provides that every county which now has, or may hereafter have, an organized county government, and shall contain fifteen hundred inhabitants, shall have a Representative in the lower house to make known their wants, to advocate their interests and protect their rights. This he believed to be dictated alike by good policy in reference to encouraging the early settlement of the rich yet uninhabited districts of the north, and by equal justice to those by whom the new counties are or shall be inhabited. But, what is proposed by the substitute? Why, sir, the member from Washtenaw seeks to strangle this equitable principle as applied to all future counties; and to effect it, he offers to give immediately to one or two counties which have not yet organized, each a member, as a bribe to induce the abandonment of the principle of representation to other counties hereafter to be organized, upon equal terms with those named in his substitute. To effect this purpose he appeals to the cupidity of the old counties, and seeks to array them against the rights of future counties by the bug-bear that there is danger of the new counties obtaining an undue influence and control over the old counties of the State, and warns members that these new counties may obtain an influence dangerous to the interests of the old counties in matters of taxation.

I am glad (said Mr. W.) that the gentleman has alluded to the subject of taxation. It may be that the ghost of the five million loan haunts his imagination, and that of some other members from the (so called) centre and south. He talks of the injustice done to the old counties by the representation given by this section to the north. Sir, in 1863, the principal of the five million loan falls due; and during the existence of the constitution we are now making, both the interest and principal of that loan will have to be met by taxation, unless an extension of time shall be obtained. For whose benefit was this debt created and expended? Almost exclusively for the benefit of those which were then called old counties.

If you will take the trouble to look into the session laws of 1837, you will find that so jealous were the then new counties of the north and west that they should not receive an equal participation in the benefits to be derived from the expenditure of a loan, for the payment of which all parts of the State would eventually have to be taxed alike, that they could not be induced to vote for creating that loan until the faith of the older, more densely populated, and consequently more powerful sections of the State, was solemnly pledged by the passage of an act marking out an equitable system of expenditure, by which all parts of the State were to participate alike in proportion, not to the amount of population at that time, but to the prospective amount of taxation for its ultimate payment. But, sir, of what avail was the faith thus solemnly pledged, when it came in conflict with the selfish interests and the powers conferred by the more numerous representation of the older and more densely settled portions of the State? It was a mere rope of straw. It was in vain that the Representatives from the then new and weak counties appealed to that plighted faith in behalf of an equal participation. It was in vain that they remonstrated against the exclusive usurpation by the old counties of all the benefits to be derived from the expenditure of a fund for the payment of which the whole State was liable alike.

The gentleman from Washtenaw tells us that the new counties have always had an undue amount of representation in the State Legislature. The gentleman ought to know that this is not the fact, but that they have always been subjected to a much greater amount of taxation than their representation based upon population would accord to them. I would call the attention of the gentleman to the case of Allegan, which came in by sufferance, as it were, or, as some said, by fraud, at the time of the adoption of the first constitution, not having even a moiety of the population entitling her to a Representative, but was allowed a Representative in consequence of having completed her county organization between the session of the former Convention and the ratification of the constitution. And yet, soon after that Convention, in 1838, Allegan paid a State tax of $3,647 93; while the gentleman's own county of Washtenaw, which by its population was entitled to seven members of the House, paid a State tax of only $3,989 03, or but a trifle more than Allegan. Saginaw, too, was only entitled to a member by grace, and yet she paid a State tax of $2,279, or more than some of the old counties that by their population were entitled to two and three members. The same inequality will be found to exist between the taxation and representation of the new counties, as compared with the old, under this constitution. And yet we are told that the rights of the old counties are in danger.

I would ask the gentleman from Washtenaw if it is not right that the new counties, which have got to be taxed for the payment of a debt in the creation and benefits of which they have not participated, should each have at least one member of the House to guard their interests, and remonstrate against such gross injustice being perpetrated upon them in levying the tax for the payment of the debt created by the loan, as was perpetrated upon the north and west in its distribution and expenditure?

The true policy of the State is not merely to be just, but to be liberal towards those who shall settle the vast tracts of as yet uninhabited lands at the north. By inducing their occupation and improvement, we increase the aggregate valuation of the taxable property in the State, and proportionably diminish the burden of taxation in the payment of the interest and principal of our debt. The fairest portion of our lower peninsula (to say nothing of the mines of wealth in the upper) lies far to the north of where we are now holding this Convention; and such has been our short-sighted policy that we have been expending money to construct roads to carry emigration rapidly across our own State, to Illinois and Wisconsin, instead of opening lines of communication with the unsettled portions within our own borders, and offering other inducements to their occupation and improvement. Until recently so little has been known of the real value and character of the northern interior, that emigrants from the older and more densely populated portions of Michigan have frequently been seen wending their way to Wisconsin and Iowa, to re-locate, unconscious of the fact that we had a far more desirable and wholly unoccupied field for their labors within our own borders.

Mr. HANSCOM proposed as a substitute for the foregoing, to insert after the words "representative purposes," the words "that shall have perfected their county organization by the election of county officers by the first of January, 1851."

Mr. CHURCH moved the previous question, and the same being seconded, the question being "shall the main question be now put?" it was decided in the affirmative.

The question first occurring on the proposition of Mr. HANSCOM, it was disagreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Chapel, Choate, Danforth, Hanscom, Hathaway, McLeod, President—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, O'Brien, Orr, N. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Williams, Willard, Woodman—74.

The amendment of Mr. KINGSLEY was then agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Chandler, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, Mason, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Story, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman, President—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Arzeno, Backus, Asahel Brown, Carr, Chapel, Choate, Cook, Hanscom, Kinne, Marvin, Newberry, Raynale, Wait, Walker, Wells, Willard—16.

And the question being on the substitute as amended, the same was adopted.

Mr. CORNELL moved that the vote by which the Convention concurred in the substitute of the committee of the whole for the 28th section, be reconsidered.

Mr. C. said the language of the section, as it now stood, grated harshly in the ears of some of the members of the Convention. He hoped the section would be struck out, that one in more appropriate language might be inserted.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE was apprehensive that the section which had been adopted would be misconstrued by persons out of the State. I have (said Mr. P) the same interest in the reputation and honor of the State as others. I shall impugn the motives of no man. I hope the section will be struck out, and so left.

Mr. J. CLARK would inquire if it should be struck out, would it not leave it as reported by the chairman of the committee on the legislative department?

The CHAIR—If the vote is reconsidered, the question will be on the amendment; if it is not adopted, the question will be on concurring in the amendment made in committee of the whole.

Mr. CRARY—If I could sweep both out, I would go for reconsideration. If we are to have one, I should wish to retain this.

M. WALKER would not vote for any such compromise. He would rather have either than leave the question open to the action of the Legislature.

Mr. ROBERTSON—If that be the intention, I shall go against reconsideration.

Mr. BAGG would vote against reconsideration. He hoped he should always know when he was whipped.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD hoped the motion would prevail, if for nothing else but simply to alter the phraseology, which was certainly objectionable. He had a substitute which he thought would be less objectionable on that account. He should not insist on the original proposition, though he should prefer it. He hoped it would be reconsidered merely for the purpose of altering the objectionable language. He would read a substitute which he proposed offering:

Mr. WITHERELL said he was in favor of leaving it for each House to elect a chaplain; but that is decidedly objectionable to the Convention. It is said that thousands of dollars have been expended. I do not believe (said Mr. W.) that a single cent has been expended. They will use up their time, and they may as well use it up in quarrelling about a chaplain as anything else—better than in making bad laws.

The section as it stands is to me entirely objectionable. The people will think that the Convention entertains an opinion which I believe they do not entertain. That will be obviated by the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Jackson. It asserts a general principle. The people can help themselves; but we provide for religious services for the State prison, where the parties cannot help themselves.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH thought the section as it stood placed the Convention before the public in a false light. He would go for reconsideration.

Mr. BACKUS would go for reconsideration, to give gentlemen an opportunity to relent and repent. He believed it was the wish of the people of the State, without reference to sect or party, that the Legislature should acknowledge the existence of a Deity, and His superintending power. In that view he thought they should have a chaplain. But he thought the sentiment of the Convention could not be better expressed than in the language of the section, and he should regret to have a modified expression of the same thing.

Mr. CRARY did not think that those who voted for that proposition had any intention to repent. He had no objection to any other arrangements to carry out the same object. For that reason he should sustain the proposition of the gentleman from Jackson, [Mr. BUTTERFIELD.] Some things are done with reason and some without. My experience (said Mr. C.) is that we have been doing a thing without reason; but there is a reason for having a chaplain in the State prison; there is a reason, because they should have moral and religious instruction, and they cannot have it unless you give them a religious and moral instructor.

We should do more than we have ever done on that subject; but when you come to this House it is a different question. If there is so much piety in this house, we have praying men among ourselves—men competent to pray for us, and pray with us; and if there are no men of that kind, prayer will do no good. It is not so in the State prison.

Mr. C. would remark, that out of fifteen years since the formation of the constitution, only in four years had a chaplain been paid for out of the public treasury. So far has public opinion been carried out for fifteen years.

Mr. WOODMAN desired briefly to express his views. He did not belong to that class of men who made long speeches, but as a representative of Oakland county he wished to state his reasons for his vote. He had voted with the gentleman from Monroe, because there was a feeling in the House that it was unexceptionable on account of the verbiage. A gentleman rises to move a reconsideration without offering a substitute, and throws us upon that broad sea where we have been floundering the last four or five days. I like plain terms. It is plain because it says no money shall be drawn from the Treasury for religious purposes. That is the ground I take; but I do not wish, and I do not believe that there is a man on this floor who wishes to debar any legislative assembly from having their sessions opened with prayer. We only wish to say to the world at large, and to the tax-payers in particular, there shall not be a cent drawn from the treasury on that account; and as to the verbiage, it is right—it does not grate so harshly on the ear.

The gentleman says he wants a chaplain in the State prison. It was amended to meet that. We do not exclude a chaplain from the State prison, and we do not want to exclude a chaplain from the Legislature; but we want an express provision that they shall not pay for such services out of the treasury; so that there may not be so much religious gambling as there has been heretofore for the office of chaplain. As the language is plain and perspicuous, and conveys what we mean, I hope the subject will not be opened. I cannot promise you that you will not have a long speech from my friend on the left, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH,] if you open it, or from the gentleman about to take his seat.

The motion to reconsider did not prevail, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Backus, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Butterfield, Chandler, Church, Comstock, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Daniels, Edmunds, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hart, Harvey, Hixon, Lovell, Mason, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Witherell, President—44.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arno, Axford, Barnard, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chapel, Choate, J. Clark, Conner, Crouse, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Green, Hanscom, Hascall, Hathaway, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, M. Robinson, Sturgis, Town, Walker, Wells, Willard, Woodman—45.

Mr. COOK moved to amend section 37 by striking out "1851" and inserting "1852."

Mr. C. said if the proposed amendment were adopted, the Legislature would meet in session about three months after the election. By the section as it stands, it would be fifteen months after the election before they met; it would be as if the officers elected this fall would commence their duties in 1852; there would be one session in the first year of the term instead of the last. If an emergency should arise, the Governor could call them together.

Mr. CHURCH observed that the effect would be, to bring the State elections in the same year as the national election. That there would be an election only once in two years. Many are in favor of annual elections; one year for State officers, the next year for national officers. It has been represented that the judicial election should be kept clear of political associations, and that it should be had at the time of the town meeting. Some doubt the propriety of letting the people remain in a state of complete stagnation for one year; that it would be injurious; and that they should be called out every year.

The amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. BARNARD, section 18 was amended as follows:

Line 1, after the word "Speaker," insert the words "during the session of the Legislature."

Also, insert after the word "of," in line 1, the words "postage on."

Also, strike out the word "for," in line 2, and insert the word "on."

Mr. EDMUNDS proposed to amend section 17, by inserting after the word "message," in the 6th line, the following:

"And each session of the Legislature shall terminate on the day on which the members thereof cease to receive their pay from the State Treasury."

Mr. EDMUNDS observed that the article limits the pay to forty days. He was of opinion that when the members of the Legislature ceased to be the servants of the State, they should cease to act as a legislative body. He did not wish them to remain and be paid by corporations or others for their use.

Mr. COOK was opposed to the amendment. He thought they should have authority to set a day or two longer. It may be necessary to do up the business nearly perfected. He would say if his friend from Washtenaw [Mr. EDMUNDS] would go with him on the article on corporations, there need not be any apprehension of corporations getting through any measure obnoxious to the people.

Mr. FRALICK—They are not limited to the time. One gentleman had considered two dollars a day enough for their services. At that rate they might sit sixty days.

Mr. EDMUNDS would not subject them to the suspicion of being paid by private corporations or individuals. The lobbies might wish to pay them five or ten dollars a day for remaining, and the members would be more disposed to favor their objects, whether or not they would be subject to the charge. When the State ceases to pay, the State should cease to demand their services.

Mr. REDFIELD said if he thought the time was limited, he would not go for it. In New York they receive $300, but are not limited to time. Evils might arise from limiting the time. He would not object to a certain limit of two or four days.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. REDFIELD said he was desirous of proposing an amendment to section 7. It seemed to him that to cut off postmasters altogether from eligibility as members to the Legislature, would not be just. He would modify it by saying those receiving a less compensation than $200 should be eligible.

Mr. J. CLARK—Will the gentleman say $100?

Mr. REDFIELD had no objection.

Mr. KINGSLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the Convention concurred in the amendment of the committee of the whole to section 7.

But the motion was lost.

Mr. McLEOD moved that the vote by which the Convention concurred in the amendment made by the committee of the whole to section 38 be reconsidered.

Mr. McLEOD said the amendment which had been adopted would allow the Legislature to publish in the newspapers the laws that take effect in less than ninety days. He had two objections to the section as it stood. The first objection was general and the next special. If it be necessary to have laws it is necessary that they should be put into the hands of the people as soon as possible.

I have (said Mr. McL.) a selfish reason. In the counties of Chippewa and Mackinac we cannot get the laws before the end of July, and sometimes we do not get them before August. We have but one term of the Circuit Court in either Mackinac or Chippewa counties in the year. At our last circuit we were placed in a most ludicrous attitude, as Mr. President and the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. BACKUS] can testify. The court was opened, the docket called. But no trial was ready—and why? Simply because the Legislature had been tampering with our remedies—changing our proceedings, (as we conjectured from the published titles of the session laws;) but not having the laws themselves, we were afraid to proceed without them. This was on the third Tuesday of July. We met in the morning—adjourned till afternoon; met in the afternoon—adjourned till morning; and in this humiliating manner played open and shut for nearly a week, when we were compelled to adjourn without day, and take ourselves off to the Saut Ste Marie, to repeat the farce before a new audience.

Now, sir, to avoid such exhibitions in future, I would have the laws published in every paper of the State—I mean laws of a general, public character, affecting the interests of the entire State. The expense is merely nominal. Say there are forty papers in the State, and you give each paper twenty dollars for publishing all the general laws of each session, the whole amount is but eight hundred dollars—a sum too inconsiderable to be for one moment weighed against the incalculable benefits to be attained by publication. I cannot doubt that a sense of justice on the part of this Convention will accord me this boon for the counties who look to me to represent them. If you withhold it from us—then, sirs, like the ancient Gentiles, “not having a law, we must become a law unto ourselves.” But it is just as a general principle throughout the State, as well as a sectional benefit. Are your laws necessary? Then is it necessary to publish them. Is it necessary to publish them? Then is it equally necessary to put them in the hands of those who are to be affected by them, at the earliest possible opportunity. They should not be locked up in your bindery or folding rooms, nor eaged in your Secretary of State’s office; but so soon as passed, the press should lend them wings to seek every hamlet and cabin in the State.

In my county they become, under your present system of distribution, merely accessories to a spirit of romance. They are of no other value than to remind us of the dark eyed and rosy cheeked daughters of the press, through whose fair fingers they have passed in the process of stitching: a solacing reflection, it is true, but not sufficient to repay us for our privation of the law, even though the white fingered damsels were as fair as the model of my friend from Jackson, [Mr. STOREY,] to wit: the mistress of old King Harold, who was called Edith, and surnamed the beauty with the swan’s neck.

The motion was carried—yeas 46, nays 37.

The Convention then adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Roll called and a quorum being present, the consideration of the article entitled “Legislative Department” was resumed.

Mr. McLEOD moved to strike out section 38, and insert:

“The Legislature shall have no power to establish a State paper, but may provide for the publication of general laws in all the newspapers in the State, at a compensation therefor not exceeding twenty dollars to each newspaper which shall publish the same within forty days after their passage.”

Mr. McL. said the whole object was to leave it within the power of the Legislature—it is not imperative on them. He supposed under that provision they might select such papers as they thought proper. The object is to publish in all, but it is not mandatory. They must get it done for twenty dollars, and it must be done in forty days.

Mr. CHURCH moved to strike out the word “twenty” and insert “ten.”

With this amendment, he (Mr. C.) should be in favor of the proposition. He saw no objection to publishing them in all the papers at that cost. The publisher of every paper within the State who can satisfy the Secretary of State that he has published the laws within forty days after their passage, shall receive the sum of ten dollars. I think (said Mr. C.) that, partly to get the ten dollars, and partly to suit their readers, as the general laws will not be large, all the papers will publish them.

The amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the words “of each session,” were inserted after laws.

Mr. CHAPEL thought the paper in a county having the largest circulation would be sufficient. There was no use in giving a bonus to every paper.

Mr. ALVORD was in favor of publishing the laws in the papers of the State, but should vote against this proposition, because it would defeat the object for which it was intended. He thought twenty dollars as little as they could be published for.

Mr. CHURCH was sorry that his amendment had brought the resolution into disfavor with its original exponents. He went for the principle more than anything.

Mr. C. moved to reconsider the vote.

Mr. CORNELL asked if fifteen dollars could be inserted; and if so, would that pay for publication?

Mr. STOREY did not think twenty dollars would be sufficient; it might cover the cost of composition—perhaps fifteen dollars would.

The Convention refused to reconsider.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following as a substitute for the proposition of Mr. McLEOD:

“The Legislature shall have no power to establish a State paper; but every newspaper in the State which shall publish all the general laws of any session within forty days of their passage, shall be entitled to receive fifteen dollars therefor.”

Mr. WILLIAMS would remark that he had, on a previous occasion, said that every newspaper represents an interest, and any other newspaper fails to reach that interest. The gentleman from Macomb had said that there were three newspapers published in that county; but he would limit the publication of the laws to the paper having the greatest circulation. He [Mr. W.] did not think that the fifteen or twenty thousand persons in Macomb county could be reached by one paper. There are religious newspapers published in the State which have an extensive circulation, and are read with a great deal of avidity. He [Mr. W.] would let every religious newspaper—every temperance paper—every paper of every description—publish the laws. That was the only fair, democratic distribution. If they would publish them, let them be paid for it. Fifteen dollars would not be too much.

Mr. HASCALL submitted the following:

“The Legislature shall have no power to publish a State paper; but it shall provide for the publication of the general laws in one or more newspapers in each county in the State, having the largest circulation; provided the pay therefor shall not exceed twenty dollars for any one session.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved to postpone the further consideration of the article till Tuesday next; which was not agreed to.

The substitute offered by Mr. HASCALL was not adopted.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute offered by Mr. WILLIAMS,

Mr. MORRISON observed that the publishers of newspapers would not be compelled to publish the laws. If a specified sum were fixed—say fifteen or twenty dollars—and in any session but two or three general laws were passed, they would all publish them, and some for the pay; but if the laws were of any great extent, they might refuse to publish them. They would be governed by laws regulating their property, and they would consult their own interests. If the laws were but few in any one session, they would publish them; but, should they be of such extent that the proposed sum would not remunerate them for the expense, they would not publish them.

Mr. WILLIAMS said if the time should ever arrive when the acts of the Legislature should not be more than three or four in a session, it would be most fortunate for the State. In such a case the State might well afford to publish them.

The substitute was adopted.

The question recurring on the adoption of the substitute for the section, a division of the question was asked, and the motion to strike out prevailed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Backus, H. Bar-tow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McLeod, Mosher, Mowry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Roberts, Robertson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wells, White, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell—57.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Asahel Brown, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Crouse, Danforth, Diamond, Gale, Hathaway, Hixon, Kinne, Lee, Moore, Morrison, Newberry, Orr, N. Pierce, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, Sutherland, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whipple, Woodman, President—36.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend the substitute by inserting after "receive," the words "a sum not exceeding," Which was agreed to.

The substitute for the section was then agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Backus, H. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyes, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McLeod, Mosher, Mowry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Roberts, Robertson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell—60.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Asahel Brown, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Comstock, Danforth, Dimond, Gale, Hathaway, Hixon, Lee, Moore, Morrison, Newberry, N. Pierce, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Woodman, President—31.

And this section of the article was concurred in.

Mr. RAYNALE moved to amend section 7 by inserting after "officers of the militia," the words "post masters."

The PRESIDENT decided the proposition not in order.

Mr. RAYNALE moved to insert "judges of the supreme court;" which he subsequently withdrew.

Mr. HANSCOM proposed to amend section two by striking out the word "one." Also, strike out section five and insert the following, to stand as the section:

"The number of Senators shall be thirty-two, and the Legislature shall divide the State into districts; but in the formation of such districts no county shall be divided."

Mr. H. considered the proposition he had just offered, better than the original article, which provides absolutely for single districts, and cuts up the counties.

Where a county shall be entitled to more than one Senator, they ought to be allowed to elect by general ticket, in a county.

Mr. COOK raised a point of order, "that the amendment to the section having been reported by a committee of the whole, and concurred in by the Convention, it is not now in order to strike out a portion of it."

The CHAIR decided the proposition not in order.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment made in committee to section 5 was concurred in; which motion was lost by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Beeson, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Cornell, Crary, Eastman, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Marvin, McLeod, Raynale, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Van Valkenburgh, Whittemore, Woodman, President—22.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Mason, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, N. Pierce, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Walker, Webster, Wells, White, Williams, Willard—64.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, section 36 was amended by inserting after the word "meet," the words "at the seat of government;" and by striking out "period," and inserting in its stead the words "place or time."

Mr. SOULE moved the previous question, but withdrew the call.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD moved to re-commit the article to the committee on the legislative department, with instructions to amend section 28 so it will read as follows:

"The Legislature may authorize the employment of a chaplain for the State prison, but no money shall be drawn from the treasury for the payment of any other religious services."

Mr. HIXON moved to amend so as to read: "The Legislature shall have no power to have any religious services performed in either house."

Mr. HIXON said it had been stated that it cost thirty-six dollars an hour for those services. He wished to save it.

Mr. CHAPEL said he would never vote to deprive members of the Legislature of having prayer, if they choose to pay for it. If they choose to appoint a chaplain, or invite the resident clergy, he would never deprive them of the right.

Mr. HIXON said the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. CHAPEL] had advocated the amendment which had been adopted, on account of expense. He [Mr. H.] was disposed to go farther; he proposed to save time, which would amount to a greater sum than the pay.

Mr. MASON said no doubt the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. CHAPEL] acted from principle—he had shown his hand. If it were to save the State that expense, it was a mere matter of dollars and cents. The principle was the same in the two propositions; one was to save the money, the other the time of the people in hearing the services. To carry out the principle, the gentleman should have the clergymen come before the hour of business.

Mr. CRARY moved to add "in either branch of the Legislature."

Mr. C. said it was a motion to commit. The committee could report back immediately; it would occupy no time if all are agreed who were in favor of the original article. If it were a matter of feeling with any individual, he would go for it. It was time the Convention commenced to harmonize, or they would soon find themselves in as bad a situation as the Ohio Convention, when they adjourned on the fourth of July.

Mr. WOODMAN saw no difference between the two propositions, except in the phraseology; being disposed to harmonize, he should go for it.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD accepted the amendment of Mr. CRARY, and being disposed to harmonize, would move that the committee on phraseology be instructed to strike out the original section and insert the substitute. Which motion prevailed.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend section seventeen by striking out in the 8th line thereof the words "and newspapers."

Which did not prevail.

Mr. TIFFANY proposed to add at the end of section 17, "nor to vacate or alter any road laid out by commissioners of highways, or any street in any incorporated city or village, or in any township plat."

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out the words "or any street in any incorporated city or village, or in any township plat;" which motion was disagreed to.

And the amendment of Mr. TIFFANY prevailed.

Mr. BUSH moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out of section 17, all up to and including the word "thereafter." in the third line, and insert:

"The compensation of members of the Legislature shall never exceed three dollars per day for actual attendance, unless absent by reason of sickness; and after the session of 1851, no compensation shall be allowed after the first sixty days of the session, and not beyond the first ninety days of the session of that year."

A division of the question being had, the motion to strike out was lost.

On motion of Mr. WHITTEMORE, section 17 was amended by inserting in the sixth line, after "receive," the words "no more than."

Mr. WHITE moved to amend section 23 by striking out "object," and inserting in its stead "subject;" which was not agreed to.

Mr. HART moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. McLEOD, the article, as amended, was laid upon the table and ordered printed.

Mr. STOREY moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. WHITE moved a call of the House.

Mr. HART moved to adjourn. Ruled out of order.

Mr. WHITE'S move for a call was not sustained.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn—yeas 18, nays 56.

Mr. HANSCOM moved that the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole on the general order; but withdrew the motion.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved a call of the House; lost.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, (34th day,) July 19.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: the petition of Mrs. E. A. Bentley and fifty-one other ladies of Mt. Clemens, Macomb county, praying the insertion of a provision in the constitution prohibiting the importation, sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors from and after the first day of January, 1854; which was read and referred to the select committee on licenses.

By Mr. HASCALL: the petition of N. A. Balch, Gov. Ransom and 120 others, citizens of Kalamazoo county, remonstrating against the establishment of an independent supreme court; which was read and laid on the table.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. WHITTEMORE, the article "Elections" was taken from the table.

On motion of Mr. McLEOD, the article "Mode of amending and revising the constitution" was taken from the table.

On motion of Mr. REDFIELD, the article "State Officers" was taken from the table.

On motion of Mr. RIX ROBINSON, the article "County Officers and County Government" was taken from the table.

Mr. HANSCOM—I hold in my hand a series of resolutions relating to a subject of much importance. They are merely resolutions of inquiry. I offer them for the purpose of calling the attention of the Convention to a matter which I think of the highest importance to the people of this State. They are as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on "the Judicial and Governmental policy of the upper peninsula" of the State, be requested to inquire into the expediency and practicability of a separation of said peninsula for purposes of government, and the formation of the upper peninsula into a territorial government, with reference to its ultimate admission into the Union as one of the States: Provided, That the assent of the people of this State and of Congress can be obtained.

Resolved, That if in the judgment of said committee such separation is expedient and practicable, some plan be submitted to the Convention that in the opinion of the committee may be best adapted to secure to the inhabitants of said upper peninsula a separate territorial government.

Mr. McLEOD observed that the resolutions did not propose that any definite action should be taken by the Convention on the subject embraced in them. All that was asked was simply that one of the standing committees of the Convention might examine into the subject and report back to this body; and in its judgment it might report against any definite action being taken. He had had very many opportunities of becoming acquainted with the wants and wishes of this upper country. The interests of this people were different from those of the lower peninsula. They were discontented, and desired to place before the Convention the reasons why they were discontented; so that such measures might be taken as would alleviate and remove all causes of complaint and ill feeling. It was a mere matter of inquiry in effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS hoped the resolutions would be laid on the table. For his own part he was hardly prepared to take into consideration a project to dismember a portion of the State, nor were the people either. The Convention was sent here for no such purpose—it was sent here to prepare a constitution for the State of Michigan, and not to change its boundaries in any manner, or dispose of its territory. He hoped that the consideration would not be pressed at present.

Mr. McLEOD remarked that it was but a mere inquiry; or, in other words, it was a formal mode of obtaining a communication of facts which could not otherwise be had.

Mr. WITHERELL moved that the resolutions be laid on the table. Carried.

The Convention then proceeded to the order of the day, and took up the article entitled "Mode of amending and revising the Constitution."

Mr. J. BARTOW offered the following as a substitute for section 1:

"Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in the Senate or House of Representatives; and if the same shall be agreed to by two-thirds of the members elected to the two Houses, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their journals respectively, with the yeas and nays taken thereon; and shall be submitted to the people at such time and in such manner as the Legislature may provide. And if the people shall ratify and approve such amendment or amendments by a majority of the electors qualified to vote for members of the Legislature voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall become part of this constitution."

This substitute (said Mr. B.) was offered because it was very evident that there was a necessity for such a provision. And it was offered for the further reason that it must be apparent the section presented in the article was drawn with reference to annual sessions of the Legislature. The Convention subsequently adopted the biennial system, and it consequently seemed very expedient to him that some mode other than the one set forth in this article be adopted to amend the constitution. Because, if we pursued the mode pointed out in the original article, six years might elapse—four must—between proposing an amendment to the constitution and carrying it into effect. Four years must elapse, at any rate, and six might; for after the amendment had been voted upon at two sessions of the Legislature, it might require the action of another. He thought that the substitute he had presented would cover the ground. The proposition to amend was to be submitted to one Legislature, and they, by a two-thirds vote, were to ratify it; and then it was to be submitted to the people to be voted upon by them. He conceived that there could not be any question as to the correctness of the principle involved in an amendment to the constitution when it had been voted upon by the Legislature and the people.

Mr. BAGG—I partly agree with the gentleman from Genesee, [Mr. J. BARROW.] I think we ought not to put off the matter for six years. I would suggest to strike out "fifteenth" in the second section, and insert "tenth." I would prefer, perhaps, to have a majority instead of "two-thirds," considering the innovations that have been made in the organic law here. I want to get at this constitution in ten years again, if I should happen to live.

Mr. McLEOD—The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. BAGG] is riding the wrong horse. He is going off "at half cock." (Laughter.)

Mr. BAGG—By striking it out in advance, it will be just as well.

Mr. McLEOD—As I understand the mode of amendment under the old constitution, it is this: when any amendment was proposed, the Legislature proposing resolved on it, the assent of the majority being required to be given by yeas and nays. The next Legislature took it up and two-thirds of that Legislature had to endorse the proposition of the previous Legislature, and if they did so the question was then submitted to the people. Now, as the gentleman from Genesee says, this first article was drawn in reference to annual sessions. I see a difficulty in regard to the matter since the Convention decided upon biennial sessions. I think that it would be better to adopt the proposition of the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE moved to insert after the word "people," the words "before the next ensuing legislature;" which was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon Mr. Barrow's substitute, it was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL, the words "decided by" were stricken out of section 2, line 3, and the words "submitted to" were inserted.

Mr. BAGG moved to amend section 2 by striking out the words "sixty-five" in the first line, "fifteenth year" in the second line, and the word "also" in the same line.

Mr. McLEOD remarked that when the article was being drawn up, he found some members of the committee in favor of ten years, and some favored twenty years. They thought it better, however, to take a medium course and say fifteen years. The committee thought that an appropriate period, and one more adapted to the growing exigencies of the State.

Mr. BAGG—I think ten years would be sufficient; for, within the last ten years, such has been the rapid improvement in the mechanical arts, the scientific professions, the electric telegraph, together with California coming into the Union, &c., that in my opinion, this period would be the best. And another reason: because these things must necessarily, within the next ten years, revolutionize not only this whole nation, but the entire world. I held that in the next ten years we are going to have an improvement much greater than we have already had in the science of government and the condition of society. I believe that fifteen years is too long a period for us in this Peninsula State to wait to alter our constitution. I believe that we shall have to alter it in five years, in view of the social revolution which is about to take place throughout the civilized world; for in truth I conceive that California with her gold, and situated as she is for commerce, is going to revolutionize the world, in a pecuniary point of view. I do hope we shall not have to wait fifteen years for a revision of our constitution. I think it is known to my democratic friends that we have got things in this instrument that will alter the whole political aspect of this peninsula—that the majority will change;—and I say here, that I believe these things are going to bring our democratic noses to the grind-stone. It is reasonable then that the time at which this instrument is to be revised, should not be protracted to such a length. This is the first time that I have been in a deliberative body, but I have a judgment of my own; and what I have said is the result of my best judgment.

Mr. WALKER—I wish to give another reason for striking out this number, (fifteenth,) but a different one. In the year 1865 there will be no election, for we have settled in the Legislative Article that the first election under this constitution shall be in 1852. Fifteen years from that time there will be no election.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to strike out "five," in the first line, and insert "six;" also strike out "fifteenth," in the second line, and insert "sixteenth" in lieu.

The question was then taken on Mr. BAGG's amendment, and was disagreed to.

The question recurring on Mr. J. D. PIERCE's amendment, the same was adopted.

Mr. RAYNALE offered the following substitute for section 2:

"If at any time two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives shall think it necessary to revise or change this entire constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next election for members of the Legislature to vote for or against a convention; and if it shall appear that a majority of the electors voting at such election have voted in favor of calling a convention, the Legislature shall at its next session provide by law for calling a Convention to be holden within six months after the passage of such law; and such convention shall consist of a number of members not less than that of both branches of the Legislature."

Mr. ALVORD offered the following as a substitute for the substitute:

"If at any time the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend or revise this constitution, they shall provide by law for a vote of the people for or against a convention, at the next ensuing election for members of the Legislature. In case a majority of the people vote for a convention, said Legislature shall provide for an election of delegates to a convention, to be held within six months after a vote of the people in favor thereof."

Which was not adopted.

The question then recurring upon Mr. RAYNALE's substitute, the same was disagreed to.

The article was then ordered to a third reading.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the article entitled "Elections."

The question being on concurring in the amendments made in committee of the whole,

Mr. BRITAIN observed that there was an important omission which he proposed to remedy by the following, as an amendment to the amendment reported from the committee:

"And for depriving every person who shall make, or become directly or indirectly interested in, any bet or wager depending upon the result of any election, from the right of voting at such election."

Mr. CHAPEL moved to amend Mr. BRITAIN's amendment by adding "and also all persons intoxicated." In his opinion any man who was drunk was not qualified to vote at an election. He thought it reasonable to exclude from voting any man who was not in his right senses.

Mr. BAGG—I wish to suggest an amendment; to add “and all persons who shall get a man drunk.” (Much laughter.)

Mr. BRITAIN—The subject needs a little explanation, which I did not notice at first. The committee struck out the original section, because it was thought not right to deprive a man forever of the right of voting, by reason of his being interested in a wager on one election. My amendment does not deprive a man forever, and indeed I had expected that it would not meet with any opposition here. The amendment of the gentleman from Maccomb [Mr. CHAPEL] shows me that there will be some opposition to it. Persons who have seen the consequences of betting on elections must see the necessity of my proposition. It is not requisite that I should enter into any detail of the evils resulting from this custom. All I desire is that there should be this wholesome and salutary rule; for it is well known individuals who are estimated as important personages in society, are constantly engaged in this description of betting; and it is not to be supposed that they would be any the less scrupulous in advancing their interests in that respect than in any other.

Mr. KINGSLEY—How are you to know whether a man has bet or not; and if he has voted, what is the penalty?

Mr. BRITAIN—We do not expect to punish a crime which we cannot find out.

Mr. WALKER—I am opposed to this amendment, for this reason: I believe if this provision were adopted, and the Legislature should carry out the principle involved in it, my friend from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN,] or other gentlemen, (if they so desired,) would be enabled by making small bets before an election to disarm his political opponents. In regard to the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. CHAPEL,] I do think that instead of keeping the people sober at the polls, it will have the contrary effect. It might enable men to impose a fraud upon voters. I certainly do not wish to have the penalty of betting or being intoxicated a forfeiture of the right of voting.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE inquired what the use of the section was, reading as it did: “laws may be passed, &c.” We might as well say laws may be passed to punish murder. If the section were stricken out it would leave the Legislature in the same position. I would suggest to strike it out.

Mr. WHITTEMORE—If you strike it out you can have my vote.

Mr. WITHERELL was opposed to the amendment, simply because it was impracticable. He had heard many temperance lecturers talk upon the subject, and they entirely differed in opinion as to the time when a man was intoxicated. If we could fix a sliding scale by which we could tell when a man was drunk, and when he was not, he would go for it. He would not be willing to throw into the hands of the canvassers or inspectors of the election the power to say when a man was drunk or when he was not. If this power were put into the hands of some people, there would be among them some who would say a man was drunk if he had drunk anything. Then, on the other hand, there were others who would say a man was not drunk, if he was able to walk up to the polls and put his ticket in the ballot-box. It appeared to him to be a very difficult question to determine correctly.

In regard to betting on elections, he would say that he was in favor of the proposition, for he had seen the evils resulting from this practice. He had seen men win $1,000 by the result of an election; and in many instances this betting had influenced persons very much in their endeavors to secure the election to their party—and not always perhaps by fair means.

Mr. McLEOD observed that it would be seen every person over 21 years of age would have the right to vote according to the provisions already adopted. The Legislature would consequently have no right to exclude a man unless we gave them the power to do so. So much in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE.]

Mr. BUSH remarked that the amendments proposed were unnecessary. There was an impracticability attendant on the first which he considered manifestly obvious. It would be extremely difficult to secure a board of censors who could accurately determine as to when a man was intoxicated, and when he was not. In regard to betting, it was a well settled principle that bets could not be recovered at law. The only obligation to pay a bet was one of honor. In fact, he himself sometimes bet, and did so with a legal gentleman of some note in this State, Mr. B——, of Ypsilanti, (laughter,) but when he lost he invariably paid up. In some cases, however, parties losing bets did not meet the obligation.

Mr. EATON said it was correctly remarked that persons did not always pay the money which they had lost at betting, and it could not be recovered at law. But it was well known that people gave notes payable when such a man was elected, and such notes were collectible; so it had been decided by the legal tribunals. On the whole, he was in favor of the proposition.

Mr. BAGG thought the amendment ought to be adopted. He was a "burnt child." (Laughter.) The trouble was this, there were men of two kinds—the man of honor, and the dishonorable man. He had often won at betting, and had also lost over a thousand dollars by betting, but in every instance he paid up to the last cent. As the question was between honor and dishonor, he was not in favor of having the honorable man brought into difficulty; for in moments of excitement he might bet with dishonorable men and suffer.

Mr. CORNELL hoped that every gentleman would give his "experience." (Laughter.)

Mr. COMSTOCK trusted that the amendment of the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] would prevail. The object of it, as he understood, was to guard the purity of elections. It was well known that those who bet on elections became pecuniarily interested therein, and used all their influence to make their friends interested in them too. It was also well known that this practice went to impair the purity intended to be guarantied and guarded in our elections. He hoped, then, that the morality and good of the people would induce this Convention to support the amendment to which he had referred.

Mr. CHAPEL said—We had been told time and again that drunkenness was the worst evil in the world—that it did the most injury, and that greater miseries resulted from it than from any other one cause. We were called upon by temperance men to put our mark on it; and we had been admonished that we could not do one thing more calculated to do good to our country than to make drunkenness as disreputable as possible. If a man was to be deprived of his vote for betting a sixpence on an election, it looked strange that temperance men should vote against his amendment to exclude a drunken man from voting—a man who did not know whether he was voting a whig or a democratic ticket. This course was manifestly inconsistent with their professions.

Mr. MASON expressed himself as being in favor of the amendment presented by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. CHAPEL.] It was the practice in our courts of justice, when a witness came upon the stand, that the court would not permit him to be sworn, if drunk, or non compos mentis. If that were the case, as applicable to the rendition of testimony, was it not equally important for a man when called upon to exercise that great right—the right of suffrage—that he should come up to the polls sober? He had known many voters scared from the polls by men infuriated by liquor. There was no difficulty, in his opinion, in deciding when a man was so intoxicated as to be wholly under the control of the party seeking to obtain his vote; that he was incapable of casting a vote understandingly. It certainly could not be a privilege to a sober man to vote, if his vote could be counteracted by a man who did not know what he was doing, through the influence of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. BRITAIN had leave to withdraw his amendment, as he did not desire to have the amendment of the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. CHAPEL,] injured by the connection.

Mr. MOORE would renew the amendment. He thought it a very wholesome provision. He had supposed at first that the amendment of the gentleman from Macomb was offered for the purpose of killing the former amendment, [Mr. BRITAIN'S;] but he now saw that the Convention was inclined to adopt it. He would be sorry to see any disposition to cut off or keep out a wholesome provision, such as the one proposed, purporting to preserve the purity of the elective franchise. The elective franchise was one of the most important rights we possessed, and was one which lay at the foundation of our institutions. The section, when first reported by the committee, went a great deal farther than this provision; but the Convention thought the penalty imposed too high, and struck it out. The Convention, however, in his opinion, should not take less high ground in relation to the preservation of the purity of elections than was taken in the State of New York. He thought the amendment should pass, and would renew the motion of the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN.]

Mr. ROBERTSON differed somewhat in his views in regard to this question with gentlemen who had spoken. He was ready upon every occasion, and in all cases, to uphold the moral purity of the exercise of the elective franchise in this State. He believed that there was another mode by which this evil could be reached—that public sentiment could reach this in the same manner as it did other social or political evils. If he had any choice in this matter, he should prefer the proposition of the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. CHAPEL,] to any other. He would vote for his proposition. The greater evil of the two, in his opinion, was intoxication. When a man came to the polls in a state of intoxication, he had lost all that principle which ought to govern him in casting his vote at an election. In regard to ascertaining when a man would come within the rule there was some difficulty. He did not see how a medium was to be arrived at; or how the inspectors could form their judgment, whether a man presenting his vote was sufficiently sober as to vote understandingly, or intoxicated so as to be incapacitated. The difficulty would be in drawing this nice line of demarkation.

He had seen men intoxicated, not by whiskey. He had seen both whigs and democrats go to the polls intoxicated, not by the operation of rum, but by a spirit of fanaticism—of extreme party feeling. So, intoxication did not arise from the use of alcohol merely. In regard to betting, a case like this might readily occur: some young men might be talking about an election shortly to come off, and bet perhaps some cigars or a supper upon the result of it; a person might overhear them, and go to the polls and have their votes rejected—on what ground? On the ground that they were interested in the result of the election, viz: they had bet a few cigars, or an oyster supper!

There are (said Mr. R.) far greater sins than that of betting at elections; yet which are unnoticed by legislative or constitutional provision. There are very many greater instances of moral turpitude at present existing, than this one here complained of. But merely because the constitution of the State of New York contains a similar provision to the one now proposed, for that reason we are to insert it here! Betting is wrong, I admit; but I conceive it should not cut us off from voting for the candidate of our choice. It never induced improper effects that I know of. I have before now bet a dozen oysters on an election, and I am certain nothing evil resulted from it. I certainly did not bribe men to vote on my side, because I had a bet of some oysters depending. (Laughter.)

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman amend his proposition by inserting “and manufacturers and venders of intoxicating liquors?”

Mr. CHAPEL—I accept of the suggestion, and amend my proposition accordingly.

Mr. BRITAIN contended that the experience of every gentleman would demonstrate that there was much of evil resulting from the practice of betting upon elections. He believed that men used this in the same manner as they would any other method for the advancement of their own interests. In regard to a bet for cigars, &c., &c., which was adverted to by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] he would ask what gave rise to the practice? Because persons in honorable stations in life had gone into this practice of betting, and made it fashionable; instead of being treated with reprehension, it obtained commendation, and so recommended itself to the young.

If a brand be put upon this custom by constitutional provision, it is to be presumed that every man will know the effect of making bets upon an election.

Mr. BUSH inquired how the proposed provision could reach a man who voted at 9 o'clock, A. M., and then made bets upon the result of the election during the remainder of the day.

Mr. BRITAIN did not desire, as he before remarked, to punish crimes which we could not discover. This provision would prevent that open, brow-beating betting that went on for a month previous to an election, and which did much in influencing the result. The amount of betting carried on after the polls were opened was very small in comparison with that which took place previously.

Mr. WITHERELL observed that when a man approached the polls, it was for the purpose, of course, of casting his vote. Who, then, was to determine as to his sobriety—the board of inspectors? Certainly; but were they to do it by a personal examination? Without doubt that could not be carried into effect in many cases. Or must it be done by receiving proof? Then, if so, it must be upon the oath of the man himself; and the drunker he was, the harder would he swear; and the probability was that it would be as at present—whoever swore would be admitted to vote. In truth, he saw no practicable method of determining this matter, and would therefore vote against the proposition.

In regard to betting, he entertained a different opinion. If a man were challenged, he was asked if he were interested in the result of the election by any bet or wager; and if he answered in the affirmative, he excluded himself on his own oath. However, on the other hand, if he swore in the negative, yet had made a bet, he committed a crime punishable by law. Not so with the drunken man, who might swear he was sober—his reason was overthrown, and he did not know what he was doing. As to the moral effect of such a provision, he thought it would prevent open betting on elections. And he would remark, in relation to what had been observed by the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH,] as to a man making bets after he had voted, that it struck him the people would see there was a trap laid for them by a man pursuing such a course. He was in favor of this amendment, and hoped the gentleman would withdraw his modification, relative to "persons manufacturing and vending spirituous liquors."

Mr. RAYNALE was not in favor of making the elective franchise a weapon to secure the punishment of crimes. It seemed to him as improper to tamper with the rights of the people upon this highly important subject. He would vote against the amendment and offer the following at the proper time: "Laws may be passed, excluding from the right of suffrage all persons not of sound mind, or otherwise disqualified by a disordered understanding." That was sufficient on the subject, in his judgment. He hoped that the amendments would be voted down, and the elective franchise left free.

Mr. BAGG suggested it would be better that the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. CHAPEL,] withdraw his proposition, so the other amendment could be voted upon directly.

Mr. CHAPEL remarked that he knew instances where a man (if the amendment of Mr. BRITAIN were adopted) could disfranchise a hundred men, by betting to the amount of a hundred dollars; say a dollar or so with each. How easy was it now for a man to go into the city of Detroit and bet in that manner, and then challenge the votes of the men with whom he had bet. It was an open door for fraud, and he hoped the Convention would vote the whole thing down.

Mr. BRITAIN said that his proposition gave the Legislature the right to make such provision as they might consider necessary. The amendment of the gentleman from Macomb was offered for the purpose of killing the proposition made by himself, [Mr. B.] He hoped the Convention would indulge him with the ayes and noes.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG thought that when any gentleman made a proposition, he ought to have credit for sincerity of purpose, particularly when it had been supported in the eloquent manner in which the proposition of the gentleman from Macomb had. If liquor stole away men's brains, then they certainly were disqualified from voting. He thought that the provision as it now stood covered the whole ground. No one could contend that a man who was drunk was qualified to discharge the ordinary duties of life, still less, however, to perform the important duties of the elective franchise. But he was in favor of both amendments, and should like to see them prevail.

Mr. BACKUS expressed himself as being in favor of both propositions, and would most cheerfully vote for them.

Mr. CHAPEL said he was obliged to his friend from Wayne, [Mr. ALVORD,] for the suggestion he had given him. Time and again it was said here "that a manufacturer of ardent spirits was worse than a murderer." Then in order that gentlemen be consistent, why not exclude from voting the man whom they think "worse than a murderer?"

Mr. WALKER—Cannot the purity of elections be preserved without enforcing this doctrine of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth?" If a man have forfeited a fine of five dollars, he has a right to a trial by jury. Well, then, on this important question, when a man is declared to have forfeited his right to vote, who is to decide it—a jury? No: but a partizan board; and we have seen the time when they were intoxicated; not perhaps by liquor, but by extreme party spirit. I must protest against this depriving any man of his right to vote upon the determination of a tribunal of that character. You say a man shall have a right to a trial by jury before he shall forfeit one dollar; and yet you regard this right of suffrage as a more trivial right! You take it away without a man having the same right to enforce his privilege that he would have to defend himself from the imposition of a fine of five dollars! It is within the power of the Legislature, and it would be both right and moral that they should do so—impose heavy penalties upon the sale of ardent spirits on the day of election—on the sale of or giving it to electors. And it would be equally proper to provide for penalties in regard to bets. Let the Legislature say that men making bets upon the result of an election shall forfeit three or four times the amount of the bet. Such would be the proper mode, in my opinion, to preserve the purity of elections; and not to leave it in the power of a partizan board to wrench this great right from an elector, at their own option. I have seen partizan boards determine upon men's rights; and I have seen men deprive others of the right of suffrage, acting as they did under an excitement induced by the intensity of their party predilections.

Mr. WHIPPLE demanded a division of the question; but by request withdrew the same.

Mr. BACKUS renewed the call.

Mr. WOODMAN would like to have the amendment modified so as to read: "intoxicated at the time of offering his vote."

Mr. BAGG—I should desire to have the proposition modified somewhat. It does not define whether the person is to be intoxicated with rum, strychnine, opium or quinine. (Laughter.) I am serious in this matter; and I do not wish to give my nay against this proposition, without presenting my reasons. It is foggy with regard to the drug that produces the "intoxication;" and it is foggy in regard to the tribunal which is to decide as to a man's sobriety or "intoxication." For, I have seen the board of canvassers drunker than the "outsiders," (laughter;) and that is surely not the tribunal adapted to test the "intoxication" produced by alcohol, strychnine, opium, or any other exciting agent. For these reasons, I shall give my vote against the proposition.

The question recurring upon the first part of the amendment presented by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. CHAPEL,] a division having been demanded, the yeas and nays were ordered on the same, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Backus, H. Bartow, Butterfield, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hart, Lovell, Mason, McLeod, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, N. Pierce, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Sturgis, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Willard—29.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Edmunds, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Lee, Marvin, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, O'Brien, Raynale, Redfield, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Walker, Warden, Wells, Williams, Witherell, Woodman, President—57.

So the question was not sustained.

The question then turned upon the adoption of the second part of the amendment, which was lost.

Mr. BUSH moved to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. MOORE,] by adding thereto the following: "And any person who shall be a candidate for an office of profit at such election."

The gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN,] in introducing the amendment which he afterwards withdrew, based his argument upon the fact that men who were interested in the result of an election, would make extraordinary efforts to secure the election of that party in which they felt an interest. He would ask, then, would not a candidate for an important office make as extraordinary efforts? Would not the result of an election be as deeply interesting to him as to the man who may have made some small bet upon the contest? If we disfranchised many voters by the principle sought to be established, for merely betting; it was certainly no more than fair that it should include those who were most directly interested in the election. If there be evils existing in relation to those matters, pass laws which would correct them; but do not, in an endeavor to rectify an abuse, strike at the very foundation of our elective franchise. For, while gentlemen were striving to remedy one evil, they were doing another almost irremediable. We might place statute upon statute, but unless our laws were sanctioned by public opinion, they proved a mere dead letter; and they never would be made use of but by the vicious, to pervert them from the purposes for which they were originally designed. That was the experience of this State, and of every other community; there was no such thing as enforcing a law which was not sustained by the popular will. He believed the consequences of engrafting the proposition of the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. MOORE,] would be disastrous, and would have a tendency to vitiate the elective franchise; it could not promote its purity.

Mr. HANSCOM—I would go for the proposition of the gentleman if he will insert before the word "candidate" the word "stump." (Laughter.)

After some few observations from Messrs. BRITAIN and CHAPEL, Mr. BUSH had leave to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CHURCH proposed to amend the pending amendment by adding "nor any person holding an office of profit." The argument of the gentleman from Ingham [Mr. BUSH] had additional force in his [Mr. C.'s] opinion. If the candidates for office be interested in these matters, and likely to exercise an influence in determining the result, those in office, whose bread and butter was concerned, were much more likely to exercise a pernicious influence.

Mr. HASCALL moved the previous question; which was not sustained.

The question then turning upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] it was not sustained.

The question then recurred upon the amendment presented by the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. MOORE,] and the yeas and nays being ordered thereon, the same resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Backus, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Daniels, Eastman, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lovell, McLeod, Moore, Mowry, Orr, N. Pierce, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman, President—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Arzeno, Axford, Bush, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Dimond, Eaton, Graham, Hanscom, Hathaway, Hixon, Lee, Marvin, Mason, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, Raynale, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Wait, Walker, Wells—31.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. BUSH moved a call of the Convention, which was not ordered.

Mr. B. then moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the last amendment (Mr. MOORE's) had been adopted, and said: I am perfectly willing, sir, upon all occasions, to accede when I am well whipped; but, when there are thirty members absent, and about twenty at present in the village, and the Convention refuses to order a call of the house upon a question which involves an important principle, I deem it my duty to make one or two remarks. I believe that the vote recently taken should not be sustained by this Convention. I believe that while gentlemen who advocated and voted for the amendment have been anxious, and sincerely desirous to promote the public good, yet they have by their votes on this occasion done the very opposite. I believe also, sir, that that very vote will have in its effects a tendency to corrupt the elections of this country, and place in the hands of one, or a few men, the entire control of the result of an election in a township. They can do it, sir. One man, for instance, may make it his business to go about and make bets with forty, fifty, or a hundred of his political opponents, then he may himself forego the privilege of voting, and carefully watch the ballot box throughout the day and challenge the vote of every man with whom he has made a bet. It is manifest that the effect of this provision will be most pernicious and destructive to the purity of our elections.

I hope the Convention will allow us to have a full vote on this question, and for that purpose I ask that the last vote may be reconsidered. If the Convention decide upon retaining this provision in the constitution, I shall say no more.

Mr. MOORE did not desire to make any argument upon the question. He would only call attention to the manner in which this measure was opposed. It should strike the common sense of gentlemen that the minds of members had been entirely made up before the vote was taken—a majority of the Convention voted in favor of the proposition, and that he thought was conclusive.

Mr. CHURCH moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WILLARD moved a call of the House, which did not prevail.

Mr. BUSH then withdrew his motion to reconsider.

The question being on concurring in the amendment made in committee of the whole as amended,

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out and substitute therefor the following:

“Laws may be passed excluding from the right of suffrage all persons not of sound mind, or otherwise disqualified by a disordered understanding.”

Mr. CRARY was opposed to the amendment to the amendment. He was opposed also to the whole section, even as amended by the Convention, with all due deference to that body. The substitute just presented, proposed, as he took it, to exclude from voting persons non compos mentis, and not possessed of an ordinary understanding. There were provisions in the constitutions of some States going to that extent. But such a provision gave too much power to the persons inspecting the ballot box; it devolved upon them the province of deciding whether a man presenting himself as an elector, was of sound mind, or not of sound mind. Now a man might be of sound mind in very many particulars, and be insane in others. He might be, for instance, in but one particular demented, and perfectly sane upon all other matters, and entirely capable of exercising his right of voting with discrimination. But, if we adopted the provision which was proposed, we gave the persons inspecting the ballot box the power to reject a man because of his unsoundness of mind; in fact we would give them a power more despotic than was ever established in any country, and a power that would be exercised to the detriment of the public weal. There were but very few non compos or disqualified by understanding amongst us; and if they be permitted to vote, scarcely any injury would accrue to the community therefrom. The cases to which the proposition had reference were so very few and rare that the subject hardly demanded the attention of the Convention.

In relation to betting at elections, he would here remark that this subject had not occupied attention at the time when the first Convention was held. Since that period, however, the matter had excited much public notice; and in the State of N. Y. it had called for the interposition of the fundamental law, and power was given to the Legislature of that State to pass laws to restrict betting. The same power was proposed to be given here.

He was opposed entirely to the original amendment made by the committee of the whole, because it did not comport with the spirit of the age; it did not come up to the character of this constitution, if there had been any advance upon the past; or to any advance which might be claimed for the future. The amendment said in effect that a man who had been guilty of a burglary, or a larceny, because he had been guilty of that act, and had been punished by the law of the land, must be forever disqualified from being one of our citizens! By such a proposition in the fundamental law, we asserted that those individuals who had been sent to the penitentiary, and there reformed and made good citizens, should have a constitutional provision hanging over them during the remainder of their life, however well they might conduct themselves—however good citizens of the community they might become, yet we were to affix this stigma upon them, and say that they should not have the privilege of the elective franchise extended to them. Such was what was demanded of the Convention by this provision. But we should not allow any such provision to go out to the world with the impress of our approbation upon it. It might have answered a hundred years ago, but it was utterly inconsistent with the sentiment of the present day.

He did not desire by any means to leave in the hands of the Legislature any such power as the one here proposed to be given. He did not desire it to appear that this Convention had not come up to the spirit of the age in relation to reform in punishment; or, rather that they should go back upon past ages in this respect. The day once was when it was "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." But the object of punishment now was to reform; and having effected that, the individual was to stand in the community in the same rank as any other member of it. He was not to have the finger of scorn perpetually pointed at him by the law of the community, but most especially not by the fundamental law of the State. It was true that such was proposed to be done by the Legislature; but here was the fundamental law (if the provision were adopted) expressly giving them the power so to act. A man, suppose, was punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary; yet here you would give the Legislature the power to disfranchise him, though he might have become reformed, and one of the most moral and worthy men in the community. Because a man committed an offence once, did it follow that he must be bad forever—that after he had undergone the reformatory discipline of the prison, and had been discharged, that he must still be vicious? If so, let him be shut up in the penitentiary forever; because the provision here made was based upon the assumption that if a man had once committed an offence, therefore, he should be excluded from the ballot box! He did not purpose, however, by his vote to give the Legislature the power at any time to pass any such law.

In regard to the subject of betting there was no doubt that a great deal of evil had arisen from the practice; and, if there could be any one thing done to prevent it, it ought to be done. He thought there was a strong disposition in the Convention to endeavor to effect that object by a constitutional provision. If they were so great as to require legislation on the subject, let the Convention take action upon it, leaving out of the article the other matters to which he had referred. He believed from present indications, the majority would be in favor of some provision upon the subject; but whether it would be a wise course or not, he was unable to determine. There were laws upon the statute books at present, making individuals betting subject to punishment; however, they might not be sufficiently stringent. But he certainly hoped that the Convention would not engraft into the constitution a principle which he deemed entirely incompatible with the spirit of the age.

Mr. BAGG, in order to meet some of the views expressed by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] suggested a modification, to read in this form: "All persons who have been or may be convicted of robbery, &c., &c., and not pardoned." There had been many persons convicted of crime, and convicted wrongfully, and within a few days after their conviction we had the members of the court, the bar, and the house-holders in the vicinity signing petitions for their pardon.

Mr. CRARY—That does not meet the objection. A man, for instance, is found guilty of the crime of robbery; the law says, in the first place, he shall be punished; and then, in order to reform him, he goes into prison; and from the reform wrought upon him, every one is willing to take him by the hand and continue the work of reformation begun upon him. The difficulty would not be removed by the proposition of the gentleman, [Mr. BAGG,] in saying he is pardoned. A man may have committed a great crime, and be pardoned. He may have influential friends; and a great variety of causes may be brought to bear upon the Executive in effecting his pardon, yet notwithstanding, be a very wicked individual. If a man go into prison it is for the purpose of being reformed; why is he let out? Because the law supposes that he is reformed. And, even though he be reformed, you say he shall not go to the ballot box, for the reason that, in some unguarded moment, he has committed what is considered an infamous offence, and he is to live a disgraced life throughout the remainder of his days. Now, that is not the object of the reformers of this age. If we stand here as reformers, we certainly will allow no such provision to go into our constitution. It has been in the constitutions of some of the States, and may be put into the constitutions of others; but it ought not to be in the constitution of any State in this Union. In by-gone days it may have suited well enough, because then the reasons for which men went to prison were different from what they are now. If a man went to prison then, it was the end of him. Once sent there, he was considered to have no longer any life or character. It is not so now, however, and I hope the fundamental law of our State will not establish such a provision.

Mr. WALKER observed that in his section of the country there was an individual who had been in the State prison for an infamous crime, but was now considered to be a good and effective citizen. If this provision were adopted, this party would be prevented from voting. He had been reformed by going to prison, and it was but just that he should have the privilege of exercising the right of the elective franchise. He did not suppose it was in the power of the governor to pardon any man after he had served out the term of his imprisonment.

Mr. BAGG—I know several persons in Detroit who have been convicted of crimes in the State of New York. They are now good citizens, and are no doubt reformed of their sins, and vote at our elections. They are apparently as good citizens as are amongst us. They do not belong to the same party to which I have the honor to belong; but this provision would disfranchise them.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the section as amended, by striking out all after the words "laws may be passed" to the word "for."

Mr. HANSCOM had not designed saying anything upon the subject. He was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN.] If the section were to be adopted, it should be adopted in toto, or rejected in toto. For himself, he was entirely opposed to the whole section. He was opposed to have a solitary provision in the constitution leaving to the Legislature the power to determine upon that most important right of the people, the elective franchise.

What was proposed here? To prohibit from voting a man who may have made a bet of sixpence on an election, and those who have been convicted and punished for crime. If the Convention intended to make the elective franchise a basis of punishment for crimes, let them say so. But he thought that subject more properly belonged to the province of which his friend from Wayne [Mr. WITHERELL] was chairman, the committee on crimes and punishments. He was for leaving the Legislature powerless for inhibiting any man from the exercise of the right of suffrage. As was said by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CARY,] "for what do we send a man to the penitentiary?" That he may serve the term of imprisonment which the law imposed upon him for the commission of his offence; and also that he may be reformed, and made, as it were, a new man. Were we, then, to make in addition to that a punishment that would be perpetual—that would last for his entire life? It was wrong in principle, and wrong in fact. There was no reason to suppose that an individual who underwent imprisonment may not be made a good and moral citizen by the operation of the reformatory training which had been adopted in our prison. Why withdraw from the individual one of the great incitements to make him a worthy citizen and an honorable and respectable member of society? The entire theory was wrong. He was decidedly in favor of holding forth every inducement to such persons, that by good conduct and behavior they may become respectable citizens, and enjoy all the privileges to which the other members of the community are entitled.

Mr. DANFORTH moved to adjourn. The Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. CORNELL was opposed to the whole proposition for the reason that taking it in all its bearings, it would work more evil than good. Besides, the Legislature had the power to pass laws regulating the purity of elections without this provision.

Mr. CRARY asked the yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. BRITAIN, and the same were ordered and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Crary, Danforth, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hathaway, Hixon, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, Orr, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Walker, Warden, Wells, Willard—43.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Backus, J. Bartow, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Comstock, Cook, Cornell, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eastman, Gardiner, Gibson, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, Moore, N. Pierce, Redfield, M. Robinson, Skinner, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Witherell, Woodman, President—41.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the proposition of the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. RAYNALE.]

Mr. RAYNALE—My object in offering this substitute for the original section, is simply to give the Legislature the power to disqualify from voting persons who are insane. It is true the grievance is not very great, but still I think the Legislature should have the power to adopt measures by which the insanity of persons could be ascertained, and, if insane, deprived of the right of voting. I understand that heretofore there has been no law on the subject; and insane persons have been in the habit of going to the polls and voting. There have been several instances of the kind. That is all the restriction I wish to place on the elective franchise, after the first section of the article, and with that view I have offered this amendment.

I cannot see the necessity of making the elective franchise a weapon of punishment for crime. If this thing of betting tend to injure the community, the Legislature is at liberty to pass laws for the punishment of it, other than making the right of suffrage an instrument of punishment. I would much rather not have any provision on the subject, and would even rather have the inconvenience of insane persons voting, than such a provision.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The roll was called, and a quorum of members being in attendance,

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM,

Resolved, That the use of this House be permitted to the Rev. J. A. Baughman on Saturday evening, at half-past seven o'clock, July 20th, for the purpose of delivering an address upon the subject of temperance.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Elections."

The question being upon Mr. RAYNALE's substitute for section six as amended in committee of the whole, a division of the question was had,

And the motion to strike out the substitute proposed by the committee prevailed.

Mr. RAYNALE's proposition to insert was not agreed to.

Mr. CORNELL submitted the following as a substitute:

"Laws may be passed to preserve the purity of elections and guard against abuses of the elective franchise," which was adopted.

The question being upon concurring in the amendment of the committee as amended, a division of the question was had,

And the Convention concurred in striking out the original section, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Burns, Carr, Chapel, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hathaway, Hixon, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Town, Wait, Walker, Warden, Wells, Whipple, Willard, Woodman—54.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Axford, Backus, J. Bartow, Beeson, Asahel Brown, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Daniels, Eastman, Gardiner, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Mowry, N. Pierce, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, White, Whittemore, Williams, Witherell, President—27.

And the substitute of Mr. CORNELL was inserted.

The question being on concurring with the committee in striking out section 8,

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to amend the original section by adding to it the words "and also for preventing men from voting when they are intoxicated." He offered this modified amendment hoping it would meet the views of gentlemen as expressed this morning. His colleague [Mr. RAYNALE] said he was opposed to tampering with the elective franchise. It appeared to him [Mr. V.] that there was no more certain mode under the canopy of heaven of doing so, than by allowing a man to vote when intoxicated. The same gentleman presented the amendment excluding insane men from voting. For his part, he knew of no class of men more insane than men under the influence of liquor.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question then occurring being upon agreeing in the amendment made in committee of the whole, the same was put, and sustained.

Mr. MASON offered the following substitute for section 8:

"Laws shall be made for preventing the administration of oaths by boards of elections to persons intoxicated."

He saw most certainly a very great impropriety in administering an oath, either in a court of justice or by a board of election inspectors, to an intoxicated man. Courts of justice never did; they would not administer an oath to a man who was in such a state of intoxication as not to be able to appreciate the effect of an oath. The present constitution provided that every white inhabitant (a citizen) must be a voter; and all a party had to do was merely to take the oath, and by constitutional provision his vote could not be rejected. It seemed to him that there ought to be a judge of a man's capability of knowing the nature of that oath; for it was not reasonable to suppose that a man intoxicated would be as conscious of the obligations of that oath, as if he were sober. In his opinion, those judges should have the discretion to reject the vote of a man in such a condition, and see that the man go away and get sober before he be permitted to vote. Those living on the frontier had felt the effects of this practice very much, especially in the spring, when the license question came up. Many persons would come over from Canada, hold up their hands and take the oath; they then would go away, and no one knew where they came from or where they went.

Mr. RAYNALE moved to amend by adding the following: "And all elections shall be opened by a temperance lecture." (Loud laughter.)

Mr. MASON—If the gentleman offered this as an insult to the Convention, or merely to make the proposition which I offered odious, it may have that effect. It seems to me, however, to be better to allow the Convention to act directly on this important question. I will ask for the yeas and nays on my proposition.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the proposition of his colleague would be withdrawn. It was entirely unnecessary to fool away the time in this way. He also hoped the proposition of the gentleman from St. Clair [Mr. MASON] would be withdrawn. We might as well say that a farmer should have the right to sell wheat, as to say that an oath should not be administered to a drunken man. The Legislature had full power in regard to these matters. He hoped that these senseless propositions would be withdrawn.

Mr. RAYNALE withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MASON thought the Legislature had no authority to pass laws rejecting an oath, unless given them by the constitution. Nor could they do anything like rejecting an oath, because, this article provided that all white citizens shall have a right to vote. The board of inspectors could not act as judges of a man's intoxication, and the Legislature could not give them the power to do so, for the constitution made the man a voter.

A MEMBER—What has the administration of an oath in a court of justice to do with the elective franchise?

Mr. MASON resumed. He did not say that it had anything to do with it; but his proposition would do no harm in the constitution. He knew it was the custom again and again (and the experience of gentlemen would bear him out,) to administer the oath to individuals who, at the time, knew nothing about an oath, or the obligations they assumed.

Mr. BACKUS coincided in the views of the last speaker. He thought the gentleman's argument unanswerable.

Mr. WOODMAN was of opinion that if the constituents of the members of this Convention could look in upon the course of procedure followed here, they would conclude that it would have been better to have established a woman's school at the start. It appeared by the action of gentlemen here, that something of that kind was necessary. He was totally opposed to going into matters of detail.

The question was then taken upon the proposition of the gentleman from St. Clair, [Mr. Mason;] and the yeas and nays being ordered and had thereon, the same resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Backus, Burns, Chapel, J. Clark, Comstock, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Gardiner, Green, Hart, Mason, McLeod, Orr, N. Pierce, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Van Valkenburgh, Williams, Witherell—20.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Edmunds, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Raynale, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Walker, Warden, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Willard, Woodman, President—60.

The amendments to the resolution accompanying the article were concurred in.

Mr. STOREY moved to amend the article by striking out the last clause of section one.

Mr. ROBERTSON proposed the following substitute for the entire section:

"In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid who was permitted to vote under the provisions of the previous constitution of this State, every civilized male inhabitant of Indian descent of the age aforesaid, not a member of any tribe, who shall be a native of the United States, and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who shall have been a resident of this State on the first day of January, A. D. 1849, shall be entitled to vote at such elections: provided, that the last mentioned persons shall first declare their intentions to become citizens of the United States, pursuant to the laws thereof; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote at any such election, unless he shall have resided in this State for six months next preceding such election, nor in any township or ward unless he is an actual resident thereof."

The question being upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jackson, [Mr. Storey,] the same was put and lost.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to strike out all after the word "every," in the first line of the section, and insert the following: "Male person above the age of twenty-one years having resided in this State for six months next and immediately preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and every such voter shall be eligible to any office in the gift of the people of this State. But no such citizen or person shall be entitled to vote except in the township or ward of which he is an actual resident, and in which he has resided for ten days next preceding the day of election."

I see, sir, (said Mr. P.) that there is a great deal of feeling on this subject. This proposition will open the door wide on the elective rights. It will bring in all the men that are in this State, black, white, yellow and all.

It will also say to the north, south, east and west, come in and vote with us; and will give us all equal rights. It'll be in every respect advantageous to fill the measure of elective rights to the end. I can't see why gentlemen should be so tenacious about white people—to amend this article over and over again, and then to strike it all out. I can't see how they could make it any broader, unless they said every person wearing pantaloons shall vote. We've always said to Europe "come in." Now I say come in Europe, Asia, Africa, America, South America, and all the islands all round the globe. Let them all come in, and make officers of them. They're good enough to vote at an election, and are consequently good enough to come in and be elected officers.

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend the original section by adding after "aforesaid," in the first line thereof, as follows:

"And white male persons of foreign birth, of the age aforesaid, who have resided in the United States two years, and shall have declared their intention to become citizens, (conformable to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization,) at least one year previous to an election, and every civilized male person of Indian blood of the age aforesaid, not a member of any tribe."

Mr. HANSCOM thought this subject had been very fully discussed in committee of the whole. It seemed to him we had talked about this matter sufficiently, and any number of propositions had been made. He would therefore move the previous question.

Mr. N. PIERCE rose to inquire if his proposition were not the first in order.

The PRESIDENT replied that it was not, as there was a substitute to the section pending.

Mr. RAYNALE hoped the call for the previous question would not be pressed. This was a very important and interesting question, and he hoped that debate would not be cut off. It was true it had been discussed to some extent in committee of the whole, but the committee did not appear to have settled on any definite plan. Since the committee sat, he understood there had been considerable change of opinion, and sentiment had become more liberal upon the subject.

The call for the previous question was withdrawn.

The question on the adoption of the amendment presented by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. MORRISON,] was put and lost.

Mr. N. PIERCE'S proposition being under consideration, on motion of Mr. WOODMAN, the word "male" was stricken out.

The question then recurring upon the substitute presented by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. ROBERTSON,]

Mr. ROBERTSON said, in offering this substitute, I believe it expresses the wishes of a majority of the people upon this subject. The provision in relation to white male citizens of the United States is the same with that, relative to white male inhabitants who are allowed to vote under the present constitution. In addition to that, there is a provision in relation to civilized Indians, not members of any tribe, and who should certainly be permitted to vote. Then there is another provision, in effect, that all white male inhabitants who "shall have been residents on the 1st of January, 1859, shall be voters, provided that they have first declared their intention to become citizens of the United States according to the laws thereof." In regard to the third provision, I think opinion will be unanimous.

It seems to me that no good objection could be urged against admitting to the polls those aliens who have come to this country to make it their home, if they be qualified as specified in the substitute. They are men identified with the interests of the State and country, and I may say, in nearly every instance, never expect to make any other place their home. They ought, I do believe, to have the right of suffrage. There are thousands of them too, coming into this State yearly, to make it their home. They are a well conducted, orderly class of men—many of them educated, and bringing money with them into our State. They are men who enquire into all the important national questions with just as much interest as the natural born citizens of the United States. My experience on many subjects does not extend to any length, but it does extend somewhat upon this. I find that this class of people have as much interest in all that relates to the greatness and prosperity of this country as those living here all their lives. Coming from a monarchical country, and learning from their youth upwards that this was "the home of the free," they are naturally inclined to inquire into and examine our mode of government; in fact, they have a more immediate interest in inquiring into it than have natural born citizens. Therefore, I am of opinion that if these strangers, or rather aliens, be permitted to vote, after the time specified in the amendment, no possible injury can accrue, but much good may result. Thus, they will become more attached to the country, and will be not only amongst us, but of us. It is proposed that they should have resided in the State on the first of January, 1849. They will, then, when this constitution goes into operation, have been two years in the State.

When this State was first organized, liberality on the score of voting was extended to all living here at the time. And, I would ask, can any gentleman put his finger at a single man who has proved unworthy of that liberality? I say that gentlemen cannot point out a single evil resulting from that generosity. I believe that many of those who participated in that generosity have become some of our very best citizens. They have nearly all become citizens under the U. S. constitution. They have filled offices of trust and honor under this our State constitution. And, as no evil has resulted from that bestowal of this privilege, it is not unreasonable to suppose that no evil will result from the further extension of a like liberality.

Mr. McLEOD moved to amend the original section by inserting after the word "citizen," in first line, the words "and civilized persons of Indian descent not members of any tribe."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to add to the original section as follows:

"The Legislature may at any time extend by law the right of suffrage to persons not herein enumerated, subject, however, to the approval of a majority of all the votes cast at a general election."

Mr. CRARY—Does the gentleman intend by this amendment to dispense with the resolution reported by the committee of the whole?

Mr. WILLIAMS replied in the negative.

The yeas and nays being ordered on Mr. WILLIAMS' amendment, were had, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, H. Bartow, Chandler, Comstock, Edmunds, Gale, Green, Hart, Hixon, Mason, Orr, N. Pierce, Sturgis, Wait, Walker, Warden, Wells, Williams—18.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Bagg, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Lee, Marvin, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, VanValkenburgh, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Willard, Woodman, President—63.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the section as follows:

After the word "citizen," in first line, insert "or inhabitant;" also strike out all after the word "election," in second line, to and including the word "aforesaid" in fifth line.

Mr. HANSCOM moved the previous question on the article, without the resolution. The call was sustained, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The same recurring first upon the amendment proposed by Mr. WALKER, it was lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Asahel Brown, Carr, Chapel, Choate, Crary, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Hathaway, Hixon, Marvin, Morrison, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Raynale, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Soule, Sturgis, Sutherland, Wait, Walker, Warden, Williams, Willard—32.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Axford, Backus, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Chandler, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eastman, Fralick, Green, Hanscom, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, McLeod, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, Redfield, Roberts, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Woodman, President—51.

The substitute of Mr. ROBERTSON for the section as amended, was then disagreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Chapel, Cook, Crary, Desnoyers, Eaton, Edmunds, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Marvin, McLeod, Morrison, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Raynale, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sutherland, Wait, Walker, Warden, Willard, President—41.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Axford, Backus, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Daniels, Dimond, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Kinne, Lovell, Moore, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, Redfield, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman—47.

The question being, "shall the article entitled 'Elections' be now read a third time?" the yeas and nays were ordered and had with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cook, Crary, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Graham, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, N. Pierce, Redfield, Roberts, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Sullivan, Town, Wait, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Willard—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Arzeno, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Alvarado Brown, Burns, Chapel, Choate, Comstock, Cornell, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hixon, Marvin, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sturgis, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, Webster, Williams, Woodman, President—31.

So the article was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. STOREY moved to strike out the resolution accompanying the article.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the resolution was amended as follows:

Insert in line 4, before "color," the word "every;" and strike out "citizen" in same line, and insert "inhabitant." Strike out all after "the," in 5th line, up to and including "1851," in the 6th line, and insert "the rights and privileges of an elector." Also, strike out of the 17th line words "after the first day of January, 1851."

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the resolution was further amended by striking out in the 15th and 16th lines the words "for and against the said separate amendment."

The question being upon the motion to strike out,

Mr. STOREY—I have simply to say that I believe no man here supposes that if this subject be given to the people to vote upon, it will be supported. There was not a single petition sent up here asking that the right of suffrage be extended to the colored race. I see no necessity whatever for this resolution.

Mr. WOODMAN—I think the gentleman is a little mistaken. My constituents ask for a resolution of this kind, and they would be very sorry to see it struck out. Let us submit it to the people to say whether or not the right of suffrage shall be extended to the colored population. I will vote against the resolution myself, when it goes go before the people. But I wish it to be laid before the people, so that they may determine the matter as they in their wisdom see best.

Mr. BAGG was in favor of the motion to strike out the resolution. He could see no good reason for retaining it. It was well known to all, that but a very small portion of the legal voters of the State would vote for negro suffrage; why then put them to the trouble, tax and excitement of a distinct ballot box? Why row one way and look another? Why not dispose of this subject before us in the same manner we do all others? Negro suffrage could never obtain in this State. Seven-eighths of the legal voters, or more, would be against trying the experiment. He would not for a moment pander to the sable subject. There was sufficient political excitement in this State without this chimerical proposition. Notwithstanding the acknowledgment of all this, it was said, and, he doubted not, believed by some of his political friends and others, that "but let the people vote upon this subject direct in this manner," and this matter would forever be put to rest. He could not agree with his friends on this subject. The people want to exercise themselves on no such thing. They will be satisfied with our direct action here, without troubling them. He had but one way of doing business, to wit—an open-handed, straight forward, up and down course. He would at once put a quietus upon this chimerical resolution, and then let the subject quietly sleep the sleep of death.

The yeas and nays being ordered on the motion to strike out, were had as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, Bagge, Beeson, Burns, Butterfield, Chapel, Crary, Graham, Hanscom, Marvin, McLeod, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Raynale, Roberts, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Storey, Sullivan, Whipple—21.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Backus, H. Bartow, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gardiner, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Morrison, Mosher, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Wells, White, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodan, President—59.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to adjourn, but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. COOK moved the previous question, but the call was not sustained.

On motion of Mr. DESNOYERS, the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, (35th day,) July 20.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BAUGHMAN.

PETITIONS.

Mr. STOREY presented the petition of Ichabod Cole, Henry Foster and 292 other citizens of Jackson county, praying the insertion of a clause in the constitution prohibiting the employment of convicts in the State Prison at those branches of mechanical labor which interfere with mechanical trades in this State. Referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

The PRESIDENT presented the petition of J. M. Cooper and 156 other citizens of Detroit, praying for an insertion of a provision in the constitution prohibiting the Legislature from passing any laws authorizing the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; also the petition of Francis Raymond and 32 others; also, Wm. A. Butler and 14 others, citizens of Detroit, praying for like objects; also, the petitions of Eliza N. Whipple and 79 others; Mrs. H. T. Backus and 203 other ladies; Mrs. W. Cole and 333 other ladies; and Mrs. D. Knight and 80 other ladies, of the city of Detroit, praying for a like prohibition. Referred to the select committee on licenses.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WITHERELL offered the following:

Resolved, That the President of this Convention shall be entitled to receive the sum of four dollars a day, and no more, for his services during the remainder of the session.

Which, on motion of Mr. HANSCOM was indefinitely postponed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Bagge, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Cook, Cornell, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, Wells, White, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Butterfield, Comstock, Crary, Danforth, Edmunds, Hixon, Mason, Newberry, N. Pierce, Wait, Witherell—11.

Mr. CHURCH gave notice that he would on Monday next introduce a resolution requiring the committee on finance and taxation to report.

Mr. CRARY gave notice that he would on Monday next, move to take up the Judicial Article and the resolution relating thereto.

Mr. KINGSLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the article "Elections" was yesterday ordered to a third reading.

Mr. J. BARTOW—We seem to be endeavoring to undo each day's proceedings by the action of the next. We are apparently laboring in vain; and I hope that there is consistency enough in this Convention to avoid this vacillating course. I trust that we shall not have to go back and travel over the same ground again. If we do, the whole subject will be again discussed, and Monday will unravel the work of Saturday.

Mr. KINGSLEY—I ask that the matter may be recommitted.

Mr. HANSCOM—I should be unwilling to be thrown again upon the sea of discussion; but still, I should like to hear every proposition. There is but one section about which there is any disagreement. I have taken one proposition from Mr. ROBERTSON to throw an additional guard, not however altering the principle. I move to commit with the following proposition, to stand as section one. The committee can report back to us forthwith; and if gentlemen have other propositions they can offer each one as a substitute.

"In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who was permitted to vote under the provisions of the previous constitution of this State, every civilized male inhabitant of Indian descent of the age aforesaid not a member of any tribe, who shall be a native of the United States, and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid who shall have been a resident of this State on the first day of January, A. D. 1850, shall be entitled to vote at such elections: Provided, That the last mentioned persons shall have declared their intentions to become citizens of the United States, pursuant to the laws thereof, at least six months next preceding such election; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote at any such election unless he shall have resided in this State for six months next preceding such election, nor in any township or ward unless he is an actual resident thereof, and shall have therein resided for ten days next preceding such election."

Mr. WILLIAMS—I don't think it is the thing for this gentleman to give the Convention his dictum—to say what this Convention shall do or shall not do. He has given us his proposition as a formula prescribed.

Mr. HANSCOM—You can offer your proposition as a substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I have a proposition which I want to stand upon its own merits.

Mr. S. CLARK—I wish to raise a question of order. Is the bill ordered to a third reading?

The CHAIR—The bill is ordered to a third reading. There is now a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HANSCOM—By the 11th rule it is a privileged question.

Mr. J. BARTOW raised a question of order, that "the article having been ordered to a third reading under a demand for the previous question, a motion to recommit with instructions, could not be entertained."

The CHAIR thinks it is in order to commit.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I take an appeal from the Chair; and I want the yeas and nays.

Mr. HANSCOM—The 11th rule provides that a motion to adjourn, lay upon the table, postpone, indefinitely postpone, commit or amend, shall be privileged questions.

Mr. J. BARTOW—Under the rule yesterday, which cut off all debate upon the motion of the very gentleman himself, all amendments except what were pending at the time the previous question was sprung, were cut off. It takes the previous question upon the whole article; it puts it out of our power to recommit with instructions; it is now not debateable. The 11th rule has no application whatever, and I insist upon it that I am correct.

Mr. COOK hoped the gentleman from Genesee would withdraw his appeal. This is a privileged motion, and takes precedence of other motions that are not privileged. I hope he will withdraw his appeal.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I will withdraw it. I have no personal feelings about the matter.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the instructions by striking out "on the first day of January, A. D. 1849," and inserting, "at the time of the adoption of this constitution."

Mr. RAYNALE offered the following substitute for the section:

"In all elections, every white male citizen, and every civilized male inhabitant of Indian descent, not a member of any tribe, above the age of twenty-one years, being a native of the United States of America, having resided in this State six months next preceding an election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, having resided in this State two years in all, and having filed his intentions to become a citizen of the United States, according to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, shall be entitled to vote at all elections; provided such inhabitants shall have resided in this State for the six months next preceding such election; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote except in the township or ward where he shall have actually resided for the ten days next preceding such election."

Mr. J. CLARK—It appears to me that this question is involving vital principles, and it is almost impossible to carry the different propositions in our minds all at once; at least I can safely say that I cannot. I therefore should be glad to have this laid upon the table, as I am anxious that this Convention should give a full, fair vote. I therefore move that this whole subject be laid upon the table, so that we can have every proposition fully, fairly, and separately before us.

The CHAIR thinks that the motion to recommit cannot be laid upon the table. The motion to reconsider can be laid upon the table. The first question to be taken is upon the proposition of the gentleman from Macomb.

Mr. WOODMAN—I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Oakland, and hope that it will not receive the sanction of the Convention. I hope it will be reconsidered for a number of considerations. I understand the resolutions go with them.

Mr. HANSCOM—No sir, the resolutions do not go with them.

Mr. WOODMAN—I want this passed by a more respectable majority than we had yesterday. There are various propositions and amendments to be made, and this motion to recommit shuts them nearly all out. I hope that it will not prevail; but that every gentleman will have an opportunity to present his proposition.

Mr. WALKER—The subject is fully opened on this matter. There is a motion to recommit with such and such instructions. I have introduced one which I think valuable, and which I shall vote for. If any gentleman has a better one, he can present it. I hope every gentleman will vote understandingly on this subject. If they do not like the first proposition, they can vote for the substitutes, or offer one.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I am going against all instructions. I wish the matter reconsidered. I wish to read the substitute that I have prepared.

(Here Mr. W. read a substitute as follows, which was ruled out of order:)

"In all elections, every male inhabitant, (excluding Indians not taxed,) of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided in this State six months, and in the township or ward ten days next preceding an election, shall be entitled to vote at such election."

It seems (said Mr. W.) that Congress has sanctioned the acts of several States which have admitted various descriptions of men, not natives, nor naturalized citizens, to all the rights of electors. Now, if gentlemen would be consistent, let them come up to the scratch, and vote for what they declaim so fluently and eloquently about, and do not put in practice. It seemed to him that there was no consistency in taking a middle course. Let the naturalization laws of the United States be the test; or let gentlemen go for universal suffrage, and admit all men to the rights of electors. Citizenship of the United States of course we cannot confer on them.

Mr. RAYNALE—Perhaps the gentleman is not aware how the constitution was formed. It was not formed by citizens; it was formed by inhabitants. By the Ordinance, when the territory had 60,000 inhabitants it had a right to become a State. This power was conferred by the United States upon the territory of Michigan; and we had no right to take away the rights of the inhabitants of Michigan; therefore we proceeded upon a just and correct principle, when we permitted all to vote who resided within the State at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

Now, it is true that there are laws of the United States that are called laws of naturalization; but these have no regard to our rights here, nor any relation to our own constitution or government. No gentleman will deny our right to decide who shall be electors in our own State. I am anxious to proceed upon correct principles. If under any circumstances aliens have the right to vote short of the period of the term of the naturalization laws of the United States, it is right under all circumstances.

I want this substitute fairly tested by this Convention. I believe if fairly understood by the Convention, that it will receive at least the sanction of a small majority, and the present article has received the support of but a small majority.

First; all citizens are entitled to vote after a six months residence. Secondly; all civilized Indians are entitled to vote. Thirdly; all white male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, who have resided two years in the State, and have filed their intentions to become citizens, shall be entitled to vote in all elections the same as other citizens of the United States.

It is fair, for it allows not only those who reside here now, but those who come hereafter the same privilege. The principle seems correct. We should adopt some uniform system; and I have no more regard for the rights of the aliens who reside here now, than I have for those who come hereafter. Their rights should be equal, and I want a correct principle laid down.

Mr. CHURCH—I shall vote for the amendment to the instructions moved by the gentleman from Macomb. If that fails, I shall vote for the instructions moved by the delegate from Oakland. Yet I hope that the motion will fail, and that the motion to reconsider and bring it fully before us will prevail.

I take this course for these reasons. By an amendment I presented yesterday, I have been instrumental in placing the article unfairly before the people, and I intended to take the first opportunity that I could get to set myself right in the matter. Yesterday I voted against the substitute proposed by the delegate from Macomb; and did so, I am free to say, against my convictions of right, for political purposes. I voted rather with reference to the interests of my party, than to the rights of the case. I followed the express wish of gentlemen upon this floor, but I did not hear their sweet voices. I find that men dodge about this chamber floor, and I am aware that it is playing with edge tools. I am not to be outdone in this race for buncombe. I shall go as far as the farthest—not only by my speech, but by my vote.

Mr. BRITAIN—I would move to postpone the whole matter, to give the Convention time to judge whether the matter had not better be reconsidered, and have an opportunity of being prepared.

Mr. J. BARTOW—Under the other proposition, I should have been in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Berrien. Although we may discuss it all day and close it up, it will be equally proper to open it again to-morrow. We have expunged the previous question, and if any gentleman chose he could move to commit the matter to the committee, and it will open the whole subject again.

Mr. BRITAIN—Perhaps members might make up their minds by Monday, as the matter will then be printed, and may do so without losing the time of the Convention. We shall lose, probably, the whole day with our present feelings, and accomplish nothing.

Mr. J. CLARK—I hope that this Convention will let this subject lie upon the table, and I trust that the good sense of this Convention will see the propriety of it. We have three different propositions before us for the consideration of the Convention. I voted the same as the gentleman from Kent, but not with the same views. I voted in favor of principles that I hold dear, and that are essential to the rights of citizens; but the proposition of the gentleman from St. Joseph has swept those views away. I see it in a new light, and I want to consider a little while to see if I am right. I cannot go with him in his dark shades. I go for the Indians, because they are natives; but I cannot fully see the bearings of all these different propositions. There is great force in the remarks of my friend from Berrien, and I wish the matter might be for the present left open.

Mr. BAGG said—Mr. President, I had not intended to have said any thing this day on this or any other subject, but I have lived almost as long as any other delegate on this floor. I almost remember black cockade times, and do distinctly remember the days of the embargo of Thomas Jefferson, previous to the war of 1812. At that time, sir, an alien had to undergo a probationary state before he could become a citizen of these United States of twenty-one years. Now it is different. How has this been brought about? Sir, the democratic party, the party of progress and of equal rights, believing that democracy was confined to no geographic lines, that no man was consulted as to the location of his birth, determined to get rid of these aristocratic features of our constitution, which smacked too much of the relics of monarchy, of Great Britain, whose yoke we had just thrown off; accordingly they went to work in the various democratic States, and passed laws in their legislatures to get up conventions to amend their constitutions. New York, I think, took the lead, and although opposed by the federalists and whigs, was successful. State after State followed the lead, until most of the old thirteen States have revised and reformed their constitutions, and among other things struck out the odious property qualification. The effect of this liberal progression in the States has had the effect to so operate on Congress as to now shorten this probationary state of the alien, before he could become a citizen, to five years. During this period I have never heard a complaint, except from the opposition, and that that the aliens in nine times in ten, were democrats. Thus the democratic party, in opposition to the federalists and whigs, have chased them from point to point, and whittled down the time already to that amount. The section now under consideration, proposes, in this State, to shorten it two years. I am in favor of the measure, and shall vote for it. I have steadily, in committee of the whole and elsewhere, voted for the most liberal provision, and shall continue to do so. I was in favor of the amendment in committee of the whole, offered by yourself, of one year. I shall now vote for this section or amendment, and if not successful, for the next most liberal which shall be offered. The progressive spirit of the age requires it—the progressive spirit of the democratic party requires it—the democracy of this State requires it, and they must have it. A large majority of the people of this State ask it and must be accommodated. The democratic party of the Union has done much for the nation and the world, in the dissemination of equal rights and liberal principles. It has much more to do. The great responsibility for weal or woe, rests upon us as a party. The Peninsular State is yet the banner State of Democracy. This Convention is a democratic Convention. On us, and us alone, rests the responsibility of making a democratic constitution. Has the small remnant of whigs and free soilers on this floor any responsibility in this matter? Not the least, except to artfully and deceptively defeat the measure. Let us then be united, and at once pass it and incorporate it in our constitution.

Mr. MORRISON—The gentleman from Kent says that he voted against his conviction of right; and, as he says that the subject of extending the right of suffrage is a ticklish one to handle in a Congressional district, I say that in any district, any county, it is a ticklish thing to handle either that or any subject contrary to a conviction of right. Then the gentleman votes so for political purposes—he is handling a ticklish subject. I view this question in another light. I consider that by extending the right of suffrage to foreigners, we are advancing the best interests of the State. We have expended thousands to induce emigrants to reside with us, and what have we effected? Wisconsin has opened her doors—she has extended to them the right of suffrage, and thousands have poured in, developing the resources and adding to the riches of the State. Thousands have gone round by the Lakes; and if you question the travellers upon the Central Railroad, they will tell you they are going to Wisconsin. If any remain, their friends in Wisconsin tell them that rights are given there that are withheld in Michigan; and at the first opportunity they leave us and take up their abode there. And we may expend money by our emigration agents, but if we persist in our narrow policy, it will have but little effect. I hope that this will be looked upon as a right, not for political purposes. If you adopt what is right, you need not fear what a political party may say. I do not support this measure for any political reasons. I seek not for political eminence; I ask it not; but because it is my conviction of right, that induces me to support this measure.

Mr. BEARDSLEY—I am an American citizen by law, although born out of the United States, and I have some experience which others may not have, owing to this circumstance; and it is my conviction that a restriction of the right of suffrage will tend to prevent emigration to this State. I agree with the gentleman from Calhoun, that a majority of the emigrants pass through this State instead of remaining in it, and the reason I believe to be that they have more privileges in other States. In some, they have the right of voting and holding offices; and if we continue to keep restrictions, we are acting injuriously to the interests of the State of Michigan. I believe that the inhabitant of a State, after he has resided six months, should have the privilege of a vote, at least in the management of the counties; and I have been informed by a member of the Convention that there are counties filled with foreigners, and they are under the necessity of being governed by four or five native citizens, and have to submit to what taxes and measures they choose to impose.

Now, sir, I cannot conceive that privileges granted to aliens can be productive of disadvantages, or that the results will be attended by the consequences that some gentlemen fear will ensue. I believe that the State of Michigan is made up to a very great extent of what may be termed aliens, and they tend more to the improvement of the country than the native citizens. The latter are more generally a trading, speculating class. The aliens clear the wilderness and make a permanent home with the intention of living always in the same place. The native may clear a portion, but as soon as he can command a good price for his farm, he is willing to sell and commence elsewhere. I consider it nothing more than fair and just that they should have the privilege of voting for those who are to impose taxes upon them and govern them. I believe that all, whether American citizens or not, are in favor of it; both are equally entitled to the benefit of the laws, and both should have equal rights with regard to the election of the law makers.

Mr. BRITAIN—I think that I was quite right in supposing that there was a wide difference of opinion in this Convention on this matter. One gentleman told us that we began with twenty-one years, but that now he thinks that five years is too much—that he will go for three, two, or one. Has he shown us what would be safe, not only for us but for our adopted citizens? We have heard something about the red republicanism of France, shutting their eyes and going it blind. But is there any evidence that she prospered under the system? Why was not France a Republic long since? Because, when she made a change, she made too great a change.

Is this Convention quite certain that the people who achieved the Independence of the United States through that protracted struggle, were prepared to give universal suffrage as we have done? They were prudent, discriminating men; they consulted the views and condition of the people; they saw how far they could prudently go, and they discriminated so wisely at least that it has perpetuated their government. But because they required a property qualification, should that be deemed proof of the necessity of its continuance? No sir: the experience of the day proves the contrary. It might have been wise for them to secure the elective franchise to persons who by the accumulation of property had given evidence that they could not be deceived. Yet, as the people became more acquainted with their civil institutions—became more qualified to perform the duties of electors, this restriction could be removed; and step by step we have done so, until we have almost reached universal suffrage, and have retained our civil institutions unimpaired.

Is not that the proper course? What would you think of the man who, standing on the brink of the precipice of Niagara, should by one step attempt to reach the valley below, instead of going regularly down the steps. Where foreigners are mixed with our citizens, they soon become acquainted with our institutions, enter into our feelings, and are qualified to protect themselves in the discharge of their various duties, and the elective franchise would be safe in their hands. But do gentlemen know that to be the case where large colonies are formed without any mixture of American population; colonies of thousands; and when they come in and settle in the way they do, giving the American citizen no access to them, and under the control of their religious protectors to so great a degree that you can have no influence with them, how can they in so short a time become acquainted with our institutions?

Is it right to give to these persons, who come without knowledge of the elective franchise, the right of suffrage until a series of years and a succession of circumstances shall qualify them for the exercise of its rights and privileges? I am not afraid to do right, or to stand up to the post of duty; but we have not only a duty to perform to ourselves, but a duty to perform to our adopted citizens; we are bound to protect the institutions under which we live; which have been gained at so great a sacrifice of life and treasure, not only to ourselves, but to the adopted citizen also, who has at so great a sacrifice left his fatherland and braved the storms of the Ocean to obtain these privileges. I have asked the foreigner, do you want us to put in the Constitution a privilege authorizing all foreigners to vote? and three out of four have said "no sir—we have applied for the privilege of becoming citizens, and if we attain it at the end of five years it is good enough for us. We are satisfied with your administration of the government, and do not want you to do anything wrong for the purpose of taking care of our immediate interests."

with the incapacity of those who do not mix with our people, to become acquainted with our institutions. It has been stated that the restriction of the right of suffrage is the cause of the bulk of the emigrants going through the State. Sir, is this so? Michigan has the most flourishing foreign colonies found in the western States at the present time, at least of Germans and Hollanders.

I admit that many go through the State, but I would ask gentlemen if there are not more ways than one to account for it? Where is the interest of the shipping and forwarding business with regard to this matter? Is it in retaining the foreigner in Michigan? Is it in telling them that Michigan is the best State? No sir. Because they lose a part of the profit of carrying if they do. If they go by the lakes, the lake interest wish to carry them round the lakes; if they go by the Central rail road, the rail road interests wish to carry them through Michigan. And the fact that Michigan has had so large an accession to her population from foreign countries in spite of the efforts of those extended railroads and shipping interests, should be some evidence that she may expect her share of the foreign population, without abusing her institutions by giving the foreign population improper privileges.

Mr. President, I have many friends amongst our adopted citizens, and I am certainly the friend of the adopted citizen, and ready to do anything for him, and for all of them, which can be done with safety to our own institutions. But sir, I want to Americanize him as speedily as practicable. I want to make the American system of education, the American language, American magistrates and American associations indispensable to him, because these are the only mediums through which you can extend to him the benefits of American institutions.

Sir, I would not countenance in this constitution the transplanting of a foreign colony into American soil under the jurisdiction and control of the same lords who oppressed them, and eat out their substance in their fatherland, and perpetuate this oppression, by making these same lords their American rulers, as desired by the gentleman from Macomb.

I now beg leave to call the attention of the Convention to the propriety of laying over the subject for the present, so that we may consult one another. If the gentleman from Oakland can convince me that two years is enough, I shall be happy to go with him. We cannot this morning convince one another; and although by hurrying the matter through, gentlemen may gain an advantage, yet it may be but temporary; and if permanent, it cannot, I should think, be satisfactory to the persons obtaining the triumph. Therefore, I wish the matter postponed until Tuesday. Let us consult, compare views, and come in and arrange this matter with as little detraction as possible to the time of the Convention.

Mr. HANSCOM—I hope the matter will be postponed, that we may meet again and take some common ground.

Mr. WOODMAN—I hope that it will not be postponed. I am a farmer, and we have a saying "as goes the fore part of a week so goes the rest." Now, if we commence with it on Monday, we shall spend all the week over it.

Mr. CORNELL—I hope that it may be postponed. If we settle it to-day, it might not, upon reflection, satisfy the second thought of the Convention; it might be reconsidered, and thus retard our progress. If we agree to the proposition of Mr. BRITAIN, we may meet upon Tuesday next upon common ground.

Mr. WALKER moved to postpone it to Saturday.

Mr. WOODMAN said that the committee wished to have the Eulogy upon Saturday.

Mr. AMMON BROWN—If the question is postponed, we shall have the whole question again discussed; when it comes up the whole ground will be travelled over once more. This has invariably been the case, and I hope that the question will be settled now, while it is before the mind of the Convention.

Mr. BEARDSLEY—I hope that the matter will be postponed. Whatever may be the opinion of this Convention, the people are in favor of granting all the privileges to aliens that they properly and consistently can. And I think that upon due deliberation and conversation, this Convention would be in favor of granting upon the best terms the right of suffrage to aliens, because they would be satisfied that it would be for the best interests of the State, and that a removal of the restrictions would increase our wealth and resources.

Mr. WHITE—I voted this bill to a third reading for the purpose of expediting business; but I find that gentlemen will spend the whole time discussing matters, rather than do business. If the matter, by postponement, can be arranged so that we may meet upon some common ground, I am willing to postpone; but if we expect our deliberations to close within a reasonable time, we must take more decided action. There is a great question connected with this. I am willing to go as far as I can; but it seems to me that it comes in contravention with the statute laws of the United States, to shorten in this manner the term of naturalization; and that if the question is brought up before the Supreme court of the U. S., it will be found a nullity. It appears so to me. I may be wrong, but I wish to give the matter due consideration, therefore I wish the matter postponed.

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped the subject would be reconsidered now. Experience shows that as sure as we postpone a subject, we must go into a full discussion of it again. We had the clause in the Legislative Article relative to licenses before us twice, and had both times the same almost interminable discussion. We all have business at home that requires attention, and no time to waste. Seventy of us had better be at home than here. One reason has been suggested why we should postpone this subject now, and take it up on another occasion; that members might consult together. The whole Convention—the whole hundred—are here now, and can consult. What consultation do you want elsewhere? Of half a dozen men in a private bed room, or of a caucus? He regarded the whole Convention fully as competent as half a dozen men engaged in a scrub race for popularity. For his part, he was not willing to fool away time by any postponement.

Every proposition laid before the Convention, from those embracing universal suffrage to the most partial and spurious, will meet the prejudices and opposition of some portion of us. Now he regarded the tactics on this whole matter as most unmitigated and unqualified "Buncombe." It is the cry of universal suffrage till they come to a particular class. Then they dare not meet the question. They dare not carry out the theory they profess in hostility to a prejudice.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—It is not so.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Yes, it is so. When the other gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] was speaking the other day, relative to conferring power on the Legislature to disfranchise men guilty of infamous crimes, after urging upon us that we should encourage and reform such men; what! he says, "shall the slow, unmoving finger of scorn be pointed at them?" Yes, he asked, "shall the slow, unmoving finger of scorn" be pointed at him who has violated every law, human and divine; trampled on every ordinance of society; before whose malice and brutality neither person nor property is sacred; who fires the gentleman's own dwelling, threatens his life, or commits a rape on his own daughter? Oh no. The "slow, unmoving finger of scorn" is reserved to be pointed at a man who has performed all his duties faithfully to God and man, trampled on none of the laws and institutions of society, and in fact may practice most of the virtues that adorn and dignify human nature, if such a man is guilty of "a skin not colored like his own."

The gentleman [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] who interrupted him, denied that they dare not carry out a principle in face of a prejudice. Now, if Alexander Dumas himself should come to this country—and he might be driven here by the civil commotions of the old world—and take up his residence among us, though a man endowed with such capacities, genius and eloquence that the gentleman and myself sink to insignificance in comparison to a very ordinary level; yet, towards him the "slow, unmoving finger of scorn" must be pointed, instead of the man guilty of all the brutality and atrocity, such as he had described. No. This is a mere trial to see how far each man can extend the franchise and retain his popularity without regard to principle. It is a mere scrub race for popularity, in which some of the gentlemen may find "their breeches too short."

Mr. CRARY—I have taken no part in this discussion. In the Convention that assembled fifteen years ago this month, some gentleman may recollect that I advocated the proposition that every free, white male inhabitant should have the privilege of being an elector after a residence of six months. In that Convention there was a majority in favor of that measure; but out of consideration to the feelings of a respectable minority, the majority compromised the question upon the principle now adopted in the Constitution. Since that time I have seen no reason to change the opinion I then entertained; and I did not believe that this Convention would be disposed to stop at that principle, but would be in favor of giving further privileges, as the action of the Legislature has been to invite immigration to the State. Therefore, I came prepared to vote for liberal measures, and did not think that the Convention would abide by the action of the former Convention.

I stand where I then stood—I am willing to vote for two years after a declaration of intentions; but in so declaring my intentions, I wish it distinctly understood that I am no candidate for Congress. Some ten years ago I refused to be a candidate, and still remain fixed in the determination not to be a candidate. The delegate from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] need not, therefore, give himself any trouble on my account.

I cannot go as far upon the question as the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] I cannot go his length upon the negro question. Upon this subject I think he is a monomaniac; for by his motion I take it he will give suffrage to the black and cut down upon the others.

Mr. WILLIAMS—No sir.

Mr. CRARY—Look at the proposition, and if such is not its effect I am unacquainted with the use of language.

I am (said Mr. C.) prepared to vote, and am willing to vote by yeas and nays. If gentlemen choose to postpone and consult, they can do so; but it will not change my vote. This matter, Mr. Chairman, has laid over for three weeks, and if postponed, it will have to be all gone over again, for it has been so with every other question. One thing is evident—we must act more in the spirit of compromise, or we shall see the snow fly before we get through. We were sent here to represent certain opinions, or we should not have been here. You need not talk to me about forming your opinions here; you were sent here to represent the opinions that you were supposed to entertain before you came here. Delegates who form their opinions here will be very likely to form them wrong. If they adhere to the opinions they had, they will be more likely to reflect the will of their constituents. By remaining here and forming our opinions, we may become like the Legislature of last winter, who became a public opinion to themselves, and we are in danger of falling in the same error. My opinions are known. I am well known to be an opponent to the right of suffrage to the colored race; and if instructed now, I shall consider it as a false instruction, because my constituents knew my opinions before they sent me. I could give my reasons more fully, but it is unnecessary.

Mr. BEARDSLEY—I remarked before that I had some experience of the feelings of foreigners to the United States. I know that there are a class who will come, and will be glad to receive forty, twenty, or ten acres of land, because they could never at home expect to have more than two or three. But there is a higher order, who are willing to come when they can have the same privilege they exercise at home—the right of voting and electing their own officers.

It is a principle in some foreign lands, when they emigrate, to come in colonies, to establish themselves in bodies; and there are a great many respectable individuals who have rights in their own lands which they have not here. They do not wish to scatter themselves—they are not acquainted with our ways and manners. If they can establish themselves together, and elect their own officers, they are willing to emigrate and would be contented. If that was denied, they would prefer to remain at home, although they would be subjected to tyranny and oppression.

It is said that in the course of five years they can have all the privileges of United States citizens; but although it is a short time to look back, it is a long time to look forward to. We are told by some gentlemen that we should vote to allow the negroes the right of suffrage. To that I am entirely opposed. I am willing to leave this question to the people, and have their answers through the ballot box, so that an end may be put to this vexed question. I am opposed to anything that looks like an amalgamation of the two races. The next thing asked would be to hold office; the next would be to ask our daughters for their sons and our sons for their daughters; and to that I am utterly opposed. But the foreigners will eventually be with us one people, and we should grant them the privileges asked.

Mr. KINGSLEY would inquire if the last three speakers were in order?

The CHAIR said that it was a debatable question.

Mr. AMMON BROWN thought the gentlemen had digressed, and hoped that members would be confined to the main question.

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. WALKER,

Mr. BRITAIN moved to postpone the whole subject until Tuesday next.

Mr. HATHAWAY moved to amend the above motion by striking out "Tuesday" and inserting "Friday," which did not prevail.

The question then recurring upon Mr. BRITAIN'S motion, the same was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Beardsley, Britain, Burns, J. Clark, Conner, Cornell, Crary, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Lee, McLeod, O'Brien, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Town, Van Valkenburgh, White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Arzeno, Ax-ford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, Comstock, Cook, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sullivan, Tiffany, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Wells, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman, President—63.

Mr. STURGIS moved to amend the instructions of Mr. Hanscom, by striking out

"1849," and inserting "1850;" which was accepted by Mr. HANSCOM.

Mr. WALKER then moved to strike out "first day of January, 1850;" and insert "at the time of the adoption of this constitution;" but subsequently withdrew the motion.

The question then recurred upon the substitute offered by Mr. RAYNALE.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE thought the question had been fully discussed, but he considered it his duty to explain the vote he had given against it, because it was not as liberal as the old constitution. He did not want to progress backward in political matters. He well recollected the opposition that was made on the subject at the time of the adoption of the first constitution, yet it has been sanctioned by Congress. He was in favor of the second proposition; [Mr. RAYNALE's,] and for that would record his vote.

Mr. RAYNALE moved a call of the Convention, and a call was ordered.

There were absent without leave, Messrs. P. R. ADAMS, J. BARTOW, SULLIVAN, STORREY, TIFFANY and WITHERELL.

Mr. DANFORTH moved to dispense with further proceedings under the call; but the motion did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. RAYNALE, the Sergeant-at-arms was dispatched after the absentees.

Mr. HANSCOM—I will occupy the time of the House a few moments, while the Sergeant-at-arms is engaged in bringing here the absentees.

I have an objection to the proposition of my colleague, [Mr. RAYNALE,] as it acts prospectively. The emigrants that arrive hereafter will shortly become voters. Now sir, we can act understandingly with regard to the existing state of things, we can act with safety; but we cannot do so with prospective action, because we do not know to what extent emigration will increase.

The northern counties are becoming peopled by Germans, Swiss and Dutch; and although we ought to extend to them the benefit of our laws, yet I conceive there would be an impropriety in committing to them the right of suffrage before they are acquainted with our language or institutions. It will operate unjustly; as those who reside in the northern counties have been obliged to go the usual time required by the United States law. They loose no rights, for they know that the elective franchise is withheld until they have had some training. I yield to none in liberality, but I consider the proposition dangerous until they become acquainted with our laws. Let them vote only if they have filed their intentions, for the reason that it indicates a bona fide intention to become citizens. I therefore hope that this proposition will not be adopted.

Mr. MOORE—I wish to call the attention of the House for a few moments. I cannot bring my mind to a conclusion from the arguments, that this article can be amended for the better. I am willing to extend the right of suffrage to foreigners before they are citizens, if it can be done without departing from a general law; but we must recollect that there are thousands of persons located in this State who do not speak our language—know nothing about our laws—keep aloof from us, and by their acts and conduct seem disposed to remain so, and under the command of leaders who can control their votes by thousands. They should be a sufficient time in this country to become acquainted with our laws, before they should be allowed to come and sway our elections at their will. I think that it is a dangerous precedent, to thus depart from a general principle that has been established in the older States, for the sake of accommodating a few persons scattered about the country who wish to go to Congress. And, sir, I do not think the democratic party will lose one vote by it. However, gentlemen who have been on the stool of repentance may lose by the Convention carrying out this wholesome principle that has been settled after a full discussion. There was a full discussion in committee of the whole, and it was decided by a respectable majority to retain the provision already reported by the committee. We are changing our votes every day like children, who have no mind of their own. We depart from our general principles in the district system to please a part of the community. When we do this to accommodate certain parties, and lose sight of general principles, we shall by and by find ourselves in trouble, for it will react upon the democratic party, as the other party has no responsibility. I shall vote for not recommitting the article.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—The article was ordered to a third reading by a majority of two, and I want to know if a measure of this importance should pass this Convention by so slight a majority?—

A MEMBER—Eighty-one votes, and a majority of two.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—Eighty-one votes, and a majority of two. Have any evils grown up from this liberality? How long, I would ask, is it since the people of this State invited foreigners here? If some come here not so soon as others by a day, should we shut them out? Is that the doctrine? No sir. I shall vote for the most liberal proposition—that of the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. RAYNALE.]

Mr. MOORE—My appeal was not to the minority, but to the majority.

Mr. WALKER—I feel anxious to define my position. Yesterday I offered a proposition substantially the same as the one from the gentleman from Oakland, except the two years; it required six months to enable the inhabitant to exercise the right of the elective franchise. Afterwards, the proposition of my colleague was voted down, for the purpose of having something more liberal; more liberal indeed than my own. With reference to the two now before the Convention, (Mr. HANSCOM's and Mr. RAYNALE's,) there is this difference: in one respect Mr. HANSCOM's is the most liberal; for it permits all to vote who reside here at a particular time, whether they have been here two years or not. Mr. RAYNALE's allows all who reside or may hereafter reside here, to vote at the expiration of two years, acting retrospectively and prospectively, when they shall have declared their intentions to become citizens of the United States.

I prefer Mr. RAYNALE's, for it is establishing a general rule which will give no particular advantage over those who may come hereafter. One gentleman has referred to the red republicanism of France. He must be in favor of a property qualification, as that is one of their distinctive traits.

Let us examine this subject. Many think that we are debarred by the constitution of the United States. I shall not answer the argument of the gentleman from St. Joseph, who went so far as to trample upon the very constitution of the United States. But I am satisfied that a misapprehension prevails upon this subject, both with him and others. Congress may make uniform naturalization laws; but can Congress determine who shall be electors within the States? No sir. We have determined that the officers of the State shall be citizens of the United States, and we have left to the determination of Congress who shall be legally termed such citizens. But as to who shall be qualified to vote, Congress has laid down no rules, nor undertaken to do so, except that the States shall adopt the same qualifications for electors of members of Congress as for members of the popular branch of the Legislature of the State. They have left this open to the State. Under the old confederacy, every inhabitant of a State was declared to be a citizen of every other State. That is the language, and any gentleman can examine it. No other test was required than that he should be an inhabitant, to entitle him to citizenship of the United States.

A false impression was obtained at the time this article was in committee of the whole. It was said that the inhabitant might have the privilege of voting, but he could not hold office. I defy gentlemen to point out authority for this assertion, unless this constitution prohibits them. We have in our former constitution prohibited them from becoming Governors or Senators; but we have not restricted our county or township officers in this respect, and I wish to refer to the situation of our Colonies—Colonies that are isolated, and speaking their own language. If this is so, this makes one of the strongest reasons why they should not be prohibited. Shall we leave them without government—without voters at the polls—without any individual being able to hold any office, even that of a pathmaster? Shall we send officers from the older towns to perform their duties for them? If that is their situation—if there is no native population, there would seem to be an urgent necessity that these powers shall be given. Another gentleman says they do not speak our language. This will induce them to learn it. What object have they now? They have no right to participate in the government, or use the elective franchise. Why should they express any anxiety to learn the language of a people who exclude them from all the offices of government? If you put this in your constitution, you would then offer an inducement for them to learn. It would be necessary that they should become acquainted with men and things; and this would be a proper way whereby they would become acquainted.

Again, if they don't want to learn the language, what better off will you be at the end of five years? Then they will come in, and come in with a feeling that they had been kept out while a portion had come in at a much shorter time—that they had been deprived of the rights which had been given to others. Why should we be more liberal now than at the time of the adoption of the first constitution. No evil effects from it had been felt, while if we take a backward step now, it will appear as if the measure had been an evil, when it has actually been a benefit to the State.

Mr. WILLIAMS understood the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] to say that he had avowed a willingness to violate the constitution of the United States in conferring the right of suffrage. Now, he did not mean to say, and had not said any such thing. But he would say that we were fully justified in taking the most liberal course in regard to conferring the privileges of electors on men not citizens under the naturalization laws of the United States. When first admitted into the Union, we sent a delegation to Congress, among whom was the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] and our admission was opposed by Mr. Calhoun and others, on the ground that we had created men electors and made them locally citizens of our own State in disregard of the naturalization laws. What were the merits of the case? Section 2, article 1 of the Constitution of the United States says: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." For fourteen years we have been admitted to full communion with the rest of the Union, and our right to make men electors as we pleased has remained unquestioned.

The constitution of Wisconsin makes electors of all "white persons of foreign birth, who have declared their intention to become citizens, conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization."

The constitution of Illinois says: "Every white male inhabitant of the age of twenty-one years, who may be a resident of the State at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall have the right of voting."

Thus, several of the States have determined who shall be their electors, and it is not regarded by the Congress of the United States as a violation of the principle that Congress has exclusive power to pass uniform laws of naturalization. We make men electors within our own borders—not citizens beyond our borders. We make them electors for State purposes, not citizens for national purposes. Under these circumstances he thought it perfectly competent and expedient for us to go as far as the substitute he read this morning went.

But still, if there was doubt as to the constitutionality of such a course, lapse of time and acquiescence in what was a departure from or an infringement of the constitution by the people and the courts, and the Congress of the United States, have sanctioned whatever has been done by our State, Illinois or Wisconsin. Even absolute violations of the constitution, arising from necessity, have been sustained by the country and the courts. You can find no power to purchase Louisiana, to annex Texas, or to make conquest of Mexico, if you look for an explicit grant. Mr. Jefferson, in his famous letter to Levi Lincoln, declares the purchase of Louisiana unconstitutional; and in another letter declares that his assumptions ought to be cured by an amendment of the constitution. It is becoming the settled policy of the new States to admit all residents, or nearly all, to the privileges of electors; and the whole people and the nation sanction it. Which ever State is most rigid and exclusive loses the best portion of the emigrants.

Having finished his explanation, he wished to say a word more, as to the inconsistency of gentlemen on this question. When the gentleman from Mackinac [Mr. McLEOD] moved his amendment to confer the privileges of electors on civilized persons of Indian descent, with what hot haste gentlemen ran to concede that privilege. This was thought to be popular; no prejudices to be surmounted here; but he defied any man to show a single reason for the extension of the right to this class of men which would not apply to another excluded class. Here was a decision entirely on the ground of expediency.

When the subject of education comes up, he would venture to say we shall witness the same timidity, the same shrinking for fear of crossing the popular will. All profess to want a free school system; but he doubted whether the Convention would at once boldly establish it. It was doubly necessary to do so, if the right of suffrage was extended.

—It is plain that the whole of the new States were approaching rapidly universal suffrage. He was not afraid of it. Let universal suffrage and universal education go hand and hand, and all the interests of society are safe.

Mr. J. BARTOW said that both propositions were objectionable. He should vote for the most objectionable, with a view to defeat it entirely.

The Sergeant-at-arms reported the absentees present, except Mr. P. R. ADAMS.

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the substitute of Mr. RAYNALE,

Mr. WHIPPLE moved to strike out "two years," and insert "three years."

Mr. W. said—I am in favor, sir, of adopting a liberal policy in relation to those who flee from oppression abroad, and seek an asylum in this country. I would extend to them the hand of friendship and the rites of hospitality. But, sir, our government springs from the people, who, through the ballot box, direct and control public measures. An intelligent exercise of the right of voting, necessarily implies a knowledge of the true character of that government by those for whose benefit it is established. This knowledge, I will go further and say, is necessary to the existence of our free institutions. It will hardly be contended, I think, that the foreigner who lands upon our shores can acquire enlightened views of our complex system and imbibe its true spirit in a shorter period than three years. He must first study our language before he can inform himself of our constitution and laws; of the rights they confer, and the duties they assume. I am aware, sir, with what eagerness they seek information, and how rapidly they acquire that knowledge by which they can comprehend how so much of individual freedom as they enjoy is compatible with public order; yet, I think it would be unsafe to confer upon them all the rights of citizenship without demanding a residence of three years.

In support of the amendment, I beg leave to suggest another fact which will influence the vote I am about to give. It is well known that there has been a large emigration from Germany and Holland to our State for the last three or four years, and that these emigrants have clustered together, and are not dispersed among our citizens. This circumstance is unfavorable to the acquisition of that knowledge so necessary to prepare them for an intelligent discharge of their duties as citizens. Forming distinct communities, they are not brought into frequent contact with those from whom important lessons might be acquired. Schools are established, but instruction is conveyed to their children in the language of their native country; and it is quite clear that this fact will retard their advancement in that branch of human knowledge which fits them for the enlightened discharge of their obligations as citizens.

It is also said (with how much truth I do not know,) that these colonies are guided by a distinct head, who exerts over them a controlling influence. To perpetuate this power would be the natural desire of those under whose lead they may have penetrated our trackless forests. I desire that the sway thus exercised over them by one person should be broken. Until this is accomplished, they will not and cannot feel and act like citizens of a free republic. They will yield obedience to the dictates of their chosen leader, rather than to their own sense of duty. But I will not amplify on this subject; while I would not arm them with a power which might prove disastrous to the rights of our own citizens, I would not withhold from them political rights, when I am satisfied they can be made a safe depository of those rights.

In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER,] that my proposition does not display the liberality evinced by the framers of our present constitution, I beg to say that the right to form a constitution and State government was guaranteed to the territory when it obtained a population of 60,000 "free inhabitants." This provision led the Convention to adopt the liberal policy to be found in the constitution.

Mr. BAGG said—Mr. President: I am sorry to see my friend, the Chief Justice, fall into the same category by offering this amendment with the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN.] His imagination is also chased by the ghost of the priest of the Dutch Colony. They are afraid that this Colony, if we pass this liberal provision, being under the influence of a certain priest, will go whig, and control the county to which they may be attached. These local considerations, sir, have no effect upon my judgment in these matters. General principles are my only guide. But, sir, I deny there is any danger locally, even in this point of view. These aliens, as well as all others that come to our shores, learn at home pity by oppression, liberty from restraint, and know how to prize freedom when they arrive here. They study the theory and nature of our government, its spirit and genius, long before they make the tour to this country. Many of them understand it at home better than our own native citizens, and prize it higher. It is natural to us; therefore we do not so well know its value as those who are deprived of it. I am acquainted with many Germans as well as Dutchmen, in various parts of the country, and a more liberal, warm-hearted, independent set of inhabitants don't live! They are further, at least in this country, from being ruled by any one man or set of men, than any other nation, tongue or kindred under Heaven. Prompt decision and independent judgment are their characteristics as a people. I have no fears on this score. They are naturally democratic, good feeling and liberal.

I trust the amendment to strike out two years and insert three, will not prevail. While up, I will say that the present United States law of five years operates severely on many aliens. They land upon our shores at New York, Boston or elsewhere—they stay in one State perhaps one year, then migrate to another. After having at first declared their intentions, and having been in the United States five years, they come forward in court to get their last papers. Courts in this State differ in being satisfied with testimony. While some are satisfied with one witness, others require two disinterested citizens to swear to the time, and the good character; and the gentleman from Berrien to my certain knowledge is among the latter. On casting about, the alien finds one of his witnesses resides in New York, a second in some other State, and a third in the State of Michigan. He finds, after all, he cannot prove now in court to its satisfaction but three years; although, perhaps he has been an inhabitant of the United States five years or more. Consequently he is obliged to wait one, two, or three years longer, before he can become a citizen. Sometimes the witness is dead; sometimes has removed to a distant land. Thus it operates severely on many aliens who are obliged to wait five years. I hope the amendment of the Chief Justice will not prevail.

The amendment was disagreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Axford, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Carr, Chandler, J. Clark, Comstock, Cook, Fralick, Gardiner, Mason, McLeod, Moore, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, M. Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Town, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore—28.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Chapel, Choate, Church, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Daniels, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Morrison, Mosher, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Warden, Wells, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman, President—61.

Mr. WHIPPLE moved to strike out "six months," and insert "four months."

Mr. BURNS moved to amend by inserting "three months;" which was accepted by Mr. WHIPPLE.

Mr. REDFIELD—I have found that six months works an injustice. Citizens moving in the spring cannot come within five, ten or twenty days of the time required by law to entitle them to vote in the fall; one or two months would effect this remedy, and they contain the most desirable class of voters. All, under such circumstances, should have a right to vote. I hope that the Convention will so modify it.

Mr. WITHERELL—I do not see the necessity or reason for this proposition. If that is the object, why do you not reduce it to a day, so as to catch some stray voter that may come in a day or two before election? There is a necessity for the citizen having a knowledge of the character of the man for whom he votes; and if you shorten the time, I say that you should make an actual residence at the time of voting the only qualification. The citizen who comes from New York is acquainted with our institutions; the standing and ability of the candidates for office is the reason why the law required a residence of six months. I will go so far, however, as to strike out, leaving it actual residence.

Mr. REDFIELD would go for four months; he thought that was enough.

Mr. BACKUS then called for a division of the question; and the words "six months" were stricken out.

The words "three months" were then inserted.

Mr. HANSCOM then modified his instructions to conform to the above amendment to Mr. RAYNALE's substitute.

Mr. STOREY moved to strike out "for the ten days next preceding such election."

Mr. EATON hoped it would not be stricken out; it was a safeguard against colonizing.

Motion lost.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out of the substitute, "being a native of the United States."

Mr. C. would ask Mr. RAYNALE to explain the meaning of that clause.

Mr. RAYNALE—It means the Indian tribes. I copied it from the gentleman from Mackinac, who is perfect.

Mr. CRARY—It will exclude the children of parents whose fathers have been naturalized. I want it either stricken out or applied to the Indian tribes.

Mr. RAYNALE accepted the amendment to strike out.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the substitute, and the call commenced;

When Mr. BACKUS moved to amend by adding at the end of the substitute the following: "and every such elector shall be eligible to all offices under this constitution."

Mr. B. said—The motion is supported, and I wish to give my reasons—

Mr. HANSCOM—I call the gentleman to order; the roll is partly called.

A MEMBER—It is a matter of courtesy.

Mr. BACKUS—I never assume a position without I have a right.

Mr. MASON moved that he have leave to proceed.

Mr. PIERCE—I believe—

Mr. HANSCOM called the gentleman to order.

Mr. PIERCE—I was speaking to a question of order.

Mr. HANSCOM—There is no question of order.

The CHAIR stated that the roll having been commenced, Mr. BACKUS was not in order.

Mr. MASON thought that the rule should be different—

Mr. EATON called the gentleman from St. Clair [Mr. MASON] to order.

Mr. RAYNALE's substitute was then lost by a tie vote, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Chapel, Choate, Church, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Gibson, Hixon, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McLeod, Morrison, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Sturgis, Tiffany, Walker, Warden, Whipple, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman, President—45.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Axford, Backus, J. Bartow, Beeson, Burns, Bush, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Daniels, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kinne, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Webster, Wells, White, Whittmore—45.

The question then recurring upon Mr. HANSCOM's motion to commit with instructions,

Mr. BACKUS moved to amend the instructions by adding as follows: "and every such elector shall be eligible to all offices under this constitution."

Mr. MASON moved that the Convention adjourn; which was disagreed to.

Mr. BACKUS then proceeded to debate the amendment, but gave way by request.

The Convention then adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the motion to commit with instructions, made by Mr. HANSCOM.

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. BACKUS to the instructions,

Mr. BACKUS modified his amendment so as to read as follows: "and every such elector shall be eligible to all offices in this State, at the same age and upon the same terms of residence as is prescribed in this constitution."

Mr. B. said—At the adjournment of the Convention, I was about submitting my views in support of the amendment. I have listened with attention to the various arguments and views submitted to this Convention upon the question of recommitting to a committee with positive instructions. I have listened to hear if any sentiments would accord with my own, and have heard with sorrow my worthy friend from Wayne, who will persist in presenting this matter as a party measure. I can view the matter in no such light. I can participate in no such feelings. I have come here for a widely different purpose. This Convention is assembled to form a constitution—not to listen to party harangues, whether whig or democratic. I embarked in a common cause, and my object is to carry out the greatest good to the greatest number, without any reference to a political party; and viewing it only as it will affect the highest interests, social and moral, of the State. Every member should regret allusions of this kind—this calling up spirits from the vasty deep, or any attempts to organize upon this floor a party feeling, or any attempt to make a party constitution.

But with regard to this amendment. Gentleman are willing to welcome the poor foreigner who has suffered from foreign oppression, to our shores, but have forgotten what this simple amendment is disposed to concede. They are disposed to enlarge the constituency, to break down the restrictions of the constitution of the United States; but have never thought of electing to office those of whom they make "hewers of wood and drawers of water." The gentleman is willing that they may go to the polls, put in their votes, go back to their several occupations; while he and others go off with the honor and fame of office-holders.

If consistent, you should extend to them all the offices they can vote for; to be consistent, you must do it. If he can vote for a Representative, let him be capable of being a Representative; or if he can vote for a Senator, let him be a Senator; but he may do the voting while others run away with the spoils of office.

This has been entirely forgotten. Gentlemen have spent from three to five days discussing how the constituency should be enlarged, but not one minute in removing the restrictions which prevent these persons from holding places of honor and trust; making them the servants of the office holders, who must be citizens of the United States. If you grant the right of voting, you should grant the right of office holding; and I trust that this principle will be adopted by this Convention in this constitution.

Mr. HANSCOM—I regret that my friend from Wayne should have found it necessary to introduce such an amendment. He asserts that he introduces it in good faith, and I am bound to believe his assertion; but it requires a great effort on my part to so believe it. His capacity as a legislator and man of business is so well known that it requires a great stretch of courtesy to believe the motives govern him that he assumes. What is the proposition before us? That A., B. and C. shall be electors—shall be eligible to any office. And I ask him, with all his legal activeness, is this amendment german to the matter? This can more properly be reached in the Executive Department, or the bill providing for County Officers. I will go as far as he dare go, when the matter is brought before us properly; but I am unwilling to see this lumbered up with what is designed to kill the proposition. I believe there are many—I know there are some who are unwilling that a vote should extend beyond the native born citizen. I will not charge him with that, but if he is the absolute friend of the foreigner, I ask him, in justice to them, not to bring up an amendment in an improper way.

It has been said, I believe, that it would be proper to allow them to hold township offices; but we are at present defining the rights of electors; the subject to which his amendment refers has no proper connection. Therefore, I am opposed to placing in this article his amendment.

Mr. WHIPPLE would inquire of the gentleman if every voter had not the right to be voted for, except there was a prohibition?

Mr. BACKUS would refer the Chief Justice to the constitution, which requires the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Senators and Representatives to be citizens of the United States.

The question being on the amendment,

Mr. ROBERTSON wished to explain the vote he would give.

Mr. EATON objected.

The yeas and nays being called for, the amendment was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, H. Bartow, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Cook, Crary, Danforth, Daniels, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Lee, Lovell, Mason, Morrison, Mowry, Mosher, Newberry, Orr, Raynale, Redfield, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Sullivan, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Williams, Willard, Woodman—52.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Bagg, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Choate, Conner, Cornell, Desnoyers, Dimond, Fralick, Hanscom, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinne, Marvin, McLeod, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Tiffany, Whittemore, President—29.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to amend the instructions by inserting after "State," in fourth line, "and also every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who shall have resided in the State two and a half years, and declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a call of the Convention, which was sustained; and upon calling the roll, Messrs. P. R. ADAMS, BURNS, MOORE, N. PIERCE, TOWN, and WITHERELL, were absent without leave.

Mr. WOODMAN wanted to know if this would reach Mr. P. R. ADAMS; he wanted to reach his case.

Mr. MORRISON moved to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Which was not agreed to.

Mr. EATON moved that the Sergeant-at-arms be dispatched after the absentees; which motion did not prevail.

Mr. ——— moved that the Convention adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. MASON, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. BACKUS moved to strike out all after the word "aforesaid," in Mr. J. D. PIERCE's amendment.

The object (said Mr. B.) is to allow all to vote as soon as they arrive.

Mr. ROBERTSON—The question, I believe, is upon the amendment to the amendment. When the motion of the gentleman from Wayne first came up, I voted in the negative, as I could not believe that it was done with so pure a motive. Now, the real motive is seen.

The CHAIR—The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I suspected that it was not with so pure a motive as he assumed; although of course I am willing to take his word. One reason, Mr. Chairman, which led me to make the assertion is this: on our journals we find his name recorded against every liberal proposition. We have his votes before us; and yet forsooth, we are to give him credit for all sincerity, and no party motive. Can we do so? I think not. I shall treat it with as little ceremony as others treated the proposition of my colleague, [Mr. WALKER.]

What is the proposition? That every white male inhabitant shall have the right to vote as soon as he arrives. And does the gentleman wish this to prevail, and say he offers it in good faith? We are bound to believe and say so in Convention; but out of it we can say what we think is the motive and the design. Is the design to make the constitution so odious that it will be rejected by the people? I hope that it will not prevail, as the design is so apparent.

Mr. BACKUS—My friend from Maccomb has turned prophet; otherwise he cannot divine the motive that induced me to vote yesterday. The propositions introduced here by gentlemen, are not sufficiently liberal, not sufficiently enlarged. If the intelligent foreigner, tired of oppression at home—if the Hungarian, after struggling against the Autocrat, comes here, the conclusion is, they are democratic. What need to declare their intentions? They have proved it by crossing the Ocean. We take them to our bosoms and bid them prosper; they clear our wilderness, plant orchards, raise wheat, and do what other worthy citizens do. Why does my friend from Calhoun wish to hold them in dufrance for two and a half years? This is but carrying the principle out in detail. My friend from Maccomb charges me with bad motives; says that I am not sincere; says that the records exhibit it. The records exhibit my voting against propositions that were too contracted. I propose enlarging them. I propose giving those who land here the most enlarged participation in our rights—not like some who I find wish to hold close communion.

Mr. HANSCOM would ask if the gentleman did not vote that the native born citizen should not vote except after a residence of six months.

Mr. BACKUS—That was because I wanted to have them vote immediately. I should like to know how the gentleman from Oakland can adduce proof to establish the motive. Do not these amendments speak in trumpet tones my liberality? Why did them go to a court of justice to declare their intentions? Why not establish this provision, and as soon as they land bid them welcome to the blessings of our institutions?

Mr. CRARY would like to have the gentleman explain his vote yesterday upon Mr. WALKER's proposition.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—When a gentleman's motives are as clear as the sun in the firmament, without a cloud—

A MEMBER—Order, order.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—When a gentleman puts his name in his hat, we know whose it is: I am merely supposing a case; I am making no application; I don't suppose it is necessary to make any application. I hope that this amendment will not prevail, and that this other amendment will be amended.

Mr. BACKUS called for the yeas and nays, and the same being ordered, the amendment did not prevail, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Ax-ford, Backus, Asahel Brown, Carr, Chandler, Church, Crary, Eastman, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Lovell, Mason, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, Rix Robinson, Wait, Webster, Wells, White, Williams—27.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Arzetio, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Bush, Chapel, Choate, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eaton, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Marvin, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, Whipple, Whittemore, Wil-lard, Woodman, President—59.

The question then recurring upon the amendment of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, it was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arzetio, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hart, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Raynale, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, Wells, Whipple, Williams, Willard, Woodman, President—66.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Axford, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Carr, J. Clark, Comstock, Daniels, Diamond, Fralick, Green, Hanscom, Harvey, Redfield, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Webster, White, Whittemore—24.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the Convention adopted the amendment offered by Mr. BACKUS to the instructions.

Mr. H. said—When the obvious intent is to destroy the provision, I am frank to say that I am surprised to see members of the democratic party following the lead of a whig and a free soiler. I am not afraid of my standing upon this question. I am sorry to see democrats following this lead, and I am unwilling to leave it in this shape.

Mr. WOODMAN—I hope that the motion will prevail. I cast my vote as I did for the purpose of reconsidering. I want to extend privileges, with the gentleman from Wayne, but I want them extended in the proper place; and I hope that the vote will be reconsidered, and taken upon the merits of the proposition.

Mr. CHURCH—I am about to vote for it, and in so doing I shall be sorry that I am following the lead of a whig or free-soiler. Take a township of Dutch whom you make voters, and what will you do for town officers if you deprive them of the right of holding office. From their rapidly increasing numbers they will soon fill a county, and the same difficulty will occur with county officers. If you make them voters, make them capable of holding all offices in the State. They will thus hold the town and county offices when chosen; while, if you wish to exclude them from the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor, put that prohibition in the proper article.

Mr. BACKUS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. J. CLARK—As the yeas and nays are called for, I shall be obliged to vote. It has been the practice to exclude all but the naturalized citizen even from the smallest office. As this can be reached in a more appropriate place, I shall vote against it. As there is a rakish craft, carrying a large sail, in company with us, we must put up the helm, come in the wind, and I'll be bound away she'll go, for you may depend upon it she is on a strange tack.

Mr. WOODMAN—I voted with the gentleman from Wayne upon honest principles, which I think just and proper in their place; and when gentlemen rise and accuse me of following the wake of a free-soil leader, I tell them I had rather follow a whig or a free soiler who is honest, than a partizan who is dishonest. I voted for it, and I think it is right; and I don't want to be criminated.

Mr. ROBERTSON—The gentleman from Wayne is overflowing with the milk of human kindness, at least since yesterday. We have, however, fixed upon a rule with regard to State officers. I am willing to go with the gentleman from Wayne with regard to town and county officers; but as the gentleman has a logical, subtle mind, is it, I would ask, in the proper place in this article? The gentleman from Oakland properly defined that we were settling the qualifications of the electors, not those to be elected. Although, in favor of State officers being United States citizens, yet I am ready to vote with him upon county and town offices being held by others, after declaring their intentions.

Mr. MORRISON was willing to permit township and county offices to be held by foreigners; but thought this was not the proper place. If the gentlemen from Wayne would bring it up at the right time he would support him.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend Mr. BACKUS' amendment by inserting after "State," the words "for eligibility to which, no other test is applied in this constitution."

Mr. BAKCUS was opposed to the amendment. His proposition was simple and clear, while this was vague and uncertain. Gentlemen should be disposed to allow more than they seemed willing; they were afraid to carry out the principle. They were willing to give the foreigners the small and paltry offices, and keep the others to themselves; they would give away the office of path master or that of justice of the peace, while the offices of dignity and trust would be kept out of their hands.

You give them the office of pound master, while the office of Governor you keep out of their reach.

Mr. CHAPEL—I do not think that anything more will be done to-day than talk about this matter, and I propose to say a word on the subject. I shall not look back upon the journals to see how I have voted heretofore, to endeavor to make myself consistent. I shall do what I know to be right, and I will not do what is manifestly wrong. I am disposed to be as liberal as any one towards our adopted citizens. I am willing to accord to them all just privileges; but I hold that they should take upon themselves some duties, before they are entitled to those rights. Shall we allow any person to come from Europe with all his prejudices—with his wealth; and exercise the influence that that wealth would give, in opposition to the best interests of the State? Shall we allow him to represent any portion of the State in this Hall, without requiring of him a conformity to our present rules, and an oath of allegiance to our common country? I am not willing to surrender our rights in this manner. He should at least take the oath of allegiance to the constitution of the United States, before entitled to hold high office under our State government. Is there any hardship in this? No sir; and I would ask the gentleman from Wayne why he is so remarkably anxious to insert this provision, which might defeat the constitution itself?

The gentleman's motives may be pure, but when native Americanism endeavored to form a party, in Detroit as well as elsewhere, what was sought, sir? It was to proscribe the adopted citizen who had taken out his papers according to the United States' law; and if that gentleman was opposed to it, I can only say that he is an exception to his party, for that standard of discrimination was raised and openly avowed by them. I am willing that the adopted citizen shall vote; but if any come here and do not wish to declare their intentions they ought not to hold office. I should be glad to have all vote at the adoption of our constitution who reside here, and those who come hereafter, at the end of two years; and that I think sufficiently liberal.

Mr. N. PIERCE hoped the matter would be settled. A good many foreigners voted for him, and he wished to vote for them. If we had a Dutch Governor who could not talk English, it might be a little inconvenient; but he would vote in favor of the amendment. If men were allowed to come from Europe, and allowed to vote, they ought to be voted for; and I hope that will be engrafted in the constitution through the whole article. Gentlemen talk about their liberality, and stop half way; want to deprive large numbers of the privilege of being voted for. We have heard complaints that the poor Hollanders could not vote, could not be elected to any town offices, and that some few native citizens did just what they chose—did the whole business. If there should be a good, smart man—English, French, Scotch, Irish or Dutch—he should be in favor of him being a Governor of the State.

Mr. BUSH—I have been led to think of the old maxim, "consistency is a jewel." In looking over the journals I find the gentleman voted against striking out a provision requiring a person to be of a certain age before he could be an executive officer; now he tells us that if a man has a right to vote, he has a right to be voted for. It is but a few days since he voted on this question.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I have changed my mind; "circumstances sometimes alter cases."

Mr. BUSH—I am willing to concede there has been a remarkable change lately. A motion was made to strike out the restriction of thirty years as applied to a Governor; the gentleman from Calhoun and the gentleman from Wayne both voted against striking out; yet they tell us that those who vote should always be eligible to places of trust and profit; and it is strange to see the new born zeal for the foreigners to-day, after both have steadily gone against the privileges which their interests necessarily demanded. They have continually opposed every effort that has been made to give them rights that were deemed necessary and proper.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Who?

Mr. BUSH—I referred to Mr. BACKUS and Mr. PIERCE. Mr. PIERCE declared, in his late remarks, that we were adopting a provision that would violate the laws of Congress. Sir, it is to make this constitution odious that this course is taken. I do not think that they will steal away democratic thunder. They may take all they can; they may endeavor to make some capital out of their pretended friendship, but I do not think that it will avail them any thing. They may learn that the policy that is attempted to be gained without merit, may be lost without a crime, except there is some sincerity attached to it. I am in favor of giving to every white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one, residing here, and who has declared his intentions, the privilege to vote; but I am opposed to throwing down every rule that has been considered salutary. Neither the gentleman from Calhoun or Wayne is as liberal as I wish to be, and for proof I refer them to the journal.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I have had but one principle and one policy. I am willing to go as far as the gentleman himself will go: take the word "white" out of the constitution, and make every male inhabitant eligible to all the offices. I do not expect to be a candidate myself; and for those who do there will be plenty of competition. The foreign vote must be numerous pretty soon, and yet the gentleman charges me with being illiberal, and at the same time I offer to do more than he does. I thought that one system of policy would be pursued throughout the State, yet the north have double and treble the representatives of the south. The foreigners votes are in the north; and gentlemen want to get their votes, yet not let them be candidates; and the gentleman from Ingham can stand up and say he is more liberal than I am. I would ask where it is? Let him show his faith by his works.

I wonder at gentlemen, whom we may call the fathers of the foreigners, now stopping short; if they are their rights, give it to them; do it, or don't. If you make them citizens, make them so to all intents and purposes. A Dutch Governor might do very well; our Governors have not been perfect, and he might govern so that there might be no complaint.

The question then recurring upon Mr. BACKUS' amendment,

Mr. BAGG moved a call of the Convention, which being sustained, and the roll being called, there were absent without leave, Messrs. P. R. ADAMS, ALVARADO

BROWN, BURNS, DANIELS, DESNOYERS, HIXON and KINNE.

On motion, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. BACKUS' amendment was then disagreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Axford, Backus, H. Bartow, Asahel Brown, Carr, Chandler, Church, Comstock, Cook, Crary, Eastman, Edmunds, Gale, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Lee, Lovell, Mason, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, N. Pierce, Rix Robinson, Sullivan, Wait, Webster, Wells, White, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman—34.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Chapel, Choate, J. Clark, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Hathaway, Kingsley, Marvin, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, Whipple, President—52.

The question then being upon committing with the instructions, which, as amended, were as follows:

"In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided in this State three months next preceding any election; every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who was permitted to vote under the provisions of the previous constitution of the State; and also every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who shall have resided in the State two years and a half, and declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States; and every civilized male inhabitant of Indian descent, of the age aforesaid, not a member of any tribe, who shall be a native of the United States; and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who shall have been a resident of this State on the first day of January, A. D. 1850, shall be entitled to vote at such election: Provided, The last mentioned persons shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, pursuant to the laws thereof, at least six months next preceding such election; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be enti-ted to vote at any such election, unless he shall have resided in this State three months next preceding such election, nor in any township or ward, unless he is an actual resident thereof, and shall have resided therein for ten days next preceding such election;"

The same prevailed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Baggs, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eaton, Edmunds, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, McLeod, Morrison, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, Whipple, Willard, Withereil, President—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Axford, Backus, J. Bartow, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Carr, Comstock, Daniels, Dimond, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Green, Harvey, Lovell, Mason, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, M. Robinson, Town, Wait, Webster, Wells, White, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman—31.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL, the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, (36th day,) July 22.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

REPORTS.

Mr. WHITTEMORE, from the committee on the elective franchise, to whom was referred the article entitled "Elections," with certain instructions, reported the same back amended accordingly.

Mr. WOODMAN reported: The committee appointed under the preamble and resolutions adopted in this Convention on the 15th inst., have instructed me as their chairman to make the following report: That they have conferred with and selected the Hon. H. T. BACKUS, of Wayne, who has consented to deliver an eulogy on the life and public services of General ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States. And your committee would recommend Saturday, the 27th inst., at 2 o'clock, P. M.; and would respectfully solicit the use of this Hall for the occasion.

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike out "2 o'clock," and insert "7 o'clock."

Mr. WOODMAN said it was expected by the citizens that two o'clock would be the time appointed. There would be many persons in from the country. If the amendment should be sustained, many would be debarred from attending. Mr. W. did not think that their constituency would object to the Convention giving up the use of the Hall in the afternoon on such an occasion.

The motion to strike out was lost, and the resolution was adopted.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. McLEOD offered the following:

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be appointed to draft and report as early as practicable the form of a general incorporation law, to be engrafted in the revised constitution.

Mr. McL. had but one word to say. On looking over the session laws of this year, he had found 126 acts of incorporation. Careful examination of the expense of legislating since we became a State, will show that each act and resolution costs $250, making last year $31,500. As delegates had assembled in State Caucus to stop up the leaks of the ship of State, and as there was no leak which had used up the public money as those corporation acts, he had offered this resolution for the consideration of the Convention. He thought the next Legislature would not have time to attend to this matter.

We have (said Mr. McL.) the Chief Justice and many gentlemen learned in the law among us, and I think we should have a general incorporation act engrafted in our constitution; but that it might have the consideration of the members of the Convention, he moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to amend the 34th rule by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty," so that the rule will read: "The ayes and noes may be called for by twenty members."

Mr. RAYNALE was opposed to altering the rule so as to require so large a number to call the ayes and noes. Perhaps in the hurry of business the ayes and noes might be refused when they ought to be recorded. It might be dangerous.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped it would prevail. There was no probability that any exigency will arise in which twenty members would not be found to sustain the call. The experience of the past few days must convince every member that there had been a useless waste of time by calling the ayes and noes on unimportant questions, intimating a species of captiousness in the Convention which should be checked. The rule of one-fifth was adopted in the Legislature, and was found a salutary rule. He believed that during the last two days one-third of the time had been taken up in calling the ayes and noes.

Mr. MORRISON was of opinion that, instead of losing time by calling the ayes and noes, time was saved by bringing the Convention to a decisive vote. Under the call for the ayes and noes, members endeavored to know what the question was.

Mr. KINGSLEY hoped the rule would be changed. Look at the proceedings of the last two days; he was ashamed of them. The time had been foolishly taken up. It may be proper on important questions to call the ayes and noes, but it was not proper to occupy the time by calling them on trifling questions. Who (said Mr. K.) is going to look over this lumber to see how members voted on those trifling questions? When a member calls for the ayes and noes, it should not be sustained except on important matters.

A division of the question was asked, but two-thirds not voting to strike out, the amendment did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH,

Resolved, That the committee on printing be instructed to examine into the state of the publication of the debates of this Convention, and to make arrangements, if necessary, for their earlier issue.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to amend rule 8, by striking out of the second line "one hour," and inserting "five minutes," so that the rule shall read: "No member shall speak more than twice on the same question, nor more than five minutes at any one time, without leave of the Convention, nor more than once until every member who chooses to speak shall have spoken."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to strike out "five" and insert "twenty."

Mr. COOK said it must be apparent to every member that if we go on as we have done for the last two weeks, we may have to sit here till snow time. There cannot be any subject now requiring lengthy discussion, except the resolution offered by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. Crary,] on the judiciary system; and during that it may be suspended.

The motion to strike out "five" and insert "twenty" was lost.

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out "five" and insert "ten."

Mr. ALVORD would ask what was the object of the amendment?

Mr. HANSCOM—To save time.

Mr. ALVORD—We have very few speeches over ten minutes in length. I think this is fooling away time. It will suppress all debate. What person can express his views on any important question in five minutes? It seemed like a gag law. He was not disposed to take up the time of the Convention, but he was opposed to this amendment to the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS—The time occupied by each speaker was noted by the gentleman from Berrien the other day. If he will refer to his list, he will find it was the short speeches which did the mischief.

Mr. HANSCOM—If gentlemen want to use this Convention to practice public speaking and learn to debate, it may aid them by inducing them to condense their speeches.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—My friend and colleague [Mr. HANSCOM] has occupied as much time as any one on this floor. If any one has made long speeches, he has. I have listened to them with pleasure. I hope no stopper will be put on him, but I hope he may continue to enlighten the Convention.

Mr. COOK said he would assure gentlemen that any speech over five minutes did more harm than good.

Mr. BRITAIN said that of thirty-seven speeches which he had timed, but few exceeded five minutes; there was one of eleven minutes. The one of eleven minutes was by the gentleman from Washtenaw, on an important subject.

Mr. KINGSLEY—I move that speech be struck out.

The motion to strike out "five" and insert "ten" was lost.

The yeas and nays were called for by Mr. CRARY, and the amendment to the rule was not adopted—two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend the 8th rule by striking out "one hour" and inserting "ten minutes."

Mr. C. said—Mr. President: I am not myself very particular as to the ten minutes on the one hand, or fifteen on the other; but the bill of time kept by the gentleman from Berrien is a good guide to us. I recollect (said Mr. C.) the speech of eleven minutes. The gentleman expressed all his views on the important subject. If any gentleman has not the faculty to deliver his views on any important subject, he will be allowed a few minutes over.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to amend by inserting "fifteen minutes." Lost.

The amendment offered by Mr. CHURCH was adopted by a two-thirds vote.

The article entitled "Mode of amending and revising the Constitution" was read a third time, passed, and referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

The Convention having reached the order of unfinished business, resumed the consideration of the resolution accompanying the article entitled "Elections."

Mr. WOODMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the words "for and against the said separate amendment" were stricken from the 15th and 16th lines.

Mr. CHURCH would state that if the motion to reconsider should prevail, he would move a further amendment to the 15th line, so as to read, "that at this election, if a majority of all the votes given on this amendment."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH believed the amendment which had been inserted instead of the original article would defeat the object of the resolution. It was not what the friends of the colored man wanted. He had supposed, when the motion was made by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] to strike out and insert, that the gentleman was the friend of the colored man, and of the free soil party. The gentleman moved to strike out "citizen" and insert "inhabitant." This is not what the friends of the colored man want, or have asked at our hands; they ask for the privilege of voting for their officers; for those who are to tax them and exercise authority over them. They do not ask for citizenship. The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] says he was opposed to the measure. I believe it was an evidence of the adroitness of the gentleman, marching about and leading the Convention to adopt a measure that they will repudiate.

Shall we submit this in a form obnoxious to all the people of the State? Let us not hold the promise to the ear and break it to the heart. Let us be just and fair to ourselves, our citizens and the colored man. Whatever may be the result of the submission of this measure to the people, let us act honorably and above board; let us submit it in the shape the friends of the colored man ask it.

I apprehend (said Mr. VAN V.) it will settle the question, and lay out our free soil friends. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Calhoun will be struck out, and the original article remain.

Mr. CRARY said—When I attempt to give anything to a person, I propose to do it at once, and not by halves. The provisions of this resolution were open to objections; it professed to refer to the consideration of extending the elective franchise to the colored male citizen. I wish to know how many colored male citizens there are in the State in contemplation of law. I do not know one in the county I represent. You may call them citizens who are not such in the eye of the law. All, or nearly all that are here are not citizens, as I understand it; they came from the southern States, and were slaves. I do not believe that there are fifty in the State that are citizens, under a proper definition. You hold out something which is nothing. They may vote for an officer, but not for levying taxes. It is only the privilege of voting for all officers that may be hereafter elected. He may go to the township meeting, but he will not be exempt from arrest in going to and coming from the same; but under the proposition I make, he is entitled to all the privileges. I say, if it is the will of the people of Michigan that he shall have the right to vote, he should stand on a par with the white man.

I am opposed to this, but I am not now disposed to give my reasons; but if they have the privilege, I would put them on the same footing with the white population. When we speak of the word "inhabitant," we should be as liberal to them as to others to whom we have extended the liberty of voting.

Mr. WOODMAN did not see anything particularly objectionable in the statement of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRAWFORD.] What he [Mr. W.] wanted was, that a majority of votes given on this resolution should prevail—not the whole votes given. He had said that he should oppose the resolution, but he wanted it to be sent out perfect, and that the votes given for and against the resolution should be taken into account on this part of the amendment to the constitution.

Mr. COMSTOCK hoped the motion to reconsider would prevail. He believed, under the restrictions as it now stood, the whole object the petitioners had in view would be defeated; and he hoped the section would be restored as originally reported, as this is what the people ask, and it is no more than just that it should be submitted without being encumbered with vague and indefinite ideas.

I listened with pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] the other day, when on the subject of admitting foreigners to the elective franchise; he was very eloquent in relation to granting this portion of inhabitants these privileges, and descanted upon the oppression they had fled from in leaving their native land, and urged upon us to be liberal in granting them these privileges. With this I am not disposed to find fault; neither did I dissent from the appeal made in behalf of the remnants of the savage tribes, who, he said, should be allowed the privilege of voting. After these appeals in favor of the oppressed, so eloquently urged by different gentlemen, and their great sympathy for their fellow men, I did hope to hear some word of consolation for that portion of the down trodden race—the colored population of our State who ask the boon of voting at our elections. But I listened in vain; not one word of encouragement for them. No sympathy for the oppressed of our own nation, who have sought an asylum in our State. Shall I state the reason? Simply, Mr. President, because they are "guilty of a skin not colored like our own."

And those gentlemen who claim to be the exclusive democracy—yea, the progressive—and shout to the top of their voices in favor of universal freedom and suffrage; and when called to submit the question to the people in relation to admitting to vote those born in our own land, and natives of our own soil, how their democratic hearts revolt at the idea of the ballot boxes being contaminated by even submitting the question fairly to the people. I ask that the subject may be fairly submitted to our constituents, unembarrassed, and without any technicality which is calculated to defeat its whole operation. While I am ready to admit to the elective franchise those who have fled from other countries, I will not, like the gentleman, refuse a fair submission to the people of the rights of another class of oppressed and down trodden of our land. Have not the men of color fled to us for protection? Then why deny the submission to the people upon fair grounds? It is said by one gentleman they are not citizens. In answer to this, I would say we are not to go to the State of Maryland or Virginia to define what shall constitute a citizen of the State of Michigan.

If the subject is fairly submitted to the people, and they decide against their being admitted to vote on the terms asked, then it settles the question. If we do our duty and the people reject it, we shall be free from censure. But let them understand and see plainly what they are asking, and then if the people deny them, it will be understood it is denied by the people, and not by this Convention.

Mr. BACKUS said he would go for a reconsideration of the vote, whatever his own opinions might be; and they were well known at home. He did not believe in the propriety of extending the franchise to the colored population; but he was disposed to allow the people to say whether they would mingle the two races in the elective franchise. He wished the people of the State to say "aye" or "no" on the question, that every quibble or doubt may be removed, and that the question shall be finally and forever settled.

I should wish, sir, (said Mr. B.,) that the motion of the gentleman from Oakland would embrace the whole article. There may some consequence follow from the amendment of the gentleman from Calhoun. I wish the people to vote upon it with a full understanding of its bearings, so that the question may be forever set at rest. If there is equivocation in any part of the resolution, (and I think there is,) the question will not be settled. The qualifications of the colored people for the rights of voting should be finally determined when the resolution is acted upon. The basis of the motion of my friend from Oakland is equivocal. The question is, whether the people will allow the colored people to mingle in the elective franchise. I would meet it fully.

The motion to reconsider the vote was carried; and the question recurring on Mr. CHURCH's amendment, he withdrew it.

The question being on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. SUTHERLAND would suggest for the consideration of the Convention, that in case the people should vote in favor of inserting this article in the constitution, there was no provision that those people should be included in any enumeration on which the apportionment should be made.

Mr. COMSTOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which all after the word "the" in the fifth line, up to and including "1851," was stricken out, and the words "the rights and privileges of an elector," inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH trusted it would prevail. The insertion of the word "inhabitants" was not so obnoxious; but the amendment in the fifth line would be so. Not a single petition asks this at our hands. The petition from Washtenaw prays that the elective franchise may be extended to every male colored citizen over twenty-one years of age. That presented by Mr. Comstock from Lenawee, asks that the elective franchise may be extended to colored persons—not the privilege of electors; that is, to hold office as well as voting—they have not asked this at our hands. Shall we kill the resolution here, and then send it out to the people to vote upon it? I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Calhoun will be struck out, that we may deal fairly with our citizens, friends to the colored men, and to the colored men themselves. It does not become us to send this mutilated article out to mark the friends of the colored men. I hope the people will not meet members of this Convention, and say "you acted disingenuously; you acted so as to defeat the object of the resolution."

Mr. CRARY would ask whether, under this constitution and the article presented to the Convention, a colored man cannot be elected where there is no prohibition? Whether they cannot elect any colored man to any office except the office of Governor, and those prohibited?

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH would answer, if that was the fact, as the gentleman alleges, then he has a right to vote for officers. He would ask whether a colored man could be voted for now, without being an elector? He cannot be elected to office.

Mr. CRARY—Except for prohibition, the people can take whom they please, white or black men, and elect them to office.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH apprehended not; and referred to Webster's Dictionary for the definition of a voter, to show that the position taken by Mr. CRARY was incorrect; that the right of voting conferred on a colored man would not confer on him the right of a citizen to hold office. The gentleman from Calhoun says, unless his amendment be adopted, the colored man cannot vote at a township meeting; and after this, he says he can exercise office in a town. He would ask the gentleman where he had received this doctrine? It is that they shall have the privilege of voting that we ask, not that they shall be voted for. The amendment of the gentleman is hostile to the wishes of the friends of the colored man. He has expressed his hostility to the adoption of the resolution. His amendment is a species of tactics to render the resolution a nullity.

Mr. BACKUS would suggest a few considerations to the gentleman from Oakland. He believed the amendments of the gentleman from Calhoun were such as the gentleman from Oakland wanted. They were such as he (Mr. B.) wished for. He objects to the term "inhabitant," and to the expression "all the rights and privileges of an elector".

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I do not object to the word "inhabitant."

Mr. BACKUS resumed—He did not believe there was one colored person in the State, a citizen. When they left the place of their vassalage they were property, not citizens. They are entitled to all the rights and privileges of the State from which they came, and those were the rights of slavery. The word should be "inhabitant," and not "citizen." The gentleman from Oakland would not succeed in his object unless that were incorporated.

What are the rights and privileges of a voter? Sir, the right to be elected. The gentleman would tie them down to the right of voting only. I would (said Mr. B.) extend to them the right of being voted for. If the people extend to the colored people the right of voting, they should be voted for.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE saw no object in submitting it to the people as it came from the hands of the committee. It says, "male citizens;" we have none such at the present time—it would allow none to vote. They would be just as well off after its adoption as now.

Mr. WILLIAMS—The gentleman from Calhoun says there is no colored citizen. He would like to put a question to the gentleman: Suppose a colored man, born and brought up, and entitled to all the privileges of citizenship in Massachusetts, should remove to this State; the constitution of the United States says, "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Now will the gentleman himself say, if he had a suit with such a man in the Supreme Court of the United States, which turned upon the question whether such a man was a citizen or not, will he say that it would not be decided against him?

He hoped the question on these amendments would be reconsidered. The practical result would probably be the same; but it is very manifest that the diction was changed, because it would admit now of misconstruction at the polls. It is insidious, unmanly, and if parliamentary, he would use a worse word. It is plain that it is designed to introduce expressions, and put the resolution in such shape that it may be most effectually used at the polls. Why not have it as the petitioners themselves want it?

Mr. HANSCOM—It is the same before and after the amendment. The object of the amendment is to prevent the people who vote on the resolution from being hoodwinked; for practically the right of being voted for goes with the right of voting. Why not put it so? Why not say that they shall have all the privileges of electors, so that the people may know and understand the effect of it? The legal effect is precisely the same one way as the other. The object of the amendment is to advise the people especially as to the result of their action.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked for the yeas and nays thereon, and the same being demanded, the motion to reconsider was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Britain, Asahel Brown, Bush, Chandler, Comstock, Conner, Daniels, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hixon, Lee, Lovell, McLeod, Moore, Mowry, Orr, N. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, Robertson, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Webster, Wells, White, Whittemore, Whipple, Williams, Woodman—39.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Axford, Backus, Barnard, Beardsley, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chapel, Choate, J. Clark, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hathaway, Kinne, Marvin, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Roberts, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sutherland, Town, Warden, Willard, President—45.

The resolution was then ordered to a third reading.

Mr. BRITAIN, by consent, presented the petition of Daniel Baker and 57 others, asking the insertion in the constitution of an article prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; which was referred to the select committee upon the subject.

Mr. BARNARD, by consent, presented the petition of B. C. Curtis and 39 others, on the subject of convict labor in the State prison; referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

The article entitled "State Officers" being taken up for consideration, and the question being on concurring in the amendments made in committee of the whole,

On motion of Mr. REDFIELD, the article was laid upon the table and ordered printed with the amendments.

The article entitled "County Officers and County Government" being under consideration, the amendments made in committee of the whole were severally concurred in.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, section 10 was amended by adding thereto the words "voting upon that subject."

Mr. EASTMAN moved to strike out section 9; which is as follows:

"No county seat, when once established, shall be removed until the place to which it is proposed to be removed shall be designated by a majority of the board of supervisors of said county, and two-thirds of the qualified electors shall have voted in favor of the proposed location, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. E. said it was his wish that said section be stricken out, and that nothing should be inserted in its place. From the frequent necessary changes incident to a country rapidly filling up with inhabitants, he thought it better to be left open to future legislation to accommodate matters to the unforeseen and actual wants of the people. But if it was deemed best by this body that some rule be adopted in our fundamental laws to regulate these matters, he would offer a substitute obviating the serious objections he entertained to the section he desired stricken out, which was:

"The board of supervisors shall determine when the county seat of the county ought to be removed, and shall notify the Governor of the State of such determination, whose duty it shall be forthwith to appoint three competent and disinterested persons, not residents of the county, to re-locate the same; which location may be confirmed or rejected by a major vote of the qualified electors given on that subject at the next general election held thereafter, in such manner as may be prescribed by law."

He [Mr. E.] had attempted, when this subject was under consideration in committee of the whole, to give some reasons for having this section modified in its features. There are two objectionable points in it as it now stands—the one which requires the board of supervisors to establish the place to which it shall be removed, and the other that makes it necessary to obtain two-thirds of the electors to concur in the place so fixed by the board. It would be, obviously, very difficult for even a majority of a board of supervisors to agree upon any one point; they may readily agree that it ought to be removed; but from the jealousies that will spring up among the rival points around or about the place near where common consent dictates it should be located, perhaps three or four of the board, disappointed because it cannot be exactly where they wish it to accommodate their constituents, will be induced to go against the point proposed, thinking to get it for their own point at some future time. These, with the devoted friends of the old location, will generally be able to defeat the fixing upon any point by even the majority of the board. Now, to obviate this difficulty, I propose, in the substitute submitted, to require the supervisors to determine when the site should be removed. If they are called to act upon this simple proposition alone, they will act honestly to carry out the known wishes of their constituents—they can agree. I propose then to have three disinterested men, non-residents of the county, to come and examine the situation of the whole county, hear all the different arguments of those who claim the point, pro and con, and locate that point which in their judgment will best accommodate the whole people of the county, both now and prospectively. By this means the point is designated, and fairly designated, without interest, prejudice or jealousy. The people then of the whole county are called to reject or sanction their doings—which ends the matter.

Sir, I consider the section, as it now stands in this article, an iron rule—a complete bar on the removal of any county seat hereafter; however far removed it may be from the centre of a county, in a business view or geographically, it can never be removed. And from the manner in which all our new counties will probably be settled hereafter, from south to north, like a line of prairie fire, they will be settled on their south border first, and the county seat will be of course located in the south end, and there it must remain, time untold.

It is to provide a fair chance for these new counties, as well as for such as have the misfortune to suffer with a one-sided location at present, like the one I have the honor to represent on this floor, I ask for some modification of this section. It may be said that the doings of commissioners in these matters are liable to objection—that they have been bought or corrupted, and have abused their trust, &c. I admit, sir, that when their action is final, it is objectionable—extremely so; but when, in the manner I have proposed, their doings are to be submitted to the vote of the people, to be approved or condemned, it does seem to me to do away with all the objections urged against them. I simply introduce them that the point may be decided upon free from interest, bias, prejudice or competition, and that the vote of the people may be brought to bear upon one point alone.

I do not feel tenacious of any particular mode or manner of accomplishing the object I have stated. It is to give the people, in a fair method, by a majority vote, the control of their own interests. Our country is so rapidly advancing, interests changing, business turning to new channels, that I would prefer to leave this matter open for a while yet to the Legislature—to the people—that they may settle each individual case according to the rights of the case presented. But I will offer the substitute.

Mr. N. PIERCE was opposed to striking out. He did not know of any objection to the people of a county fixing their own county seat. It seemed as reasonable as it would be for him to have the right to fix the site of his own farm buildings. The object is to keep out these applications from the counties to the Legislature, which are attended with a great deal of expense, as in the case of Shiawassee last winter. We know that these agitations arise every session of the Legislature, on the removal of county seats. Not one quarter of them are removed. The supervisors and the people are better able to judge than the Legislature. If two-thirds of the supervisors are to decide on it, he [Mr. P.] would have no objection to make it a majority vote by the people. The people are to be taxed for their county buildings, and they should have the privilege of saying whether they will be taxed or not.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH thought if this rule were adopted it would be difficult ever to remove a county seat. He had proposed to insert a majority instead of two-thirds; but the amendment of the gentleman from Ottawa was preferable. People go and settle in a new county without reference to the centre; the consequence is, the county seat is not located there in the first instance. The proposition of the gentleman from Ottawa is not analagous to the case of a person fixing the site of his barn. The supervisors of the county must move in the matter; then the Governor appoints commissioners to designate the site; then the people decide. It appeared to him that this was the least objectionable course.

Mr. CHAPEL was opposed to the Governor having any thing to do with the matter of county seats. It is the business of the people of the county. He did not see why it should be brought to the Legislature. As it stands, it conflicts with the objects of what the people want, and with their notions of justice. It requires two-thirds to decide on its removal. He would have it read "two-thirds of the supervisors and a majority of the people."

It is well known that where difficulties arise, the county seats had been fixed at an early day; when the counties are settled the difficulties arise. The influence of the county seat, with its officers, is about one-third, in relation to the county. If two-thirds of the supervisors decide, a majority of the people come in and ratify. This indication of the wishes of the people should be sufficient. It is equal to saying a county seat shall never be removed, to say that two-thirds of the people shall be in favor of it before it can be removed. The power and influence in the hands of the people at the place where it is located, will be sufficient to prevent its removal. It is illiberal and unjust.

He would state a case in point: Mr. Clemens originally settled Macomb county, and established, for his own convenience, Mt. Clemens as the county seat. It is situated on one side of the county. He would ask, if the people of Macomb county wished to remove the county seat, how can they get a two-thirds vote for it, in opposition to the influence of Mt. Clemens? It is like saying it shall never be removed.

Mr. CHAPEL concluded by moving to amend the section by striking out "two-thirds" and inserting "a majority;" and also by striking out "a majority" and inserting "two-thirds."

Mr. CHURCH supported the amendment offered by Mr. CHAPEL. It would be beneficial to all parts of the State, especially to the new counties.

We all know (said Mr. C.) that the board of supervisors, as constituted at present, and as proposed to be constituted, is not a representation of population, but of territory. One of the supervisors of our county represents 3,500 people, another represents but little over 100. Now, it is not right that those supervisors should have an equal voice and vote in the determination of this matter, so as to influence the expenditure of money to come from the whole population; and the county seat should have reference to the whole population. When a county seat is once located, and pecuniary interests established, and investments made, it is somewhat of a serious matter to remove it; and it should not be carried out without some serious and deliberate action. The bare movement to remove a county seat is injurious to the inhabitants of the place. It should not be carried out except in some safe way, in which the inhabitants at the county seat should not be injured.

I think (said Mr. C.) that the site should be designated by two-thirds of the board of supervisors to be right, and suited to all. It is not right that a board of supervisors, constituted as I have said, should have the control, or a majority of the inhabitants deprived of the control. In a bill introduced in the last Legislature by a Representative from our county, it was proposed to give, on this question, (the removal of a county seat,) one vote to the supervisor of every organized township. Where he represented four townships, he would emphatically, as I said here before, represent wood, rocks, wild-cats and wolves. This will go as far as we can go to meet the convenience of other counties, and at the same time accommodate the gentleman from Ottawa. He can have no objection when two-thirds of the supervisors agree to remove, and a majority of the people agree to the removal. A bare majority of the board of supervisors should not disturb the county seat. When two-thirds, or any other safe number have indicated a point for popular action, a majority of the people ought to decide.

Mr. MOORE observed that no one subject could excite more strife and ill-will in a county than an attempt to remove a county seat; yet the removal might be desired by the people of the county. He believed the amendment should be altered. He thought it would be a wholesome provision, after the site is designated by the commissioners or supervisors, that the people should vote on the question. Perhaps two-thirds of the supervisors was too great a number; he would propose three-fifths. There could be no great objection to the substitute, which provides that the Governor shall appoint three disinterested men. The county seat would not be disturbed in the first place, unless a majority of the supervisors were in favor of it. The commissioners would go there disinterested, and after the designation of the site the people could decide. It was desirable that some alteration should be made in the section, under the circumstances; as it now stands no county seat could be removed.

Mr. CHAPEL modified his amendment, substituting "three-fifths" for "two-thirds."

Mr. C. would merely further remark that a county seat is invariably established before a county is settled; and when a county is settled, it may be necessary to move it; but here is a clause that cuts it off for fifteen years. All the influences of the first settled portion will be against it. The amendment he offered was liberal enough; a majority of the people would be on the side nearest to the old county seat.

Mr. HANSCOM was in favor of the first proposition of the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. CHAPEL.] If anything operated injuriously to the State it was this eternal contest about county seats. Their business and growth was not only retarded, but money was taken from them in contending on this question. He believed a majority of the people should have the control; but as to setting the ball in motion—the incipient movement—that was another question entirely. The supervisor who represents one hundred inhabitants from the most extreme township, has as much power as the supervisor representing the most populous township. It would be proper to require two-thirds of the board of supervisors to take the incipient steps. He could refer to many counties where two-thirds of the board of supervisors did not represent one-third of the population of the county. He was in favor of the first proposition, for the simple reason that there should be some reasonable mode of setting the ball in motion.

Mr. COMSTOCK said in the southern tier of counties they had had much experience on this subject. Had that question been settled on the principle of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Macomb, great expense would have been saved. When a county site is designated by the supervisors, a vote of three-fifths is all that should be required. When you get a vote of three-fifths of the board of supervisors, it will be a fair expression of the wishes of a majority of the electors. We must not allow the Governor to send his commissioners; we have had enough of that.

Mr. WILLARD would suggest the propriety of putting it at two-thirds. In the county from which he came, and the county directly south, two-thirds of the supervisors did not represent one-fifth of the population. He was in favor of two-thirds, and would move so to amend the amendment.

Mr. STURGIS believed it would be proper to require at least two-thirds of the supervisors to agree about the removal of a county seat, for this reason—and he spoke from a knowledge of his own county matters; that a supervisor from a town may go for or against the removal on account of his residence on one side or the other of a township. The relative position of the inhabitants to a county is liable to change. If the settlements are in the north, it will be removed there; then, by increase of settlements in the south, and by a change in the board of supervisors, it would be removed back again. What he would try to guard against, was the frequent removal of county seats; it unsettled the value of property, and was ruinous to those settled near county seats. There could be no danger in requiring two-thirds of the board of supervisors to call for a vote of the people. If two-thirds agree, it will be a fair indication that the location will be permanent.

Mr. SULLIVAN remarked that he was in favor of changing the location of county seats when proposed by a majority of the supervisors, and when a change was assented to by a majority of the people. He was totally opposed to requiring the assent of two-thirds of a board of supervisors to change the location of a county seat, or rather to submit a proposition to that effect to the people. It was, in his estimation, nothing more nor less than a declaration of this Convention that the location of a county seat shall never be changed. It is putting it in the power of one-third of the supervisors, representing, as has been justly remarked, territory and not population—the delegates of towns containing perhaps not one-tenth of the whole population of the county, to fix the location of a county seat where it now is, perpetually. It is putting the majority eternally at the feet of the minority. The substitute of the gentleman from Ottawa furnishes every security that can reasonably be required against the hasty, inconsiderate and ill-judged removal of a county seat location. It requires, first, the assent of a majority of the towns; secondly, the consent of a majority of the inhabitants.

The expense of changing the location of a county seat, which has been adverted to by several gentlemen on this floor, affords the best guaranty that it will not be changed unless the public good requires it. It will often happen, when a proposal is made to change the location of a county seat, that a variety of towns are contending for the location. That makes it next to impossible that two-thirds or even a majority of the board of supervisors should agree upon any one point. The substitute of the gentleman from Ottawa, it appeared to him, was much the most judicious; to let the location be fixed whenever a majority of the board of supervisors desire it, or by commissioners, and then let the people confirm or reject their location as they shall see fit. The expense that has heretofore grown out of controversies respecting the location of county seats, has been incurred under an entirely different system; it was when the change of location was determined upon by the Legislature, a body of men not having any means of acting judiciously upon the subject. The matter can be settled under the new dispensation with comparatively little trouble or expense.

MR. WALKER did not like either of the propositions. If two-thirds were proper to order the vote, it would be done when very few of the inhabitants might require it, and afterwards it might not be done when they did require it. Suppose the county seat to be in the north-west corner, with a large population, and the other parts of the county sparsely populated; you may get two-thirds of the supervisors to vote for its removal. Again, a county may be settled in every corner, and a sparse population in the centre; the supervisors of the most populous parts might represent nine-tenths of the population, and yet not get two-thirds of the supervisors to go for it.

Mr. CHAPEL, in reply, recapitulated the arguments in favor of the amendment, and contended that, under the provision as it stood, however great an interest the people might have in its removal, they would never be able to accomplish it. If two-thirds of the supervisors and a majority of the people be not sufficient, let us fix a clause in the constitution saying the county seat in counties organized shall never be removed; and in new counties where the stake is stuck, it shall forever remain. A few office holders, and a few lawyers that would skin a flint, would lay an embargo upon it.

The proposition of Mr. WILLARD was adopted, inserting "two-thirds" instead of "three-fifths."

The question being on the amendment as amended,

Mr. WHITE asked for a division of the question.

The question on striking out "a majority" and inserting "two-thirds," was agreed to.

The question being on the second clause of the amendment,

Mr. ROBERTSON demanded the yeas and nays; and the same being ordered, the motion to strike out "two-thirds" prevailed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Chandler, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Green, Hanscom, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kinne, Marvin, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman—64.

NAYS—Messrs. J. Bartow, Choate, Gardiner, Hart, Hixon, Kingsley, Lovell, O'Brien, Prevost, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Wait, Wells, White, President—17.

And the words "a majority" were inserted in lieu thereof.

The question recurring on Mr. EASTMAN's motion to strike out,

Mr. EASTMAN said, in answer to the question proposed by my friend and colleague from Kent, whether I can reasonably ask for more than this section now provides?—indeed, sir, I do. I can, in accordance with the principles of right, equity and justice—in accordance with the very first principles of our institutions—in accordance with the primary rules of the majority system, laid down as the basis of our government in matters where the direct rights and interests of a community are all equally concerned. Who ever heard, in this age of progress in republican principles, of granting to the one-third the power of dictating to and controlling the rights, privileges and direct interests of the two-thirds? If we were granting privileged corporations, bestowing a bonus out of the people's money, giving outright, exclusive privileges of money-making operations, then I could divine the propriety of requiring a vote approximating unanimity more than that of a majority. But, sir, in a matter of right, of interest, convenience simply, when all are equally involved, I cannot see the propriety of confiding the power to a minority. No sir—if this is democratic doctrine, then I am no democrat.

But the argument is: pin this matter; fasten it beyond the reach of agitation hereafter; it has cost the State dollars and cents already; it is a vexed question in various sections; it even breaks down party lines; party discipline is trodden under foot. All this is undoubtedly true; but, sir, what does it prove? Why, sir, it proves conclusively, to my mind, that the first location, or even the second, has not been always found convenient for the people in those counties where it has been located early, before they were fully settled and the future spot could be determined, where it would best subserve the interests of the whole people.

The reason of so much wrangling, twisting and turning is occasioned by the furious efforts of those who are luxuriating in the enjoyment of a privilege that a majority of the people are about to take from them for their own eating; their action, their opposition, the art and intrigue they make use of to retain the bone they have too long enjoyed, is not singular. Witness the squealing all over the country when the official teat is removed. We hear it in days of recent date, as well as in those long gone by. It is not singular, or uncommon. But what republican ever thought of restraining this privilege of the people, by giving the controlling power into the hands of an aristocracy of one-third, aided by the influence of the official corps of the same community? On the same principle might we not adopt a one man power to take care of those interests that directly affect the people, because it opens room for agitation? It costs us something to settle these matters right; the masses are troublesome, and they had better be governed by the few—it is cheaper.

But, sir, expense has been urged. Will the gentlemen of this Convention calculate for a moment the expense of a people of the east half of a county densely populated; travelling eighteen or twenty miles beyond the centre of a county, to the extreme west limit of it, for all time to come, and for all their county business, to their records, attending courts as jurors, witnesses, &c., and see how it will foot up; and then compare it with a few hours legislation to settle this matter right. Now, sir, this is the fact in my own county, and must be forever if you engraft this section in your fundamental laws. The two-thirds—yes, the four-fifths—will be held in duress by the influence of the one-fifth, aided by wealth and power; the power of office-holders. Suppose the board of supervisors is full, composed of men from every surveyed township in the county; suppose they represent territory rather than population—where would they reasonably locate the county site? At or near the centre, most likely; and I would ask in what more proper place, in ninety-nine cases in one hundred, can it be located? Are there any who can be greatly injured by such an act? There are new counties yet to be organized in this State, more in number than there are now organized, and with their consequent one corner, one end, or one sided sites; and in them must forever be extended your new progressive republican rule to let the one-third or one-fifth hold and luxuriate in the enjoyment of an accidental boon, to the injury, inconvenience and expense of the four-fifths. If this will be extending equal justice, equal privilege to all by your fundamental laws, then I do not figure right; if this is to be the democracy of the coming age, then it will not be mine.

I would ask the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject to examine for a moment the provisions of the substitute I propose, and witness the checks it contains, and the equal security it extends to all classes and interests. The board of supervisors are to determine when a county site is so situated that it ought to be removed from where it then is. Suppose this board do not exactly represent population, but territory; then they say the present site is not rightly located, geographically. Next, three disinterested men are brought in to say where it should be located. Here you have the judgment of a tribunal rendered devoid of interest, except to promote the general interest of all. No competition, no jealousy or rivalry comes into play; they establish the place—they may re-locate it in the old place again, if in their judgment that is the best place. And then, their doings are submitted to a majority of the people—the whole people, to approve or reject the proposed location. Can there be wrong done to the people in this procedure? Each succeeding action is a check on the preceding, and a majority of the electors corrects the whole. This last check, it has been truly remarked by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER,] gives the older settled portion of the county, around the old location, decidedly the advantage, as being universally the most populous.

I am not, sir, very well acquainted with the location of the county sites in the various counties in the State. I happen to know something of those in the counties of Kent and Clinton, and can well understand the why and the wherefore of the gentlemen who so ably and honorably represent these localities. I do hope that this honorable body will look at this question as to its bearings on the new counties yet to come; on each one in the State, collectively and individually, and more particularly on the general principle of equity and justice, that self-interest in any case may not come into the consideration, to give sanction to an unequal and and unjust rule. I would call the attention to one feature of the substitute proposed; it is that the expense of all the agitation and contention that may hereafter arise in these heretofore vexed questions for Legislatures to settle, is to be borne by those who are directly interested—by those who produce it. The whole State, the peaceable of other precincts, are undisturbed by their doings, either in purse, word or deed. I therefore hope, sir, that section nine will be stricken out, and the substitute adopted, whereby the rights of the majority will be sustained, and the aristocratic, anti-democratic two-thirds or four-fifths doctrine, shadowed forth in the section, crushed.

The motion of Mr. EASTMAN to strike out section 9 was then lost.

Mr. CORNELL moved to amend section 8 by inserting in the first line, after "new," the words "and change the boundaries of;" and the same prevailed.

On motion of Mr. BUTTERFIELD, the section (8) was amended by inserting after "townships," in second line, the following: "Provided, no township heretofore organized shall be divided without the sanction of a majority of the inhabitants of the territory proposed to be set off."

Mr. ARZENO offered the following substitute for the section:

"The board of supervisors of all organized counties shall have exclusive power to organize new townships and to divide townships; but no new township lines, other than those made for the purpose of organizing new townships, shall be valid unless the majority of the voters of the township whose territory it is proposed to take shall agree to the same, in a manner to be provided by law; and no new township shall be organized of less dimensions than the United States survey thereof."

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the section (8) was further amended by striking out "of," in second line, and inserting "or repair of roads or."

Mr. BACKUS moved to amend by striking out "United States survey thereof," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "less than six square miles." He afterwards modified the same by inserting "thirty-six" in lieu of "six."

Mr. BACKUS subsequently withdrew his amendment and substituted the following: add at the end of the section, "where such surveys exist."

Mr. EASTMAN moved to amend the amendment by adding "and not divided by meandered streams"

Pending which, on motion of Mr. CRARY, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The consideration of the article entitled "County Officers and County Government," was resumed.

The question being upon Mr. EASTMAN's amendment, it did not prevail.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BACKUS was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. REDFIELD, the last clause of the section, (8,) being all after "counties," in the third line, was stricken out.

Mr. ARZENO then withdrew his substitute for the section.

Mr. CORNELL moved to amend by adding to the same section as follows: "The compensation of members of the board of supervisors may be fixed by law; but shall never exceed one dollar and fifty cents each per day."

Mr. C. said if the amendment should be adopted, he would propose a modification of the previous section. He thought the compensation for the services of supervisors should be fixed. There would be an impropriety in their auditing their own accounts or fixing their own compensation.

Mr. WILLARD moved to strike out "fifty cents."

Mr. J. BARTOW suggested to the gentleman from Jackson to withdraw his amendment, and move to add after the word "powers," in the sixth section, the word "compensation;" leaving it to be fixed by the Legislature. He did not think it proper to fix it in the constitution. The Legislature would then prescribe their powers and fix their compensation.

Mr. CORNELL withdrew his proposition.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, section 6 was amended by inserting after "powers," the words "and compensation."

Mr. EATON proposed to amend by adding at the end of section 2, as follows: "except the county of Wayne."

Mr. EATON hoped it would be incorporated. Gentlemen must be aware that the county of Wayne is differently situated from any other county, having a large city within its borders, of twenty-five thousand inhabitants. They have been desirous of dividing the county, but could not do it under the old constitution, except by making Detroit the new county; in which case they would have to transcribe the records. Under the proposition he had offered, they could make the out towns the new county, which would then have to transcribe the records.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to amend the same section by striking out "six hundred square miles," and inserting in lieu thereof "sixteen townships, as surveyed by the United States."

Mr. FRALICK moved to amend the amendment by inserting "four hundred," instead of six hundred;" which did not prevail.

The amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS was adopted.

Mr. DANIELS moved to amend section 3, by striking out the words "one county surveyor."

Mr. D. said he presented it to the Convention, believing as he did, that it was unnecessary, and that it puts persons to great inconvenience. If left as it was in New York, each man would employ his own surveyor, which would be better.

The amendment prevailed.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend section 3 by adding after the word "law," in the 4th line, as follows: "And any qualified elector who shall have resided in the county six months next preceding the election shall be eligible to the aforesaid offices."

Mr. COOK moved to amend by striking out so much as relates to the time of residence.

Mr. WALKER accepted the amendment.

Mr. WHIPPLE wished the gentleman to explain the object of the amendment.

Mr. WALKER—Some doubts seem to have existed, though there were none in reality, whether persons not citizens of the United States, though enjoying the elective franchise, were eligible to office. He wished to make it plain.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE would inquire if there were any thing in the constitution preventing it?

The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. W. ADAMS proposed to amend section 8 by adding thereto as follows: "But no township already organized, embracing a territory of no more than six miles square, shall be divided into two separate townships."

Which did not prevail.

Mr. HASCALL moved to amend section 6 by adding thereto, "but such compensation (to supervisors) shall not exceed one dollar and twenty-five cents a day."

Mr. H. observed, as the Convention proposed to fix the pay of members of the Legislature and the salaries of State officers, he thought it would be as proper to fix the compensation of the board of supervisors.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH hoped it would not prevail. A few days ago gentlemen voted three dollars a day for members of the Legislature; the duties of supervisors were as arduous; they have to go to the county seats and leave their homes; their expenses were as large as members of the Legislature. He moved to insert "one dollar and fifty cents."

The amendment prevailed by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, McLeod, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, N. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Woodman, President—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Ammon Brown, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Eastman, Gardiner, Harvey, Hascall, Hixon, Morrison, Skinner, Sutherland, Town, Wells, Willard, Witherell—10.

The question recurring on the adoption of the amendment as amended,

Mr. J. BARTOW said he had voted for the amendment, not because he was in favor of having it in the constitution, but because he thought it possibly might get there. He had an objection to inserting it in the constitution, as being out of place and character. It was more appropriate to an enactment of the Legislature than the organic law. It may happen that with the new duties imposed upon the board of supervisors, their pay should be increased. He was opposed to fixing the pay in the constitution.

Mr. HASCALL'S proposition was rejected.

Mr. FRALICK moved to amend section 11 by inserting after "supervisors," in line 1, "or county auditors."

Mr. FRALICK stated that in the county of Wayne they had a board of auditors which they were desirous to retain. If the Legislature chooses hereafter to change the system it could do no harm.

Mr. BARTOW wished to know on which of the two boards in Wayne county the duty would devolve?

Mr. FRALICK—The board was established by law, and its duties defined. They must exist until altered by law or cut off by the constitution.

The amendment did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. TIFFANY, section 9 was amended by inserting after "electors," in the third line, the words, "voting thereon."

Mr. WHIPPLE moved to amend the article by striking out in section 3, "prosecuting attorney," and adding the following, to stand as a new section:

"A prosecuting attorney for each judicial circuit shall be elected by the qualified electors at the same time that judicial officers are elected, as provided by this constitution, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and whose duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. WHIPPLE—I desire to state the object I have in view in proposing the amendment under consideration. The proposition is an important one, and I ask the particular attention of the Convention to the reasons I shall offer in its support. Every thing that relates to the administration of justice is deeply interesting to the people of this State. To secure an intelligent and prompt administration of criminal justice is a duty which every government owes to its citizens. Without it, we fail in performing one of the highest obligations enjoined by the compact, which binds the citizen to the government of his choice. That this State has not performed its whole duty in this respect, I have for a long time been satisfied. Various causes have been assigned why the laws upon your statute book have failed to inspire terror, and why criminals have so often escaped the punishment due to their crimes. Without enumerating all, my long service upon the bench of this State has impressed me with the belief that one great difficulty is to be found in that want of experience, so necessary to an efficient and successful discharge of the duties which devolve upon our Prosecuting Attorneys. There are comparatively few professional gentlemen in this State who make the criminal law the particular subject of their study, and hence we find the want of that accurate, theoretical knowledge so indispensable to the practitioner. But, suppose this knowledge to be possessed; it will avail but little unless it has been applied in practice. To make an accomplished criminal lawyer, theory and practice are necessary.

Now, sir, our condition and circumstances forbid the idea that in many of the counties of this State, sound and accurate learning is to be found united with any considerable experience. The lawyer who is thus doubly armed, does not usually seek a residence in your remote and sparsely populated counties. But the young practitioner, who is enabled to encounter the hardships and privations incident to new settlements, and who, under circumstances of discouragement, is buoyed up by the hope that at no very distant day he may reap professional honors in his new field of labor. According to your present constitution a Prosecuting Attorney is to be appointed in each county, and in the present condition of things it cannot be expected that men of sound learning and ample experience can be found to fill that office in many of those counties. The selection being limited to a few persons, the Governor has been obliged from necessity to appoint those who are not fully competent to the discharge of the important and complicated duties devolved upon your prosecuting officers. I propose to apply to some extent a remedy for the evil, by the appointment of a Prosecuting Attorney in each judicial circuit. Should the proposition meet with favor by the Convention, I shall anticipate a more vigorous administration of criminal justice than has heretofore marked our history. Appoint a person to prosecute in the several counties embraced in each judicial circuit, and you at once create an office worthy the ambition of our most distinguished criminal lawyers. If they do not enjoy that ripe experience attained by long practice, they will soon acquire it in the extended field in which their learning and talent is to be tasked. The felon will no longer rely upon defective indictments and inefficient prosecutions as a means of escape from the penalty which the law affixes to his crime.

While the evils which burden the present system will be removed, the plan I propose will relieve the people from a system of taxation which has become insupportable. The salaries now paid by the several counties exceed those proposed to be paid the circuit attorneys, several thousand dollars. But this difference is trifling compared with the amount which will be saved if the power now lodged in the hands of thirty prosecuting attorneys is deposited in the hands of a few circuit attorneys, who will bring to the discharge of their duties the learning and experience which will ensure dispatch in the public business.

Mr. TIFFANY—It is due to the gentleman from Berrien to say that his remarks in relation to prosecuting attorneys are correct. It does require more legal learning than usually falls to the share of prosecuting attorneys. But I very much doubt whether the proposition of the gentleman from Berrien would tend to reduce the expense. We know that expenses occur in the investigation of offences—in the initiatory proceedings in regard to offenders, previous to their trial. In the preliminary stages of a prosecution the services of a prosecuting attorney are more needed than in any other. Under the proposition of the gentleman from Berrien, all the benefit of his services and advice in those stages would be lost.

We know that in many cases, especially in new counties, persons who commit offences go unwhipped of justice. It is because ignorant men are appointed to the office of prosecuting attorney—men who have not sufficient legal attainments. How, then, would it be if you had not a prosecuting attorney residing in the county? For five months out of the six you must be left without the aid of his services, in those stages of proceedings where they are most required, or be at a great expense in obtaining them. We could not depend upon the proceedings of many of our justices to be such as would stand the investigation of law. His services could not be obtained, except in the county in which he resided, without expense, and the result would be that in many cases the prosecution would be abandoned.

If a prosecuting attorney is engaged in the first stages of the proceedings, he knows the whole matter; he is acquainted with the witnesses and knows what every man will testify when he comes into court, and he sees that the witnesses are there; but how would it be in case you have only one prosecuting attorney for a judicial circuit? Sir, he would go into another county, ignorant of the causes to be tried, without knowing any thing of the witnesses, unless they came of their own accord. It needs the exertion of a prosecuting attorney to get them there. Causes are often put over on account of the absence of witnesses.

The system which the gentleman from Berrien proposes has been tried in New York, and has failed; it was abolished in a short time; it was in effect turning away the course of justice. You cannot find a man that can come into court and carry a case through unless he has been previously acquainted with the case.

Mr. KINGSLEY said it was probable that the grand jury would be abolished, in which case more duties would devolve on the Prosecuting Attorney, and a greater necessity would exist for his residence in the county. The Prosecuting Attorney is usually consulted in cases where he cannot personally attend. Should he be appointed to superintend so many counties, it would become necessary to adopt some other means of prosecution.

Mr. SULLIVAN thought there was one insurmountable objection to the scheme of the Chief Justice. Under our laws, a large number of criminal offences, perhaps the most numerous class, were triable before magistrates. How can a prosecuting officer attend to that class of cases arising in every county of his circuit? It appeared to him if an office were created, such as was suggested by the gentleman from Berrien, it would still be indispensable to have county Prosecuting Attorneys, and the expense of both systems would be increased.

Mr. WHIPPLE briefly replied; when the question was taken on the amendment, which did not prevail.

Mr. REDFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which Mr. FRALICK's amendment to section eleven was rejected.

Mr. B. said he had become convinced on reflection, that the county of Wayne should be allowed to exercise the right of having a board of commissioners. The business of that county was much larger than the business of any other county in the State. The great advantage of having a board of commissioners was this: by the mode of election they have always some on the board that have experience, and claims that have no merit are kept out: they require some men to be kept in office some time to protect them against false claims. There is no other county exactly situated as Wayne county, and perhaps it may with propriety be made exclusively for Wayne county.

The vote was reconsidered.

Mr. WITHERELL said the board of county auditors was adopted in Wayne county on account of the large amount of business. They had found it expedient to retain the board of auditors. If the gentleman would modify it, so as to make it applicable to any portion of the State, other counties might apply to the Legislature if it should be desirable.

Mr. J. BARTOW did not think a board of auditors preferable for other counties. So far as Wayne county was concerned, he would vote for it; he was willing to let the members of that county take the responsibility.

Mr. FRALICK's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH moved that the vote by which the Convention refused to strike out section nine be reconsidered.

Mr. EASTMAN was sorry again to trespass upon the time of the House; but he believed the section did not stand right in regard to justice and expediency, especially as it affected new counties. He had requested his colleague to move a reconsideration for the purpose of offering a substitute, which he read. If the section was not struck out, he would ask to have his own county relieved from its operation.

I have (said Mr. E.) closely watched the movements of this Convention, and been pleased with the progress made; and I hope the constitution may be so arranged as to be acceptable, not only to my own constituents, but to the people of the State, and that it may be adopted unanimously. But, sir, I must say that the consequences to my constituents, if the section remains as it is, may induce them to go against it, whatever other valuable provisions may be engrafted in it.

The motion to reconsider prevailed.

Mr. EASTMAN moved to amend the section by striking out "when once," in the first line, and inserting "now" in its stead; but the motion was lost.

The vote being again taken upon striking out section nine, the Convention refused to strike out.

Mr. HIXON moved to amend section 10 by striking out in the first line "borrow or," and in the third line the words "borrowed or."

Mr. H. asked the yeas and nays, and the same being demanded, the amendment was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Beeson, Brittain, Alvarado Brown, Bush, Carr, Choate, Cook, Eastman, Edmunds, Gardiner, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Lee, Mason, Newberry, O'Brien, Raynale, Roberts, Skinner, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whipple—29.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Asabel Brown, Chapel, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Moore, Mosher, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wells, White, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman, President—51.

Mr. BACKUS moved to amend section 2 by adding thereto as follows: "but the Legislature shall have power to organize any city into a separate county when it shall have attained a population of at least twenty thousand people, without reference to geographical extent."

On motion of Mr. DESNOYERS, the foregoing was amended by adding thereto "upon application of a majority of the legal voters of said city."

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the last vote taken was reconsidered.

Mr. HANSCOM proposed the following as a substitute for the amendment, which was accepted by Mr. DESNOYERS: "when a majority of the legal voters of a county in which such city may be situated shall recommend such new organization."

The same was agreed to.

The original proposition of Mr. BACKUS, as amended, was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, section 6 was amended by striking out "hereafter," and inserting after "prescribed," the words "in this constitution."

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, section 8 was amended by striking out in the second line the words "or to lay out," and inserting in lieu thereof "the laying out and establishing of."

Mr. EDMUNDS moved to strike out section 8, and substitute the following:

"The Legislature shall by general laws confer upon the board of supervisors of their respective counties power to construct highways and bridges, and to authorize the construction of the same, to lay out and establish roads, and to fix the boundaries of townships. Power shall also be conferred upon the inhabitants of any one or more surveyed townships to organize township governments therein."

Mr. HANSCOM moved to amend the section by adding thereto as follows: "provided, that any surveyed township containing 150 white inhabitants, shall be entitled to a separate township organization, if a majority of the electors of such township shall so elect."

Pending which, on motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, (37th day,) July 23.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. MOWRY: of S. F. Hubbell and 74 others, citizens of Oakland county, praying for the insertion of a provision in the constitution, prohibiting the Legislature from passing any law authorizing the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; also to make the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage a penal offence.

Also, of Mrs. E. Hastings and 198 others, ladies of Milford, Oakland county, praying for a like prohibition.

By Mr. FRALICK: of Mary A. Bentley, Hannah Buearley and 160 other ladies of Plymouth, praying that there may be an article in the revised constitution prohibiting the manufacture, importation, or sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage.

The above were severally referred to the select committee heretofore appointed upon the subject.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WOODMAN offered the following:

Whereas, Hon. P. R. ADAMS has absented himself from the sittings of this Convention during most of the session, without any apparent excuse or reason for so doing; therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary be not authorized to draw any certificate in favor of said ADAMS for per diem allowance, unless directed so to do by the Convention.

Mr. DANFORTH moved to lay the preamble and resolution upon the table; which did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the consideration of the same was postponed for one week.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD offered the following:

Resolved, That the afternoon sessions of this Convention will hereafter commence at two o'clock.

Mr. ALVORD moved to amend by striking out "two" and inserting "one," which was not agreed to.

Mr. DESNOYERS moved to strike out "two," and insert "half-past two;" which was not sustained.

The resolution was then adopted.

The Convention having reached the order of third reading of articles, and the article entitled "Elections" coming up for consideration,

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, it was laid upon the table until to-morrow.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the article entitled "County Officers and County Government;" and the question being upon Mr. HANSCOM's amendment to section eight:

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped that the proposition of the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] presented on a previous day, would prevail. He was strongly opposed to giving the power to the supervisors, as provided for in the original section. It would be productive of much evil, as it would in effect give them the power of breaking down our present county organization. He had no doubt that proper powers could be given to that board, with reasonable limitations.

Mr. BRITAIN expressed himself as being opposed to leaving the regulation of the subject in the hands of the Legislature. He conceived that no possible danger could result to the interests of a county by leaving the regulation of its affairs with the supervisors. They were best acquainted with the wants and wishes of the people of a county; and, in an economical point of view, he considered it more desirable that they should have the control of the county matters.

A slight conversational discussion then ensued, in which Messrs. HANSCOM, J. D. PIERCE, EDMUNDS and BRITAIN participated; after which,

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following as a substitute for the section: "The Legislature shall provide by general laws:

"1. For the laying out and establishing

State and county roads, and for altering the same;

"2. For the erection of bridges;

"3. For the organization of legally established counties;

"4. For the organization of United States surveyed townships by the inhabitants thereof;

"5. For changing the boundaries of organized townships by the board of supervisors, subject to the approval of the electors of said townships."

Mr. HANSCOM liked the proposition of the gentleman better than anything that had as yet been presented. He would withdraw his amendment.

The question then turned upon the following substitute for the section, proposed by Mr. EDMUND's yesterday:

"The Legislature shall, by general laws, confer upon the board of supervisors of their respective counties, power to construct highways and bridges, and to authorize the construction of the same; to lay out and establish roads, and fix the boundaries of townships. Power shall also be conferred upon the inhabitants of any one or more surveyed townships to organize township governments therein."

Mr. COOK inquired if the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS' did not cover more ground than the gentleman intended. It gave the power to organize as many townships as they pleased.

Mr. EDMUNDS replied in the negative. It only gave the inhabitants of one or more surveyed townships, power to organize a government. It provided merely for a joint organization; for it frequently happened in some counties that in the first organization several townships were organized together.

Mr. ARZENO moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "the" in the first line, and inserting the following: "Board of supervisors of all organized counties shall have exclusive power to organize and divide townships; but no new township lines, other than those made for the purpose of organizing new townships, shall be valid, unless a majority of the voters in the territory it is proposed to set off, shall agree to the same in a manner to be prescribed by law."

Mr. EASTMAN moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the word

"counties," the words "by a two-thirds vote."

Mr. E. desired to maintain a system of some kind—like that adopted yesterday. If it were dangerous to trust a majority of the electors yesterday, it was equally, or should be so (to be consistent) to-day; he therefore offered this amendment.

Mr. N. PIERCE said it seemed to him that the amendment of the gentleman from Washtenaw [Mr. EDMUNDS] covered the whole ground that was necessary. He was not afraid to trust the Legislature in this matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND thought the language of the section was just what the new counties required—they were the counties that would be affected by the provision. In the old counties the townships were already organized. In the new counties the townships were organized when there were but few inhabitants.

He thought the original section better than the proposition of the gentleman from Washtenaw. What did it propose? To give the power of regulating township lines to men who would only exercise that power when the necessities and good of the people required it. When a new township was to be organized, who was more competent to do it than the board of supervisors? They were men thoroughly acquainted with the county and the advantages of particular boundaries, and in his judgment the most desirable to regulate this matter.

It had been suggested that there would be but few supervisors in some counties. Even so—could not one or two or three supervisors lay off a county? The Legislature said what would constitute a county, and then there was no difficulty in laying out the county. He believed the Convention came here instructed to give as much power to a county as was compatible with the interests of the people of the county.

Mr. EASTMAN's amendment was negatived.

The amendment proposed by Mr. ARZENO was also disagreed to.

The question then turned upon the substitute offered by Mr. EDMUNDS.

Mr. BRITAIN proposed as a substitute for the same, the proposition which he had previously submitted as a substitute for the section, (8.) He hoped the amendment would be made. He thought the gentleman would see that it accomplished what he sought. It was practicable for the Legislature to make all the laws necessary on the subject; they could invest such powers in this board as they would in their wisdom see fit. He was not by this proposition taking away the power from the board of supervisors, no more than from any other body. He thought, however, that by providing in regard to those powers in the organic law, much time and money would be saved. He was also of opinion that the power of regulating township lines should be left to the board of supervisors.

Mr. ARZENO moved the previous question upon the section, which being sustained, the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. MOORE moved a call of the Convention. Lost.

The question first recurring on the substitute of Mr. BRITAIN for the one proposed by Mr. EDMUNDS, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the proposition rejected as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Axford, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Chapel, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Daniels, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kinne, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Town, Warden, White, Whipple, Witherell, President—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Backus, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, J. Clark, Comstock, Cornell, Crary, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fraick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Moore, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Wells, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman—46.

The question being on striking out the 8th section, and inserting in lieu thereof the proposition of Mr. EDMUNDS,

Mr. CRARY demanded a division of the same.

The question then turned upon striking out, and the yeas and nays being ordered thereon, were had, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Axford, Backus, H. Bartow, Britain, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Choate, J. Clark, Cook, Crary, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Harvey, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Raynale, Robertson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Town, Wait, Warden, White, Williams, Witherell, Woodman, President—45.

S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Wells, Whipple, Whittemore, Willard—38.

So the section was stricken out.

And on the question of inserting the substitute of Mr. EDMUNDS, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the substitute rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Backus, Asahel Brown, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Church, J. Clark, Crary, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Harvey, Hathaway, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, McLeod, Mosher, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, N. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Chapel, Comstock, Choate, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Kinne, Marvin, Moore, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, Wells, Whittemore—45.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to amend the second section by adding after the words "United States," the following:

"Unless a majority of the qualified electors residing in the territory to be affected by such organization shall so elect."

The reason which induced me to offer this amendment grows out of the fact that there are many organizations in this State, for the convenience of the people of which it may become necessary before the end of fifteen years to have a separate organization. I propose to throw about that organization a very strong guard: to require the absolute assent of a majority of those who are to be affected by it. In many of our new counties of small territory, and the islands about the State, they may require to have a separate organization within a few years. If the people desire it, I believe they should have it.

Mr. McLEOD—The exigency referred to by the gentleman occurred on Beaver Island, in Lake Michigan. They are restricted in their territory, and cannot make up sufficient to constitute a county, unless they attach some islands situated at thirty miles distance. I think the people the best judges of their own interests.

Mr. COOK moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "the territory," and inserting in lieu "each county."

Mr. BEARDSLEY was not satisfied with the section as it now stood; perhaps he would be in favor of the amendment if he could understand it; but there was so much noise in his part of the house that he could not hear what was stated by the the chair.

The PRESIDENT read the amendment again.

Mr. HANSCOM thought the word "territory" the most comprehensive term that could be used.

Mr. COOK thought the proposition, if not amended as he had suggested, would be a little vague. The people would have, according to that proposition, no means of legally making known their organization. It might be said, to be sure, that they could petition the Legislature. But in his opinion the Convention should make this provision specific, so as to require that there should be a watch upon those organizations. Why not make it specific, so that the Legislature might know what this Convention meant. This was a proposition to reduce counties to a less dimension than sixteen townships. The gentleman said that the people might possibly desire to cut up their counties; but the people of other counties did not desire to do so by any means. Sixteen townships were as small a number as any county ought ever to organize with, no matter what its population might be.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said the original proposition appeared to him much more clear and expressive than the amendment offered by the last speaker; and also much more indicative of the intention of the Convention. "Territory" comprehended so much of the country that it would include new counties, set off either from old counties, or from territory not yet organized. When the people in this territory desired to make a new county from three or four contiguous counties, under this proposition they would possess the power to take a vote on the subject; and they must not only have the consent of the citizens of the county to be set off, but also of those interested. In fine, there should be a majority of those interested in the matter in favor of the new organization. He thought the original section was better calculated to define the subject.

Mr. DANFORTH expressed himself as being opposed to the amendment of Mr. HANSCOM. He thought that if there were a desire of separating in a county, it would create much confusion and discord amongst the inhabitants of it. In his opinion a county should not be organized with less than sixteen townships.

Mr. BACKUS hoped that neither proposition would be adopted. If he understood the proposition of the gentleman from Oakland aright, it was this, viz: to authorize the organization of a county, either in a new district of land, or in the parts of old counties to be cut off from them, with a less amount of townships than sixteen. Suppose the territory to comprise the new county were to be taken from four counties; the proposition was that a majority of the people in that district were to say whether the county should be organized or not: they were to be the people affected. Who was to be affected by it in reality—the four counties, or the State? Why, in fact, they could organize a county with but a single township in it, under the proposition of the gentleman, [Mr. HANSCOM.] Again, territory interested might be construed to mean the vote of those four counties. For instance, three of those counties might be new, and sparsely populated, and the fourth, a large county with more votes in it than all three combined. This fourth county might desire to form a new county and secure a member for the Legislature, whilst the other counties did not desire it at all; yet under the operation of this proposition they could rifle those new counties of their territory, just to secure a political aim. He should certainly approve of the amendment of the gentleman from Hillsdale, [Mr. Cook,] so that each county should acquiesce in the proposition to dismember.

Mr. HANSCOM did not care much whether the amendment prevailed or not. But he had not supposed that any man in this Convention had the boldness to impose restrictions on the popular will. He had supposed they had been struggling there for two months to give effect to the will of the people, and to give it a controlling influence in the State. Neither had he imagined that gentlemen would oppose the people—if they desired to form a new county, for instance—in giving expression to the popular will. Gentlemen appeared to suppose they were going to divide off the State if they adopted this proposition. In his judgment, cases would arise frequently in the next ten years which would render it necessary to adopt the course proposed. This was the time to make provisions for the contingencies which might arise in relation to this matter.

The gentleman last up referred to four counties. Well, suppose it was proposed to form a county from out them, what course would be pursued? Simply this: a corner would be taken from each; but not until a vote was taken sanctioning the separation, as specified in the proposition. He could not perceive that any evil whatever would result from the proposition.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Chandler, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Cook, Daniels, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hart, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D.

Pierce, N. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, M. Robinson, Skinner, Sturgis, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Wells, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, President—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Backus, Beardsley, Britain, Bush, Carr, Chapel, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Gardiner, Hanscom, Harvey, Lovell, O'Brien, Prevost, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Webster, Witherell, Woodman—24.

The proposition of Mr. HANSCOM, as amended, was then agreed to, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, H. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Bush, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Cornell, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Green, Hanscom, Hascall, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, Robertson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Webster, Wells, Whipple, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman, President—44.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Danforth, Daniels, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Hart, Harvey, Lovell, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Raynale, Redfield, Skinner, Soule, Sullivan, Tiffany, Wait, White, Whittemore—37.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend section 12 by prefixing the following: "The boards of supervisors of all organized counties shall have the power to provide for the laying out of highways and the construction of bridges, and for the organization of townships, under such restrictions and limitations as shall be prescribed by law; and."

M. BRITAIN—I hope no friend of the principle of conferring this kind of power upon the supervisors will support the motion. In truth, while it purports to do a great deal, it does nothing—we gain nothing whatever. After all, it comes back to the legislature, to take from them second hand what portion of this power they may choose to deal out. The friends of this principle purpose, however, to reinstate section 8 as it stood this morning. We say, secure the principle, but not by half-way measures.

Mr. WALKER—I do not know whether the gentleman numbers himself among the friends or opponents of this principle. This much, however, I do know; that I have been requested by a number of its friends to offer this amendment, after the 8th section had been struck out. So far from its conferring any half-way power, it gives the whole power; but the manner in which it is to be exercised is to be under the restriction of the Legislature.

We have been told heretofore, that it was not proper for this body to legislate; that it should establish general principles, confer general powers; and whatever limitations were necessary to be made, should be left in the hands of the Legislature—to their control. Well, this amendment gives to a board of supervisors jurisdiction in relation to roads, bridges and the organization of townships, under such limitations as the Legislature shall see proper to establish. Such, for instance, that they shall not organize any two townships with the same name, and so forth.

The amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. ALVORD, section eleven was amended by striking out "and" in the first line, and inserting in its stead "or."

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following, to stand as a new section:

"The Legislature shall authorize any United States surveyed township, having one hundred and fifty inhabitants therein, to organize for themselves a separate township government; provided the township left contains one hundred and fifty inhabitants."

Mr. WILLIAMS—I think that where people venture into the wilderness and make it their home, they ought to have the right to organize their townships, no matter how small their number may be. I move to strike out "one hundred and fifty inhabitants therein."

Mr. BRITAIN did not know that he should object strenuously to the motion of the gentleman, if it would secure the object sought to be secured by his proposition. But he feared that if the amendment prevailed, it and the original proposition would fall together, because he doubted very much if this Convention would authorize the organization of a township without some restriction in regard to the number of inhabitants in it. But, whatever the Convention did, he hoped they would be consistent with themselves. His object was to save an important principle, which was this, viz: to secure to the people in any U. S. surveyed township to organize for themselves a township government, whether the Legislature would listen to their prayer or not; provided the township left contains 150 inhabitants. This proposition, it should be remarked, did not prohibit the supervisors from organizing the township if it had but six people. But he desired to have the right of organization secured to the people of a township, in the event that the supervisors refused to organize it. He knew that there was nothing more common than for the people of an unorganized township to be compelled to travel over bad roads to get into another, and when such a township asked for an organization, the larger township refused it. He earnestly hoped that the gentleman's [Mr. WILLIAMS'] amendment would not be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS insisted upon his amendment as a matter of sheer justice to those who had settled down in the uncultivated forests of our State, for the purpose of making their home amongst them. He would insist upon it whether the township contained twelve or twelve hundred inhabitants. But he desired to call attention to one matter; it was in relation to the change of the county seat. He would say with some degree of confidence that there would not be, on the first organization of counties, four whose county seats would not be upon the lake shores, or the southern border. Well, it would not be desirable that they should remain there always. The improvement of the county, the increase of its population, and the inconvenience of its situation to those living in the distant parts of the county, by reason of the difficulty and expense of reaching it, would render it necessary to remove the county seat to a central situation. But, would those living in the more thickly populated townships adjacent to the county seat allow those at a distance to remove it? Most assuredly not, if they could prevent it. And he should also remark that the 8th section provided that the location, in case of change, should be designated by two-thirds of the supervisors, and then the change to that location, to be approved of by a majority of the electors of the county. Now, he wanted to have those new townships represented in the board of supervisors; they had as much interest in regard to the location of the county seat as others. For these reasons, apart from the justice of the matter, he was for allowing those men who had penetrated into the country, to have a voice in these things in spite of the board of supervisors.

Mr. DANFORTH moved the previous question on the article, but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. BRITAIN, who desired to modify his proposition by striking out the words "one hundred and."

Mr. J. CLARK submitted the following as a substitute:

"Power shall also be conferred upon the inhabitants of any one or more surveyed township to organize township governments therein."

Mr. DANFORTH renewed his motion; and the previous question having been sustained, the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute (Mr. J. CLARK's) for the proposition of the gentleman from Berrien, (Mr. BRITAIN,) the same was put and carried.

The question being upon the adoption of the same as a new section to the article, it was decided in the negative.

And the article was then ordered to a third reading.

The article entitled "State Officers" was taken from the table.

The question being upon concurring with the amendments made in committee of the whole, and the first amendment being to strike out the words "Attorney General,"

Mr. REDFIELD hoped the Convention would not concur in the amendment. There was an absolute necessity for retaining this officer; in fact he was indispensable. He should say that the matter had received but the very hasty action of the committee of the whole.

Mr. KINGSLEY concurred in the remarks of the gentleman last up. He thought the matter of expense as nothing in comparison with the necessity of retaining this officer. If this officer were dispensed with, the State in many cases would be obliged to have recurrence to members of the bar for advice upon legal questions, and it would cost the State much more than if he were retained. The committee on the subject of "State Officers" had investigated the matter thoroughly, and reported in favor of retaining an officer of this character.

Mr. CORNELL was of opinion that the officer should be retained.

Mr. WHITTEMORE remarked that the Attorney General ought to be the officer to advise the Auditor General upon all legal questions which might arise in the department of the latter. He thought it impossible to dispense with this officer.

Mr. WITHERELL coincided with the last speaker in the necessity of retaining this officer. He hoped the Convention would retain him; not for the purpose of making a great array of office holders, but because of the expediency of his retention. He had enquired and found that the expense would be very great if our State officers, or the Executive, were obliged to resort to various lawyers for advice upon legal questions; and as a matter of course, there was a probability of a difference of opinion. If we had no Attorney General, no doubt less inquiry would be made; but, notwithstanding, he thought the cheapest mode would be to have an officer of the kind. He would therefore vote against concurring with the committee of the whole.

Mr. HANSCOM observed that several gentlemen had expressed opinions in favor of retaining the Attorney General, but he was in favor of agreeing with the amendment of the committee for the reasons given by those gentlemen. Let gentlemen take the history of the State and see who have been the men who have filled this office. He would venture to say that they were men not more capable of determining such questions as had been alluded to, than any of the other State officers. The officer was in his opinion an entire humbug.

Mr. WHIPPLE remarked that in his opinion the office was necessary, and would predict that if it were not retained the cost which would be incurred by the State would be much more than the salary of the Attorney General.

Mr. KINGSLEY expressed his concurrence in the opinion of the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE.] He saw an obvious necessity for retaining the office. There was an amount of cases recurring from time to time, in which it was necessary to have the opinion of the Attorney General.

Mr. HANSCOM inquired if in many important cases the State had not taken the opinion of private lawyers?

Mr. KINGSLEY still thought it inexpedient to dispense with the office.

Mr. COOK was in favor of one of two things, viz: either to make it a constitutional office or to prohibit its being established at all. He should prefer, too, that the salary of the office should be fixed in this constitution. If it were left to the Legislature, the salary would be always fluctuating, until it got to such a high point that no one would ask to raise it any higher. In 1846, when the Legislature was about to fix this salary, the House of Representatives thought three hundred dollars a year sufficient. The subject, however, occupied a good deal of the attention of the Legislature, until they finally settled it at five hundred dollars. The law of 1847 allowed the Attorney General his expenses. The alteration of the law in regard to the salary at that time was not known, he would venture to say, to fifteen members of the Legislature; in fact it was got through in an "omnibus bill," got up on the last night of the session, and so became the law. So it would be with our State officers, if we did not fix their salaries by this constitution. We would have change after change, until at last they reached to such a point that no one would ask to raise them. We could not make a reduction in expenditure by legislative action; we might do it by constitutional provision. The Legislature, he thought, would not abolish this office, and therefore it became necessary for this Convention to make some provision on the subject.

The Convention refused to concur in the amendment.

The second amendment reported from the committee of the whole was concurred in.

The third amendment reported was then taken under consideration,—to insert in section one, after the word "years," the following: "and each of whom shall keep an office at the seat of government."

Mr. CHAPEL inquired what was the necessity of the Attorney General keeping an office at the seat of government? He conceived that it was not necessary that this officer should be obliged to sit himself down here, as he had to attend to the public prosecutions throughout the State.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "each of whom," the words "except the Attorney General and Superintendent of Public Instruction."

Mr. REDFIELD said, that even if the Attorney General were compelled to keep an office here, it was not to be inferred from that fact, that he would be here all the time. He thought it rather stringent to make it obligatory upon the Attorney General or the Commissioner of the Land office to keep their offices at Lansing. He would be in favor of keeping the Commissioner here, perhaps, but he thought there was no impropriety in having the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction located here.

Mr. McLEOD was in favor of keeping the Attorney General in Lansing, if it were only for his sins. (Laughter.) In fact, an Attorney General living in Detroit, made the office a mere accidental concern in his practice. It was highly proper that he should sit out here, for the expense incurred by sending him communications would amount almost to the salary which would be given him. He should sit here to answer the inquiries which the other State officers—as the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. BACKUS] would say, and who was so fond of large words—would "propound to him." (Laughter.)

Mr. WOODMAN was opposed to a part of the amendment, [Mr. WITHERELL'S.] He thought the Superintendent of Public Instruction should have his office at the seat of government.

Mr. BACKUS—The gentleman from Mackinac [Mr. McLEOD] has used the word "propound," in reference to me. I would substitute for it, "expedient." I want to have the Attorney General to give light; and if his office be to give light, I think it would be necessary that he should expound the law to the State officers. If this officer be required at all, I think it is at the seat of government, to advise the other State officers in the discharge of their duties. Here is the only place he is required, because the Convention have already settled that there shall be district attorneys to perform in their respective counties the duties which the State may be required to be performed in those counties. I take it that no man will be placed in the office of district attorney unless competent to discharge all the duties appertaining to it. Then what do we want with an Attorney General? But, if we are to have an Attorney General, why not make him reside here, the same as you do your Auditor or Treasurer, or Secretary of State? If he be a necessary officer, have him here; but if he be an unnecessary officer, why have him at all? His having his office here does not superinduce the necessity of his always remaining here, no more than do the other State officers; but here is the place for his office. I think he should be here, not only for the purpose of propounding questions, but of expounding them also.

The question being upon Mr. WITHERELL'S amendment, a division of the question being had, the motion to insert "except the Attorney General," was lost.

The residue of the amendment was also disagreed to. The amendment of the committee of the whole to sections two, three, four and five, were severally concurred in; when, on motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT, and resumed the consideration of the article entitled "State Officers."

The question being upon concurring with the committee of the whole in the amendments to the sixth section, they were severally concurred in. The article being open for amendment,

Mr. REDFIELD proposed the following as a substitute for section six:

"There shall be elected at each general election an agent of the State Prison, who shall hold his office two years."

Mr. REDFIELD said, as one of the committee reporting the section, that he would admit the committee was governed more by the provision of the N. Y. constitution than by any other thing. The policy in that State upon the subject was entirely different from what it was here, they having reduced their prison discipline to a complete system. Here it was different, as he had said. No doubt some policy could be adopted by which to make the State prison pay a large proportion, if not the entire of its own expenses. Wherever that policy was adopted, it had been found to be a good one. It would be time enough to make permanent provisions on the subject; but until then, the matter should be left under the control of the Legislature, to determine it fixedly. He thought it better to elect an agent who would be accountable to the State for the management of the affairs of the State prison.

Mr. STOREY moved to amend the original section as amended in committee of the whole, by striking out all after the word "constitution" in second line, up to and inclusive of the word "hereafter" in the sixth line, but withdrew the amendment at the suggestion of members.

Mr. N. PIERCE was in favor of the proposition, [Mr. REDFIELD's.] The yearly expenses of the State prison were about $11,000 since the organization of the State. It was well ascertained by the Legislature that provision could be made by law so that the prison would not cost the State more than from two to three thousand dollars a year. The Legislature came near passing a law which would have effected that reduction; but it was not passed—if it had been, the salaries would have been reduced, which must cost something like $8,000 a year. It was altogether better for the State to keep a less number of officers; the more officers the more salaries, and consequently the greater the expenses to the people. He was satisfied last winter that a great reduction could be safely effected of the expenses, both to the State and the prisoners. He was in favor of hiring them out. Contracts were offered to take them last year; and all that was wanted was the act of the Legislature. In his opinion if we appointed a board of inspectors or such like, we would have a complete swarm of officers at an enormous expense to the State; but, if we had only one man to superintend this business the cost would be inconsiderable.

Mr. REDFIELD withdrew his proposition.

Mr. CHAPEL observed, it struck him that the section as it now stood was not such as we wanted. He was opposed to leaving three officers to control this prison. He was not certain but that one individual, elected once in two years, and responsible to the people to superintend all the operations of the prison, would not save the expense of the two other individuals whom this article proposed to elect, whose duties it would be to supervise the affairs of the prison. He thought one officer of this kind, elected once in two years decidedly preferable to three. If it should be found necessary to have some appointing power to appoint subordinate officers, or fill up vacancies in situations in the prison, it was the business of the legislature to provide for such. Why not fix it in some manner that the Governor should be consulted; so, that a man wishing to obtain a situation in the State prison should approach the Governor through some party? He did not like any part of the section. In his opinion it would have the effect of generating a sort of hot bed of politicians. He would move to strike out the entire section.

The motion was put, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. REDFIELD, section two was amended by striking out "1852" and inserting in lieu "1853."

Mr. EDMUNDS moved to amend the same section by striking out "day," and inserting instead the word "Monday."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE proposed "Wednesday" instead of "Monday," so as to make the provision correspond with the article upon the Legislative department.

Mr. EDMUNDS accepted the modification suggested.

The proposition as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. MOORE moved to reconsider the vote by which the Convention refused to except the Attorney General and Superintendent of Public Instruction from the operation of the clause in the first section, providing for offices being kept at the seat of government by the State officers; and also the vote by which the Convention concurred in the amendment to the section made by the committee of the whole. He could see no reason why they should be compelled to live here; their duties in a great measure would call them away from this place.

Mr. COOK hoped the vote would be reconsidered. He believed that if the section were to remain as it now stood, it would induce the establishment of high salaries. If the Attorney General were obliged to reside here, of course we must pay a larger salary than is now given, in order to secure the services of a competent man. If it should prove necessary hereafter that these officers should live here, it was always within the power of the Legislature to pass a law requiring them so to do.

Mr. CHAPEL had been informed that the article did not contemplate these officers residing here; it was only that they should keep their offices at Lansing.

Mr. HANSCOM would reiterate what he had before said—that if there were any necessity for this officer at all, he was required at the seat of government. He was opposed to the reconsideration of this vote.

It was well known that the principal business of the Attorney General was with the Executive part of the government, to advise and direct them upon all legal questions in the discharge of their duties. The Convention had determined to retain this office, which, in his opinion was worse than useless, and had been so for the last fifteen years—then let the incumbent be here, where his presence was required, if it were required at all.

He should like to know why the State, when it had some great interest on hand, could not go and employ a lawyer and pay him for his advice, the same as a private individual would? But as we were to have an Attorney General, he wanted him to be here—to be on the spot, ready to give advice to the other officers of State whenever any difficulty should arise. If he were not to remain here, they would be obliged to communicate with him by letter. Ten chances to one he would be absent at Niles or Kalamazoo, or some such places, attending to his own business, when an important question would arise here at the seat of government, upon which his advice was required, yet it was not to be had. He would say again if we were to have this officer, make him have his office where his presence was most needed.

Mr. WHIPPLE thought the gentleman entirely wrong in his conception of the duties of the Attorney General. In his [Mr. HANSCOM's] opinion, the duties of the office were entirely to give advice to the other officers of the State. Even if they were only that, then the office is at least not "a humbug." But he [Mr. W.] did not so understand them. The Attorney General was not only called upon to give information to the officers of State, but to the Legislature, so far as he could understand from reading the journals of that body. The gentleman seemed to have forgotten one very important part of the duties of this officer. He should like to know who represented the interests of the State in the Supreme Court, unless it was the Attorney General? Suppose a man were convicted of murder, or the State involved in some very important case; why, said the gentleman, [Mr. HANSCOM,] let the State retain some respectable counsel to argue the case. If the gentleman were retained, it would do very well. But he [Mr. W.] would admonish the gentleman and this Convention that such a course as that suggested would cost the State a large amount. The cases argued in the Supreme Court by the Attorney General during the last two years, would have cost the State (if a "private lawyer" were retained) some $1,500 a year. The gentleman did not practice in the Supreme Court—his practice was confined to jury business—but if he would look into the books, he would find that there were many cases in which the State was deeply interested: all of which had to be attended to by the Attorney General. He should say he had studied the history of this people to very little purpose, if he understood that officer was worthless and unnecessary. He would not say that some substitute for an Attorney General might not be obtained. He knew it was competent for this Convention or for the Legislature to say there shall be no Attorney General. That question was one merely of expediency.

But, it could not be reasonably denied that the interests of the State required some responsible law officer. In regard to the question of expense, it was a mere drop in the bucket. Our Attorney General did not receive the same amount of salary that was given to such officers in other States. He admitted that his whole time was not taken up by the business of the State, and hence he could practice in the other courts and attend to his own affairs. Such should necessarily be the case, by reason of the salary given him. In fine, he held this officer to be a most important one.

If the gentleman suggested a substitute, he [Mr. W.] was content. However, he really did not know how the interests of the State could be represented in the judicial department of the government unless by such an officer, or some such other, no matter by what name we called him. He should be glad to see some substitute adopted, if the Convention should so determine. But he was willing to leave the whole thing in regard to retaining or abolishing the office, to the Legislature; though his predilection would be to make it a constitutional office.

Some allusion had been made with regard to those who had filled this office. It was certainly invidious, perhaps, to make any discrimination; but so far as the present incumbent was concerned, in his [Mr. W's] opinion, he had filled it with very much effect and dignity.

Mr. McLEOD remarked that the reasons given by the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. WHIPPLE] were those which in his mind proved the necessity of having the Attorney General here at Lansing. He represented the State interests, and he was the advisor to the Legislature, said the gentleman. Well, it was here the Legislature met, and it was here that the Attorney General should keep his office and be present, in order that the Legislature, when necessary, could consult with him, and not be obliged to travel upon those dreadful roads to Detroit, to get an opinion from him. (Laughter.) Besides this, it was here that the public offices were situated, and that was another reason for his being at the capital. As to his attendance on the supreme court, there was no difficulty. He could go as well from Lansing to a term of that court, as from Detroit. It was suggested in relation to the salary of this officer, that if we compel him to reside here, we should have to give him a larger salary than if he resided in Detroit or elsewhere. Detroit was a sort of nursery for Attorney Generals, and perhaps with their practice there they could afford to take the office with a small salary. But, no doubt, the salary which the chairman of the committee on salaries would report, would be sufficient, with some practice, to pay a respectable lawyer. He could see no reason why the Attorney General should not reside at the capital.

Mr. MOORE said that when he moved a reconsideration, he thought keeping an office here equivalent to residing in this place. The object which he had in view was, to get rid of the expense that might accrue in regard to this officer. For he supposed that if the Attorney General lived at any other point, he would perform all the duties of the office at a less expense to the State. He had supposed it would answer all purposes if he lived where he pleased, so that he discharged the duties of the office satisfactorily. As to the Superintendent of Public Instruction, it was necessarily his duty to go through the State, to see how educational matters were going on in all parts of the State. His office was not a mere clerkship operation.

Mr. HANSCOM fully concurred in what was said by the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. WHIPPLE] in regard to the present Attorney General. He was a gentleman of the best abilities, and discharged the duties of his office with much satisfaction to the State.

Mr. WITHERELL hoped the vote would be reconsidered. There was not, nor would there be for ten years, a necessity for having the Attorney General reside here. It would require the Legislature to give a large salary, in order to get a competent man to take the office and live here. If he lived in another part of the State where he could enjoy his practice, of course the compensation given him would be much less.

Mr. DANFORTH remarked that hereafter it would be necessary, perhaps, to hold terms of our supreme court, north of this, the practice of which an Attorney General residing here might avail himself of. He considered it very proper that the Attorney General should reside here.

Mr. WHIPPLE was satisfied that it was at present unnecessary.

Mr. BUSH followed in opposition to the reconsideration of the vote. He contended that more benefit than injury would accrue to the State from the residence of the Attorney General at this point.

The question being upon reconsidering the vote, the Convention refused to reconsider.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to amend the 1st section, by striking out the word "a" before "Superintendent," in the 1st line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "who shall be."

Mr. CRARY said that if the gentleman proposed to unite the offices of Auditor and Secretary, or of Secretary and Treasurer, it might be perhaps proper. But that a man educated in Massachusetts where they had a board of education, should come here at this late day and propose to unite the office of Secretary of State and that of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, he knowing the benefits which had resulted from the latter office, surprised him (Mr. C.) somewhat. The combination of any of those offices, other than that to which he had referred, was in some instances perhaps proper; but the combination of the offices of Secretary of State and Superintendent would, in his mind, prove most disastrous in its results. All men of experience on the subject of Education, Horace Mann, of Mass., amongst the number, had strongly recommended the separation of the office of Superintendent from that of Secretary of State. The States almost without exception, appointed a separate officer to attend to this most important branch of public business, for in truth if there were a business which demanded a separate head to transact its details, it was this.

Mr. CORNELL had been informed by a gentleman who stood high upon the subject of education in the State of N. Y., that if those offices were combined, it would be impossible for any one man to discharge the duties of both as they should be.

Mr. WILLIAMS remarked, it was notorious that two or three of the offices of this State had become sinecures. If the Superintendents of Instruction had been Manns or Randalls, and had gone into every section of the State endeavoring to advance the cause of education he would never have made the motion. But that was not the course which had been adopted. What he desired to effect was, to place the whole educational system of this State upon such a basis that it would possess some comprehensiveness; be a benefit to the State, and carried as it was in New England, to every child in the State. He made the motion in order to do away with sinecures in this State, and when the time came on in regard to free schools, the gentleman last up would find him going as far as the furthest. But, when sinecure offices were in question they were a different thing entirely from taking care of education.

He thought the office of Treasurer should embrace also that of Commissioner of the Land office, and that for the same reason; because they were two sinecures. It was stated somewhere that the last Commissioner of the Land Office employed very little of his time in the performance of the duties of his office. And, it was said (no doubt correctly) that he was better employed preaching the gospel to the benighted; (laughter,) whilst an unfortunate, overworked clerk, was obliged to toil until midnight to do up the business of the office, the Commissioner paying a small percentage on his salary for discharging the duties which he himself should have performed. In fact the Commissioner was made a complete sinecurist in our government.

Mr. WOODMAN said that the Superintendent of Public Instruction went into nearly every county of the State. He had been in his county and opened schools there. He had not risen to enter into any discussion upon this subject, only to vindicate the late Superintendent. He was a most competent man for the office; and in truth he never saw one more warmed up, both soul and mind, in the cause of public education, than was the late Superintendent; and, if he recollected aright, the Legislature found the services of that officer to be of such a character that they raised his salary. He was opposed to merging the two offices into one.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—This, sir, is a question in which I feel much interest, and I deem it one of the most important that has been presented to the consideration of this Convention. It is one which will affect your school system, and I deem it to be one which will have an important bearing on the interests of the State—not only for one year, but for years to come. And what, I ask, has given this State the pre-eminence as a new State which it now enjoys upon the subject of education, but that article in your constitution which has laid the foundation of your educational system? And why is it that those States have adopted our system—and why is it that other States south of us, with precisely the same privileges that we have had, squandered their school and university lands, so that in Illinois and Indiana there are thousands who have never been within the walls of a school house? It is because we have a few who have continually kept this subject of education before the public eye.

It has been said, I understand, that the office of Superintendent of public Instruction has been "a sinecure." From my own personal experience, having had the honor to hold that office for four and a half years, I may say it is not so. During that time I visited every organized county in the State, and drew up all the laws passed during that period in relation to common schools. In my first report I advocated that system which the State should adopt, that is, the free school system.

Why is it, I would ask, that Prussia stands at the head of education in Europe? For the simple reason that she has a Minister of Public Instruction to superintend and foster everything relating to the education of her people. I am entirely opposed to the motion of the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WALKER considered that it would be a grievous blow to the cause of education if this Convention should discontinue the office which has been referred to. If there were any remissness in the discharge of the duties of the office heretofore, he hoped the Legislature would take such action as would render the office more efficient, if it lacked anything on that score, and less of a sinecure if it had ever been such.

Mr. WILLIAMS here withdrew the amendment, and moved to amend section 1 by inserting after the words "Secretary of State," the words "who shall be ex officio State Treasurer."

The yeas and nays being ordered thereon, were had and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson,

H. Bartow, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chapel, Choate, Church, Comstock, Cook, Crary, Daniels, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, Moore, Mosher, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Webster, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Burns, Bush, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Hixon, Kingsley, Lee, McLeod, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, White, Whipple, President—45.

The article was then ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. McLEOD in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Education."

The question was announced as being upon the amendment offered by Mr. FRALICK on the 26th of June.

The amendment reads in this form:—"Amend section 3 by striking out all after "shall" in first line, and inserting "provide for a system of common schools, by which a school shall be kept up and supported in each school district, at least three months in every year; and any school district neglecting to keep up and support such a school, may be deprived of its equal proportion of the interest of the public fund. And the Legislature may levy a tax on the whole taxable property of the several townships or cities of this State for the support of said schools."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to amend the amendment by striking out "three months," and inserting in stead thereof "six months." We did not reach the desired object (said Mr. VAN V.) by keeping the school for but three months in the year. All the information which children would acquire in three months, would be lost during the other nine months when they would have no school. He hoped the amendment would be modified as he had pointed out.

Mr. FRALICK observed in reply, that it seemed to him we would not have sufficient money to keep the schools open for more than three months. He thought the smaller districts would not be able to keep a school for six months. If they were compelled to do so, as was suggested, it would operate as a very severe hardship upon them. It had been suggested to him that we should levy the school tax upon the whole taxable property of the State; if so desired he would make the amendment.

Mr. WALKER—The chief point to be attained in this provision is to establish a principle, taking a low minimum as to the time which it will be required for a school kept open upon this plan, leaving it to the Legislature to extend that principle as it may feel disposed. In fact there is but very little difference between this proposition and the section as reported by the committee. There is one thing in especial which I dislike in this proposition, and that is, that districts not keeping the school for the time specified, shall forfeit its proportion of the interest of the public fund.

I should much rather leave it to the Legislature to attach some other penalty, or that we should fix some other penalty in the section. The Massachusetts law requires that the district shall forfeit double the amount which they are behind, to be applied for the benefit of schools in the district.

Mr. W. here went into an examination of the statistics bearing upon the subject of the revenue and taxation by which the present system of education was supported, for the purpose of showing that it requires a less amount to sustain schools upon the free principle than upon any other.

The question being upon Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH's motion, it was put and lost.

Mr. ALVORD moved to strike out all after the word "year," in the 4th line of the amendment, to the word, "and," in the 6th line. His object in making the motion was to leave the section as it ought to be left, divested of detail; so that the Legislature could make all necessary regulations in regard to this subject. It seemed to him to be entirely useless to go into a matter of detail in a constitutional provision.

Mr. CRARY hoped the amendment just now proposed, would not prevail. He had drawn up an amendment more stringent in its provisions than the section as it now stands. He thought a district should keep the school for three months, or not get any at all. If we made it obligatory upon them in a constitutional provision, they would know that they were under the necessity of keeping the school for three months in the year.

Mr. WALKER found some serious difficulties in the amendment, [Mr. FRALICK's.] In one part it proposed that the Legislature should provide for the keeping of schools, &c. We then provided that the Legislature might levy a tax on the whole taxable property of the State, if they saw fit. Well, if the amount which the Legislature proposed to raise was not sufficient to support the schools, the township would forfeit the fund.

Mr. FRALICK thought the townships had nothing to do with the question, whatever; they never had. He conceived that the gentleman had mistaken the question.

Mr. ALVORD here withdrew his amendment.

Mr. CRARY moved to amend the amendment in the following manner, viz: to strike out all after the word "and," in the 4th line, to the word "and," in the 6th line, and insert "any school district neglecting to keep up and support a school wherein instruction in the English language is conducted, for three months in each year, shall be deprived, for the year next succeeding, of its equal proportion of the income of the public fund."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARDEN moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "several townships or cities of this."

Mr. WALKER thought the principle would operate very unjustly to the new portions of the State. He had made an examination in regard to the amount of the school fund distributed in the different counties in the year 1849, and of the amount required to be raised for school purposes. By an examination of the tables (to be seen elsewhere) it would be found as an almost universal rule that the new counties would have to raise by taxation much more than the amount to be distributed to them out of the school fund.

In some counties they would be obliged to tax two cents on the dollar on the basis of the distribution. On that account he thought there was something due to that section of the State. From the many inconveniences to which the new counties were subjected, by the sparseness of their population, and the great expense which was attendant on the support of their schools, he considered it but just that they should have the benefit of the tax upon the non-resident lands. It was known that a larger number could be educated in a thickly populated portion of the State, and for a longer period, than in those parts which were thinly settled. He would state, however, that the county of Wayne would raise by taxation more than it would receive from the general fund. It resulted from taxation on the increased valuation of property in the city of Detroit, over the farming sections of the county. Macomb county, on the other hand, would receive three or four hundred dollars more, under the distribution of the general fund, than she would be obliged to raise by taxation. The new counties ought to have the benefit of the tax on the non-resident lands, to be applied to the support of their schools. They would necessarily have to undergo many inconveniences from their situation—their schools would be small, and consequently it would require much more to educate their scholars than in the older settled counties.

Mr. N. PIERCE did not agree with the gentleman last up in what he said relative to the hardships to which new settled counties were subject. He thought such inconveniences as were alluded to, merely temporary. He wanted to know why a county with five hundred inhabitants must tax the whole non-resident land. He would like to be informed why a county should take his land, for instance, and tax it where he sent no children to school. He had yet to learn that the children of one county could not be as well educated as another. If Macomb county could not raise sufficient money, he would say take it from the State tax; so in regard to Calhoun or any other county. It was a State policy he desired to see adopted in this matter; one by which the blessings of education would be diffused amongst all.

Mr. STURGIS was in favor of raising a State tax for educational purposes, and not a county or township tax. There were many counties possessing a large amount of taxable property, that had in reality no more scholars to educate than those not possessing one-half that amount.

Mr. WILLIAMS desired to observe all courtesy towards gentlemen on this floor. He would be allowed to say, however, that there was such a thing as theory, and such a thing as practice. He desired to have a State tax, in order to have justice done to both the settled and the unsettled portions of the State. He would put it to gentlemen and ask, if we enjoined the people of the counties to assess themselves, would they get anything more than they would get under a State assessment? The people of each county sparsely populated would assess themselves just enough to educate their own children, and would let an immense amount of property go untaxed. Thus the whole State must lose.

There was one difficulty which occurred to him as conclusive on this whole matter of putting this tax upon any smaller district than the entire State. The matter was very fully discussed in committee of the whole. The difficulty was in effect this: in New York the system which was adopted, required that the schools should be supported largely by taxation of the individual, and enough raised to keep up a school for a given number of months in the year. What was the result? Simply this; the rich and the poor were arrayed against each other, and the childless were opposed to those who had children. How much money should be raised was a subject of fierce contention; sometimes one kind, and sometimes another kind of people resisting. Those who paid the least, generally resisted the most. As well as he recollected, the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] had had a letter from a distinguished friend of education, in which he referred to the difficulty then existing in the State of N. Y., in relation to this school question, and stated that the whole State was rife with these difficulties, creating almost universal excitement.

Here, then, were two objections fatal to the views advanced by the chairman of the committee on education. Any plan that was impracticable was not only unjust to that portion of the State for which all his sympathies were excited, but was also an injury to the whole State. He believed that the whole State should support every portion of its government, and necessarily to educate the whole people. He laid it down as an axiom that the whole property should educate the whole people.

Again, we could probably tax the whole property of the State on some uniform and general plan more economically, and distribute it in the already necessary distribution of the primary school fund, with less waste than upon any other plan whatever. Not only so, but if we left it to townships and counties, the administration would be always conflicting and unsatisfactory. If we had forty assessments, by forty counties for the school tax, we should have just as many different school systems.

He would go for any uniform system that reached every person in the State, and taxed equally all the property of the State; and in his opinion it was the duty of the committee to construct and organize a system that was efficient, just, comprehensive and more than all, perfectly practicable.

Mr. FRALICK said, it appeared to him that the gentleman had misconceived the question. It appeared by his argument that this matter of taxation was to be left to the counties or townships. The gentleman was wrong there. It was to be a tax levied by the Legislature.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I was arguing a different question. The question now under consideration is whether you make it a local or a State tax.

Mr. FRALICK (continuing)—thought he understood the gentleman's argument. It amounted to the same thing, for it was still a State tax; the only difference was as to the distribution of the money in the township. He did not desire to make a great State system whereby the money would have to go through a dozen toll gates, every man having something off it. He wanted to have the money available whenever it was required, for in fact the school fund went through so many operations now, that we got it when the teacher should have been paid five months previous. Instead of getting it in the winter, they did not receive it until June. What he particularly desired was, that the money raised in a township remain in it, so that it might be always available.

Mr. HANSCOM was of opinion that both the systems proposed were wrong. He was in favor of leaving the Legislature to determine how this tax should be raised. Let them try one mode of taxation first, and if that did not work well, they could then try another.

Mr. BUSH was in favor of having a tax imposed upon all the taxable property of the State, to be fairly and equitably distributed, so that every scholar should have his quota.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the committee rose, reported progress and asked and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, (38th day,) July 24.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

REPORTS.

Mr. BRITAIN, from the committee on finance and taxation, submitted

ARTICLE —.

Finance and Taxation.

Sec. 1. 1st. All specific taxes shall be applied in paying the interest of the university and primary school funds, in defraying the current expenses of the State, and in paying the interest of the State debt, in the order herein recited.

2d. The Legislature shall provide for an annual tax, sufficient, with other resources of the State, to pay the estimated expenses of the State, and the interest of the State debt.

3d. The Legislature shall also, by taxes, supply any deficiency which may occur in the resources of the State.

Sec. 2. 1st. The Legislature, in addition to the above named taxes, shall provide by law for a sinking fund, of at least twenty thousand dollars a year, to commence in eighteen hundred and fifty-one, with compound interest at six per cent. per annum, and an annual increase of at least five per cent.

2d. Said sinking fund shall be applied solely to the payment and extinguishment of the principal of the State debt, other than the amounts due to the university and primary school funds, and said tax shall be continued so long as shall be necessary to secure the extinguishment of the existing funded and fundable debt.

3d. Said fundable debt may only be funded or redeemed at a value not exceeding that established by law in eighteen hundred and forty-eight.

Sec. 3. The State may, to meet casual deficits or failures in revenue, or expenses not provided for, contract debts; but such debts, direct and contingent, shall not in the aggregate at any one time exceed thousand dollars; and the moneys arising from the loans creating such debts shall be applied to the purposes for which they were obtained, or the payment of debts so contracted, and for no other purpose whatever.

Sec. 4. The State may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, and defend the State in time of war; but the money arising from the contracting of such debts, shall be applied to the purpose for which it was raised, or to repay such debts, and to no other purpose whatever.

Sec. 5. No money shall be paid out of the treasury of this State, or any of its funds, or any of the funds under its management, except in pursuance of appropriations made by law.

Sec. 6. The credit of the State shall not in any manner be given, or loaned to, or in aid of, any individual, association, or corporation.

Sec. 7. No scrip, certificate or other evidence of State indebtedness whatsoever, shall be issued, except for the redemption of stock previously issued, or for such debts as are expressly authorized in this article.

Sec. 8. The State shall never subscribe for, or become the owner of, or interested in, the stock of any company, association, or corporation.

Sec. 9. The State shall never be a party to or interested in any work of internal improvement, nor engaged in carrying out any such work, except in the expenditure of grants or donations of land, or other property made to the State.

Sec. 10. The State may continue to collect all specific taxes now accruing to the treasury under existing laws. And the Legislature may provide for the collection of specific taxes from such banking, rail road, plank road and other corporations, hereafter formed or created, as they may deem expedient.

Sec. 11. The Legislature shall provide a uniform rule of taxation, except upon property paying specific taxes; and taxes shall be levied upon such property as the Legislature shall prescribe.

Sec. 12. All assessments hereafter authorized shall be made upon property at its cash value.

Sec. 13. The Legislature shall provide by law for an equalization of assessments upon all taxable property, except that paying specific taxes, by a State board, in eighteen hundred and fifty-one, and on every fifth year thereafter.

Sec. 14. Every law which imposes, continues or revives a tax, shall distinctly state the tax, and the object to which it is to be applied; and it shall not be sufficient to refer to any other law to fix such tax or object.

Which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. STOREY moved to recommit the article entitled "State Officers," to the committee on that subject, with instructions to insert the following therein, to stand as section six:

"Three Inspectors of the State Prison shall be elected at the general election which shall be held next after the adoption of this constitution, one of whom shall hold his office for two years, one for four years, and one for six years. The board of State canvassers shall on the first Monday of January next succeeding such general election, meet at the capitol and determine by lot which of said Inspectors shall hold his office for two years, which for four years, and which for six years. And there shall be one elected at each general election thereafter, who shall hold his office for six years. The Inspectors shall have the charge and superintendence of the State prison, and shall appoint all the officers therein. All vacancies in the office of Inspector shall be filled by the Governor till the next election."

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the same was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Education," Mr. McLEOD in the chair.

The question being upon Mr. WARDEN's amendment, the same prevailed.

Mr. FBALICK's amendment as amended, was then disagreed to.

The question then recurring upon Mr. CORNELL's substitute, offered on the 26th June last, which as amended, is as follows: "The Legislature may establish free schools throughout the State, and provide for their support. After applying the primary school fund and such other funds as shall be set apart for the support of such schools, the balance shall be raised by a State tax."

Mr. WITHERELL moved to strike out "shall" in fourth line, and insert "may."

There will (said Mr. W.) in a few years be a large fund at the disposal of the State. I should be disposed to leave it to be applied for this purpose, and if any necessity exists, a State tax might be levied.

Mr. GALE—I am opposed to any dictation of manner as to the way the Legislature shall act. By prescribing the manner it leaves nothing discretionary with the Legislature. I have drawn up a substitute which at a proper time I propose to offer, as follows: "The Legislature shall establish a system of primary schools within five years, and as nearly free as may be deemed practicable."

This (said Mr. G.) is free from all details. It leaves it discretionary with the Legislature, with instructions to make it as nearly free and at as early a period as is deemed practicable. If a State tax is deemed inexpedient, then a tax might be levied upon towns, cities and villages. If the latter is not so considered, then a State tax might be levied; but if we fasten a system upon the Legislature they have no other alternative but to follow it out as prescribed; and it might not prove the best mode.

The amendment of Mr. WITHERELL was lost.

Mr. COOK moved to strike out "State" in fourth line. Which motion was negatived.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the word "may" in first line, was stricken out, and "shall" inserted.

Mr. CORNELL's substitute was then disagreed to.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following as a substitute for section three:

"The Legislature shall, within five years from the adoption of this constitution, provide by law for a system of primary schools, to be kept free and without charge for tuition to all children between the ages of four and twenty. Such schools to be kept at least three months in each year, in each school district of the State."

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out "within five years;" but the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. MASON—I am in favor of the proposition of Mr. HANSCOM, that we shall within five years adopt some system of free schools. In the course of five years the position of this State will be very much changed, and we cannot tell what will then be the best plan of taxation. I hope that if that is not adopted something similar will be.

Mr. WALKER—Before the question is taken upon the substitute, I wish to read my substitute. We have had a meeting of the committee and have unanimously agreed upon a substitute, to which I wish to call the attention of the House before action is taken upon the substitute of the gentleman from Oakland:

"The Legislature shall establish by law, a system of primary schools. Such schools shall be kept in each and every school district, for at least three months in each year, free and without charge for tuition, to all children between the ages of four and eighteen years. Any deficiency that may exist after the distribution of the income from the primary school fund, shall be raised by a tax upon the whole taxable property in the State. The English language shall be taught in such schools."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I hope that the substitute of my colleague will not prevail. We have had a meeting of the committee, and have agreed upon the substitute as read by the chairman, [Mr. WALKER.] After due consideration of the question, we came to the conclusion that the substitute will meet the views of a large majority of this body. I hope it will be adopted. No time is limited when the Legislature shall carry it into effect. The committee thought it best to leave the subject to them. If limited and the time passed, they might say that the question is put to rest; therefore we thought it the best to leave it an open question, and thus meet the views as expressed in committee of the whole yesterday, and we were anxious to meet the views of the delegates and the requirements of the people. It is conceded that free schools are wanted, and should be supported by a universal tax throughout the State, and that free schools should be instituted as soon as practicable.

It has been remarked that schools should be free to all—that the children of the State were the property of the State—that the State was responsible for the education of its children. For that reason we think a State tax is the most proper, and would avoid many difficulties that would grow out of the levying of taxes on the towns and cities. It has been said that schools should be as free as the air we breathe, or the water we drink. Our sources of education should be like the rays of light, penetrating the darkness. If we adopt this system we shall see our State take an exalted position among our sister States of the Union.

Mr. HANSCOM—I do not like the substitute of the committee. With all due deference, it is, I think, subject to two objections: first, it says that all deficiencies that exist after the distribution of the income, shall be raised by a State tax. Now, sir, I would leave the Legislature to provide the taxation in the manner they deem best. We may get a donation of land from Congress; if so, it might be applied instead of a State tax. If they think that is the best way, they will do it; but I do not think they should be bound or limited in the mode of raising a tax. It imposes no imperative duty upon the Legislature, at all; it merely requires them to do it, without fixing a limitation when it shall be done. I will go further than my colleague, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH.] He talks loudly and largely, and does not take the means to consummate his object. I do not mean to talk so largely and leave it so vaguely. I wish to render it obligatory upon future legislators to make some provision to accomplish what we are seeking.

Mr. WALKER—It seems to me there is no such restriction required in the substitute; that there is no necessity for it. The gentleman says his proposition goes further than ours; that it requires that the Legislature shall do this within a certain length of time. Does it not exonerate the next Legislature from any attention to the subject? They might shield themselves that way. The amendment we propose makes it obligatory upon the first Legislature; if the first neglected their duty, it would be obligatory upon the next, and every subsequent Legislature, except you take away the oath to support the constitution of the State.

I think the proposition I have offered is preferable to that of the gentleman from Oakland. Upon the other question, whether any particular mode of raising taxes should be required, I might agree with him; but it has been the decision of the committee, and from the views that have been expressed we have become satisfied that no other proposition will prevail; therefore, we thought it best to have the tax upon the property of the State.

Mr. MOORE said—Mr chairman, this subject is one of the first importance, and I hope we shall not differ in principle or in detail. The details I am not so particular about, if the result is arrived at. The grand effort for us, is to establish schools free, or nearly so. The way or the details of the system I care little about, so the thing itself is accomplished. I would engraft in this constitution the principle of free schools. I would not leave it to the Legislature to fix it at some future day. It is practicable now for us to lay the plan whereby the children of the State can be educated.

I have an objection to the amendment sent up by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. MORRISON.] It contemplates five years before this system can be brought about, and I have no disposition to delay this effort a day. This is the place and the time to provide for the system. I would not adopt the system of New England, although there it is the best, and no other, perhaps, would do so well; but our country is new, and things are not yet regulated. We have many new and thinly settled districts, where town taxes could not be raised, and of course it would be unequal. New England raises her fund by a town tax on property, and distributes in the districts from the towns. I hold in my hand some statistics of the common schools in New England, but I will not trouble the Convention by reading them now. I think Mr. Chairman, we are pretty well agreed that a State tax is the plan for us to adopt; and two mills to the dollar added to our present fund, will furnish four months more free schooling in each district than we have now. We raise now by general fund $156,000, which affords a school five and a half months in the year. But it is not worth while to go into detail. I hope the committee will not let disagreement about the plan to be adopted, defeat a measure so desirable and so just as this. It is just not only to the children growing up in the State, but to the citizens, and to the character of the State, which stands the sixth State in the Union for intelligence—in reading and writing—as reported in our last census.

What has made New England what she is but her common schools—her school system? And here, let me say when New England had 2,000,000 inhabitants she had between 10 and 12,000 schools;—a school to every 200 persons.

Let me give some of the plain, simple reasons why we should establish free schools, or nearly free, so that, at any rate, every child would be free to go, and should go, and so numerous that a school house would be within the reach of all. The management, however, should be left to the districts themselves, so as to sustain the interest felt in the schools by all classes; and the fund should only be distributed to those that would try to avail themselves of its benefits. You lay it down as a principle, that the man who does not try to help himself, should not be helped. So in a measure with school districts; but by all means give them the opportunity; bring education to their door, to their very threshold.

The tax should be on the property of the whole State, and distributed by the school officers of the State as the other fund is, and to those districts which will avail themselves of it; for, I say again, that unless the people themselves enter into it, all the money you give will not accomplish the object. The interest and earnestness with which the districts engage in it, is of as much consequence as the money appropriated. The tax, I say again, should be on property, so the poor would be saved from a burden, which otherwise might be too heavy, and the rich secure the most ample protection, on their property, by the diffusion of intelligence and morals among all classes.

1st. Every holder of property has a direct interest, in a pecuniary point of view, in educating the masses. For every law upon which the value of property or the peace of society depends, will, in a few years, be at the disposal of the children growing up in the State. The amount of vice and crime, and the expense of prosecuting and punishing criminals will be diminished in proportion to the intelligence of the community. Ignorance is idle and unthrifty; it is the father of vice. Uneducated mind is educated vice.

Intelligent labor is doubly as productive to the State as the tool of the ignorant. Witness New England; look at her manufactories, her mechanical labor, her inventions, in short, her innumerable commodities, with which she fills this whole earth. There is not, perhaps, a country on the globe where her arts have not been introduced. And why is it? Because she started with a universal system of free schools. Nothing else ever laid the foundation of her prosperity. And so let it establish ours. We have infinitely a better soil, abundance of water power, and every variety of climate, and can grow almost every variety of the world's products. Now, with all these advantages, let us engraft in the constitution such a system as will secure to the rising generation equal rights in education, as well as equal rights in political, civil and religious liberty. Then, I say, if all property holders are to share in the advantages, they may well and fairly be asked to contribute to the result.

2d. It is the duty of the State to provide for the education of all its children. The existence and safety and wealth of the State depend upon it. It is the first duty of government to protect the lives and property of her people.

If the property and safety of society demand universal education, it is the duty of the State to provide it. If she has a right to lay a tax for the suppression of crime and idleness, by erecting prisons and houses of correction, she certainly has a right to do the same for the prevention of crimes, by schools.

3d. These common schools are of exceeding value by way of bringing forward and cultivating minds of great worth, that had otherwise laid forever buried in the obscurity of poverty. They are like scientific surveys for the discovery of the mineral resources of the State. A large number of the very first men of New England would never have been raised to notice, but for the exploring system of common schools, where the rich and the poor meet together without any degrading distinctions; and only mind tugs with mind all over the commonwealth, year after year. If there is one rare intellect in any corner of the State, it will be brought to light and developed; and many such coming up from all quarters, will enhance greatly the literary character and wealth of the State.

4th. Free schools have a powerful influence in disseminating the principles of true democracy. Where on earth is there such a practical demonstration of the doctrine that "all men are born free and equal," as in the school house under a free school system—where every barefooted urchin may have the same teacher, the same books, and set on the same seat with the most fortunate heir in the town—may stand at the head of his class and take the precedence over all that wealth and rank can array against him, if only God has given him the better mind, or the more diligent disposition? It ennobles and encourages the poor boy, and fires him with such thoughts of the dignity of a human soul that tyrants can never after oppress him with impunity. It corrects, too, the thoughtlessness of the rich by the standard of mind, and teaches them to reckon rank by the Roman rule of merit.

5th. A general tax is on many accounts the best mode of providing public schools. When every man pays his money he will feel an interest, and the interest thus awakened all over the State, is worth the amount of the tax, to say nothing of the instruction given to the children. Besides, as men come to understand the doctrine upon which the right to thus tax them is based, and see the principle satisfactorily illustrated they will discover also that they have in many other respects mutual interests; and so, public spirit, so necessary to general improvement, will be more and more promoted. This system, too, has the merit of providing for the education of the poor, without any of those personal distinctions that degrade.

6th. It is particularly incumbent upon Michigan to provide a system of free schools. She has invested a large sum already in such a way that much of its value and prospects to the State must be forever lost without a free school system.

There stands our University at Ann Arbor, amply endowed, like a great flour mill, well built, and all ready to grind in a country where there has been as yet, little or no provision made for raising the wheat. That University will forever lose half its utility to the State, without the common school system to explore every opening and prairie, and kindle up the latent genius that is slumbering in log cabins all over the land. Such minds once taught, will, by comparison and competition with others, create the appetite for knowledge, and from the district school will find their way to the fountain your State has so munificently opened to all her sons. Michigan has built up one side of the most liberal structure for education in any State—it only remains to complete the other side, and so perfect the edifice. And it should be particularly noticed that it is the aristocratic side that now stands (a college) for the few; while the popular side (common schools for the people) is neglected. If, while the aristocratic enterprise finds favor everywhere, the democratic cause should want friends, the spectacle would be a singular calamity.

Mr. COMSTOCK thought that this body should profit by experience, and not go into detail, as the Legislature could better carry out the details of the measure—better if left to their discretion than having one line marked out in the fundamental law, from which they would not be able to deviate. He was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Oakland, that the plan might be carried out by the people. When we looked at a neighboring State and saw their system denounced, we should be content to fix just bounds, and the rest should be left to the people through their Legislature.

Mr. MORRISON offered the following as a substitute for section 3:

"The Legislature shall provide by law that in the year 1855, and every year thereafter, a general tax shall be levied in the State for the support of primary schools, not exceeding five mills upon each dollar of the valuation of the taxable property in the State. Such tax to be levied and collected in the same manner as the general State tax for State purposes, and apportioned for the support of primary schools throughout the State, in the same manner as the primary school interest fund, and shall provide that during the time required to expend the amount thus apportioned among the several districts, a school shall be kept in such district, without any charge for tuition, to all scholars residing in such district between the ages of four and twenty-one years; and the instruction in such schools shall be conducted in the English language."

Mr. M. said—The proposition is that in 1855 the Legislature may fix a tax not to exceed five mills on the dollar. My object is to permit the people to feel the benefit of the reforms that we have made; for if we impose a heavy State tax, the burdens will be increased instead of diminished; therefore I wish the matter postponed until the year 1855. Yet, it does not prevent the Legislature from establishing schools earlier, if it is deemed expedient; nor does it prevent them raising a part of the tax, or the whole, before that time.

The amount of the interest upon the public fund was $52,000; the average time that schools were taught was nearly five and a half months; these, if taught by female teachers for three months, would cost $59,320, leaving only a deficiency of $6,320; if taught by male teachers, the amount would be $77,500. Now, by raising one mill upon the dollar, we shall raise a tax of $28,000; of two mills, $56,000; of three mills, $84,000; which would render nearly every school in the State free for three months in the year. Supposing our property to be $30,000,000, a tax of five mills would be $150,000, a sum sufficiently large to keep the schools for four months in the year.

My object in proposing this substitute was, that as it appeared to be the wish of the Convention to raise it by a State tax, I knew no other way that it could be done, except by a specific tax—a mill tax, for instance; and after this, if the constitution provides that we shall have a State board for the purpose of equalizing property throughout the State, probably it would amount to $60,000,000; that would then amount to $300,000; and if it came to $100,000,000, we shall have from this source an income of half a million; this, then to be apportioned among the districts with the interest of the primary school fund; and thus the difficulties that have been raised in regard to the revenue would cease; it would then be the interest of no one to break down the primary schools. If the tax was levied three months before the public money was given, the money would have been paid, and men would build up their primary schools.

It will be for the interest of the districts to make the best terms they can with the teachers, and keep them as long as they can. There may be sufficient to keep one school six months; it should then be applied to that six months. To another three months. One may require double the salary for a teacher that another has to pay. The money received by the schools should be equal; and they should not employ teachers to whom they would have to pay a large salary.

Mr. WILLIAMS—It seems that there are almost as many different opinions as there are men in this Convention. In view of this fact, the chairman called the committee together. It was found that while the committee disagreed on some topics, there were some principles upon which all agreed, and these are embodied in the proposition now offered by the chairman. We agreed on "free schools—three months term in all districts—no charge for tuition—the English language to be necessarily taught." In regard to taxation, the mode and manner we could not agree; but we could agree that all the property of the State should be reached by taxation for this purpose, and should bear some how its equal and just share of the burden. For himself he believed that the tax should be levied by the authorities of the State. He would not leave the system and the whole success of the system, at the mercy of either district, town or county.

Oakland leaves it in discretion of legislation to say whether every locality should not assess the tax to suit its convenience. If each district can do as it pleases, it can destroy the efficiency of the system as applicable to itself. Now, if we need and want a free school system at all, we want it most for those districts that would meet its requisitions with the greatest reluctance. The most backward, the most ignorant, the most indifferent, are the very portion of the population we wish to enlighten. The State wishes to stretch its paternal arm around them. It wishes to educate all, willing and unwilling. To obviate all difficulties, for himself, whatever taxes are laid, he thought ought to be imposed and assessed by one authority, embracing the whole State.

With regard to the suggestions of the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] that the proposition of the chairman of the committee was deficient, because there might be other resources besides the income of the primary school fund, he did not think they had much force. If the Legislature can afford any sum at any time to increase the means, they can make them a part and parcel of that fund by legal enactment. If we should obtain lands from the general government—if justice long delayed should be meted to us, and the million or more of acres due (the general government being as liberal to us as to our sister States) is at last conceded, either to the demands of our delegation or to the prayer of the memorial of this Convention, now in preparation by the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BACKUS,] then such lands, or a part of them should, by the terms of the grant of Congress, be made a part of the primary school fund.

If he remembered the language of the substitute of the chairman, it was this: "Any deficiency that may exist after the distribution of the income from the primary school fund, shall be raised by a tax on the whole taxable property of the State;" thus fixing the principle that all the property of the State should be equally taxed, but leaving the mode and the distribution to be determined by the Legislature. Whatever his private views were, he felt bound to concur with the committee. He believed half the members of the House had plans drawn up, and to meet each man's views was impossible. On such a basis as the committee have conceded to, a system of free schools can certainly be created which will be efficient, practical and comprehensive.

Mr. ORR said—Mr. Chairman, I cannot, as the representative of one of the new counties, suffer this very important question to come to a vote without at least an expression of my opinion on a subject which so directly interests my constituents. I have the honor, sir, to hold a seat on this floor through the partiality of my immediate constituents in the county of Barry. But, sir, while I represent the county of Barry in this Convention, I claim as my constituency the undivided one-hundredth part of the people of this State. And, sir, as it has been my constant endeavor during our deliberations in this body to support such measures as would advance the great interest of the State at large, I must be permitted on this occasion to express my disapprobation of this or any other measure that would in the least degree be prejudicial to the new counties, and particularly to the county I represent in this Convention.

This proposition has for its object, sir, to rob the new and sparsely populated counties of this State of a portion of the money raised in such counties, for educational purposes, and give it to the older and more densely settled portions of the State. Gentlemen propose to raise a State tax of two mills on the dollar of the valuation of all the taxable property of the State. This tax they would raise on the basis of taxable property, making each county contribute to the general fund according to their several ability. This, they say, shall constitute a State fund for the support of free schools. But, sir, they propose to make the distribution on a very different system. They would distribute this money among the several counties of this State, according to the number of children between the ages of four and eighteen, reported by the different county clerks to the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Now, sir, it must be remembered that the more populous counties return more scholars to the above office in proportion to their taxable property, than are returned by the new and thinly settled counties.

Consequently, on this system they would receive more money than they contributed, while the new counties would contribute more money than they would again receive. The proposition now under consideration would have this effect, sir; and I believe it to be unjust and oppressive. I hope, sir, it will not prevail.

Mr. Chairman, it is claimed here by some gentlemen that this discrepancy in valuation compared with the number of children reported to the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, arises in consequence of the great amount of non-resident land lying in some of the new counties. This, sir, is true; there being neither family nor scholars to represent this species of property. But is this the fault of the new counties? I think not, sir. The most of this non-resident land was located at a very early day; and being generally of the best quality, it is held at so high a price that the industrious poor man seeking a home in this State could not afford to purchase it. He was, therefore, absolutely compelled to buy government land at a cheaper price, wherever he could find it interspersed with large and numerous tracts of non-resident land. This state of things is very inconvenient to the actual settlers. The settlements are, in consequence of this, located in different parts of the county, entirely detached from each other, separated by large tracts of uncultivated land, and often by interminable forests.

Now, sir, it will not be pretended that citizens of a new county, thus situated, can educate their children with the same facility or economy as those living in better settled and more populous counties. Therefore I hold, sir, that if this non-resident land interposes any obstacles to cheap and economical schools in the new counties, they should enjoy the exclusive advantage of taxing this kind of property for educational purposes.

There appears to be but very little difference of opinion, sir, in this Convention about the propriety of providing in this constitution for the encouragement of primary schools. But gentlemen of this Convention seem strangely partial to the name of "free" schools. There is something fascinating, sir, even in the name. But if a system of free schools is not attainable—if such a system is not practicable—why pursue in such hot haste the empty name, and lose sight entirely of the reality? Why not be satisfied with giving suitable encouragement to our schools—such encouragement, sir, as the circumstances of our people will warrant? Why raise a great State tax? Why collect and gather it from the different townships and counties of the State on the basis of taxable property, and in making your distribution parcel it out on a different basis, to wit: according to the number of scholars reported to the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction? This, sir, is the proposition.

A three mill tax assessed on all the taxable property of the State, would, together with the annual interest of the primary school fund, afford pretty good encouragement. This should be assessed annually by the supervisor of every township in the State; and when the money is collected it should belong exclusively to the township in which it is raised, and should be appropriated religiously to the support of primary schools. This plan would give to every township its own money, and no more. This plan, sir, being reasonable and just, cannot fail to be satisfactory to all portions of the State.

Again, one dollar per scholar might support a free school for a term of three months in one of the older counties, such as Oakland, Washtenaw or Lenawee, while it would be totally inadequate in Allegan, Barry or Ionia. Therefore, sir, I hold that it would be both unjust and oppressive to compel any one of the new counties to raise money to aid in support of free schools in the older counties, and that too, sir, when they already enjoy better facilities for education. But, sir, for the purpose of illustrating this subject more clearly and forcibly, I will here exhibit some statistics which I have prepared on this subject. I have grouped together the counties of Allegan, Barry and Clinton, as a fair average of the new counties; and Jackson, Kalamazoo and Lenawee as a fair average of the old counties; and by calculation it will be seen, sir, that the first three counties would each contribute more than they will again receive, while the other three counties will receive more than they contribute.

By the State tax system, Allegan would lose in round numbers $795; Barry $155, and Clinton $553; while the other three counties would each gain a proportionate sum of this money. For these reasons I hope, sir, that some other plan will be agreed upon, which, while it encourages our primary schools, will be less oppressive and more equal in its operations.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I think, sir, that the gentleman's reasoning goes to show that it is not upon equitable ground. If there are one hundred children to be educated in Barry county, and if there are four times that number in Lenawee county, with no more means to be taxed, then I say that the county of Barry should contribute her part; and I think that a different course would be improper and unfair. It has been said that there is a good deal of difficulty with regard to the words "free schools." The words "free schools," is like free government—like the word "democracy." What does that mean? It means a government by the people. But there are burdens to be borne, and we have actually to release a portion of our liberty for the benefit of the whole. You cannot establish a prosperous free school system, except you collect some tax out of the interested parties—except you charge something upon the persons sending the children to school—charging them sufficiently to make them parties in the case. I have never seen it otherwise, and I don't believe it can be done.

I am unwilling that any sweeping clause should be placed in the constitution without being limited. I think it should permit a State tax; then limit it, and provide that the remainder shall be raised by towns or districts; I care not which. We are all agreed in favor of free schools, and it sounds well in theory; but in carrying out the details we find out the objections. I do not believe that the people will pay five mills upon the dollar. My instructions are directly the reverse; that is, to lighten the burdens, and the present system of free schools is a good system, it has acted very prosperously. We have now a State tax of one mill, which, with the addition of the school fund, makes our schools to a certain extent, free; that is, it gives them the character of free schools.

Like every other member, I have my views, and I should like to strike out of section three, all after the word "provide" at the end of the third line, to the word "and" in the line following. That would double the present State tax, by leaving it in the power of the Legislature to double the present tax of one mill. That would render them as free as we ought to make the schools. Then let the balance be raised as the wisdom of the Legislature may direct. The whole property of the State should be taxed equally for the education of the children of the State. I cannot see any propriety in limiting it to one county. A county that has a large estate and no children, should contribute accordingly, as an individual who is wealthy and without children has to educate the children in the town or district. If his county is as well educated as others, it works no injustice; it is applied like the primary school fund.

Now, sir, the school lands where I live are worth $20 per acre; where he lives it is worth $4 per acre; the money is put together and equally divided, and there of course, the new counties have the advantage. I think it will not be best for this Convention to direct the Legislature to impose a heavy tax. If the people should tell the House of Representatives not to do it, are we better than the next House of Representatives? I think not. Our system may be improved; but it is a good system. I think that there should be a State tax—a fixed amount, not entirely free for tuition. If the district spend $100, the parents or guardians should at least contribute $12. Otherwise, there would not be economy; therefore I think it would be better. I think if schools are free of tuition, it will cause difficulty and trouble. It has operated badly and was changed.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I am always sorry to find myself and my colleague [Mr. HANSCOM] at variance. With the exalted opinion that I have of his opinion and good judgment, it makes me diffident of myself. I hoped that we might work shoulder to shoulder, together in the great cause of education—that we might act in unison together, and I have no doubt that he is devoted to the cause, and that he thinks the plan he has recommended will work out the most advantageous result. My colleague tells me that I talk loud and long. I believe that he talks as loud as I can, while he has the advantage of me in finesse and management, for if any gentleman has the faculty of making the worst the better cause, it is my colleague. My colleague tells you that it is putting it off for five long years. The committee came to the conclusion that the proposition of the gentleman from Oakland would put it off for five years. And if the Legislature refuses to obey the instruction, what will be the condition of the State? Will it not put off this question interminably—it may be until the formation of another constitution? He urges as a reason, that it will put off the system so long. Well, sir, when the question was upon the subject of pay, three dollars being inserted instead of two, he made a speech—one in which he said that his constituents would denounce him as a demagogue if he supported the measure. Well, sir, in conversation with me, he told me forsooth, that the committee wanted to strike out three and insert four. That was his argument. Now, the argument is, we are putting it off for five years—not fixing a time. Now, we take the position that he is putting it off too long; we wish to have the provision incorporated in the Constitution, and have it acted upon as soon as can be, consistently with the interest of the State. My friend from the three rivers, has said there must be some concession. The Committee have taken this into consideration, and submitted this substitute to the committee of the whole.

The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE] says that some little tax must be imposed upon the districts to make them interested. Will not a tax upon the whole which every individual is bound to pay, make them interested? Will they not see that the money is properly appropriated, and is not his argument fully answered?

Mr. HANSCOM—I regret that my colleague has taken a remark to himself which I designed generally. I referred to all electioneering efforts about the blessings of education, &c., which seemed to me rather out of place; designed for home consumption rather than any particular benefit of those who heard it.

Mr. CHURCH moved to strike out in Mr. HANSCOM's substitute, after "constitution," and insert "establish a system of common schools, in which the instruction shall be conducted in the English language, and shall be free of charge to pupils between the ages of four and eighteen years, at least three months in each year, in each school district in the State, and shall provide by law for the support of such schools by a tax or taxes upon property."

The difference in the two propositions, (said Mr. C.) consists in the latter clause. Mine goes further than that of the gentleman from Oakland, in this respect, that it provides for a tax or taxes upon property; but does not designate whether it shall be State, town, district or county tax. There can be no agreement about the kind of tax; there are objections to every plan—objections so serious that probably this Convention cannot be brought to agree to any proposed plan.

Mr. WILLIAMS—If he understood the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] he was willing to base a free school system on taxation in the districts, similar to the method in New York. Now, if the gentleman from Jackson [Mr. CORNELL] had the evidence showing the almost fatal operation of that part of the New York system, he hoped it would be adduced. The jealousies, heart-burnings and obstinacy in districts had, he understood, rendered the New York system almost impracticable, and in that State they were about re-constructing their whole system. Yet the gentleman from Kent, he thought, was willing to risk the same experiment among ourselves.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I would ask whether the instruction shall be given exclusively in the English language?

The CHAIR read—"Instruction shall be in the English language."

Mr. WHIPPLE—By that term you would render it impossible for any language except the English to be taught in the common schools.

Mr. CHURCH—I do not understand the gentleman. Does he think that we are going to speak French, Spanish or Irish in the common schools?

Mr. WHIPPLE—Yes sir, I do. In the counties of Branch and St. Joseph, not only the English, but German and French languages are taught; and it is a most valuable improvement of the common school system. I do not mean the dead language ges, but the modern ones should be taught; and it seems to me that this amendment will put it out of the power of thousands of children to gain a knowledge of the French and German languages.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—In some schools latin has been taught; I have taught it in a common school. I would not adopt any provision by which any knowledge would be excluded. I would make it imperative that the English language should be taught.

Mr. GOODWIN—I do not think that it excludes the other languages.

Mr. CHURCH—It means simply this: that no school shall draw the public money, in which the language used colloquially shall be other than the English.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—We have so much distrust of future legislators that we cannot adopt a system that will be satisfactory. Do gentlemen think that all wisdom will die with us, or that the people will not send men to legislate, capable of taking care of their interests? All that we ought to do, is this: we should say the Legislature shall establish primary schools. We cannot go into detail.

Mr. GOODWIN would again remark that he did not think it prohibited the other languages being taught.

Mr. HANSCOM—In all the colleges is not the instruction given through the medium of the English language?

Mr. WHIPPLE—No sir. How could that be? I think it is impracticable, and that that mode of instruction will amount to nothing. I think it important that the great outlines of the system should be prescribed in this constitution. I have confidence in future legislators, but I wish their line of duty distinctly marked out. We have here a great deal of talent and practical experience, and it is proper that it should be brought to bear in the adjustment of this system; the time for which a school should be kept; the mode of instruction. I am opposed to confining a scholar to the use of the English language. We can as well determine these points as future legislators. The same reasons will exist then as now.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I am willing that the first principles should be fixed; but we may adopt some principles that may not work with justice. If the Legislature adopts any measure, they can alter or amend it, we cannot.

Mr. GALE—The measure appears to me perfectly impracticable—to make it obligatory upon the Legislature to make schools free for even three months. Let us look for a moment at practical men carrying it out with practical experience. Let us have a school of fifteen scholars, and we know that in new counties there are many schools with not more than fifteen scholars, on account of the sparse population. Fifteen scholars require a teacher; if they pay him $20 per month for three months, ($25 would not be high) and nothing has been said with regard to fuel or other incidental matters—we have $60 for fifteen scholars, which is at the rate of $4 per scholar. Another school in the same town or county, or State, may have 100 scholars, they may keep school the year round, and if they give their teacher $20 per month, that will only be $2,40; if they give $25, there will still be 100 left; yet, if we make a system of free schools, we should make them as nearly equal as we can practically. We should give them as much per scholar as will sustain and support a school of 30, 40, or 50 scholars. But, sir, the school of 15 may require as competent a teacher as the school of 100. Now, I would ask, if the people will submit to legislation of this kind and character? I believe that they will not, and that we should fix no time that the schools should be perfectly free.

Gentlemen do not reflect upon the practicability of the thing. There are none more desirous than I am for free schools, if I thought it practicable. There are many things fine in theory, which cannot be practiced; and we should endeavor to avoid theoretical legislation. If you decide that all schools shall be perfectly free, they can then have a teacher, and pay him what they choose, draw upon the town or the county for the sum, and the smallest will be entitled to draw as much as the largest. If you say that they may draw so much per scholar, you should give them some provision whereby they can make up the deficiency upon the taxable property in the district, or by some other means.

I am opposed to the substitute of the gentleman from Oakland, because it limits the ages from 4 to 20 years. Why not say 21? People are practically in the habit of sending their children until they are 21. It is the duty of a parent to provide education, even if a son is in his 21st year, and yet for that year he must pay.

Mr. HANSCOM thought that every system, according to the gentleman from Genesee, was perfectly impracticable. He manifests deep anxiety, but is unwilling to do any thing whatever. It would surely be possible for the Legislature to carry out the details of a system, and make the apportionment as nearly equal as possible. Every school might not be free, but it would be a near approximation to it. If we only looked to the dangers and all the possibly bad effects which, perhaps, have no real existence, we shall never be able to get a system at all.

Mr. CHAPEL—I think the proposition of the gentleman from Oakland is as near as we can fix it, except we go into detail. I think that details might be gone into that would satisfy every gentleman in this Convention. I cannot see the difficulty. The gentleman from Genesee tells us that it will be unequal. If the money taxed in each county can be distributed to each school in the county, giving the supervision to the supervisors in their own county, to so distribute, it cannot be liable to any serious objection. There are the records in the State offices to find out the number of scholars in each county, and get at the amount of property taxed for school purposes in the county; then add to that the amount they are entitled to receive on the school fund, and divide it equally. They have had their property taxed, they have had their schools returned, and it works equally. Then give the districts power to raise a tax, if they wish to go further. The difficulty seems to be to fix a proper time. I think three months is a proper time. $29,000,000, the value of the property of the State, with a tax of three mills, gives $87,000; the amount of public money, $52,305; making the sum of $139,305. There are 3,060 districts, containing about 100,000 scholars; divide the amount of money equally for the purpose of having a free school, and it will give $1 21 per scholar; and that will keep a school three months.

Mr. CORNELL—The gentleman from

Genesee, (Mr. GALE) has made a calculation, and upon that has expressed his belief that the people would not be willing to pay what was required. He forgets, that in the small schools a teacher is employed, where compensation at the most is $2. per week; if a female teacher is employed only half the time, the estimate would fall far below his computation.

Mr. FRALICK—It appears necessary here to get up something new without going into detail or showing a good reason why we should do so. I am not satisfied or willing to vote for a change except it is evidently for the better, something better than merely a theoretical view. We hear a great deal of fault found with our present system, and at the same time, I do not believe there is a better system in the United States, and until we can get something better, we should keep what we have. The present system works well; the latest reports show that our schools are in as good a condition as any State in the Union, and the children are as well educated as in any other State. Yet our present system must be sacrificed to a mere theory—to the oft repeated cry that the children of the State are the property of the State, that they must all be taught, putting all in jeopardy and confusion by the experiments of a free education. Take the same ground on other questions. Are gentlemen willing to pay for the expense of trying Criminals by a state tax? It would be a great saving to our County if they would. Wayne County has convicted half the criminals and paid half the expense of the State, in that respect. Do members wish to make it a State tax? If so, then I will also go for the system. I have heard no proposition that it shall be paid by a State tax. We have a large amount of paupers of the State to support in Wayne County, but I have heard no proposition about supporting them by a State tax, not a word. Upon the contrary, after we have convicted the criminals, then they make us bring them to Jackson; we pay the expense and they are silent; but when the question comes up that they shall take our property for the benefit of their schools, they are universally in favor of it, for it works to their advantage.

This will be injurious to every new County in the State. I have made a small statement showing the result, or bearing of a State tax as proposed in a three months' school:

Is it right that the new counties shall be taxed for the benefit of the older counties, which have the lands taken up and settled, and where it does not cost as much to keep a school, owing to the population being more dense?

I am not willing to adopt a new system because of the word "free," a theory which we cannot reduce to practice. The taxable property of the State will be about $100,000,000—a one mill tax will give us $100,000; that added to the school fund will give us a three months' school. I have heard not one word of complaint, except in regard to the districts; and we had better refer it to the Legislature to amend the present system by legislative enactment.

Mr. BUSH—I arise to correct a statement of the gentleman from Wayne; he is generally very correct. He says he has never heard a proposition to pay for the conviction of the criminals of Wayne. The parents produce the children, feed and clothe them, the State educates them. The county of Wayne produces the criminal, tries and convicts him, and the State pays the expense of keeping them. I am satisfied that our opinions are so diverse, that we cannot adopt a system of detail. I am in favor of the measure proposed by the gentleman from Oakland, or something like it. One argument that should have great weight is, that the Legislature can alter and amend; they can profit by the light of experience, and remedy errors that may have been committed.

The question being on Mr. CHURCH'S amendment, it was lost.

The question then being on Mr. HANSCOM'S substitute, the substitute was lost.

The proposition then recurring upon the substitute of Mr. WALKER,

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, "eighteen" was stricken out, and "twenty-one" inserted.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out all after "tax;" but the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to strike out "and without any charge for tuition."

Mr. WALKER—I have a word or two to say. I prefer to have gentlemen come out and state their grounds openly. I once heard a temperance lecturer say that once when giving a lecture, he saw a man going by with a bottle under his cloak; the conclusion he came to, was that he was doing good, as they had to hide their rum bottles. Now, it seems to me there is a great deal of hiding the bottle under the cloak. Gentlemen attack the free school system indirectly; they do not say we are directly opposed to it, but they will bring every argument to bear indirectly against it. Now, I think this is indicative of the state of public feeling. The gentleman from Genesee [Mr. GALE] says that it is impracticable. The wisdom of Solomon, he said yesterday, could not devise the means of giving us a free school for three months. But the history of the New England States shows us that it can be so done. The difficulty is this, that certain things are by them considered to be part of the law, which this Convention does not. The gentlemen from Genesee, Wayne, Calhoun and Lenawee, all seem to think that the schools will not be entirely free—that there shall be some charge for tuition—it may approximate, but they shall not be established as free schools by the fundamental law of the land. They had rather that “the Legislature may,”—that the present system works well.

Let us look at the operation of this system upon the poor. In 1838 we had from the interest of the school fund, some $39,000; in '39, $42,000, for the benefit of the children of the State. It was the intention that all should participate; but this is not applied for the purpose of keeping the school for any length of time, free—it is turned in for the support of the school. The balance being raised by a tax, and the person who has not property sufficient to pay his school tax, although he may have four, five or six children, cannot send them for one day, except they come under the poor act. This is the practical effect; and thus the poor man is deprived of the liberality of the United States, which granted the land for the purpose of education.

We were told on a former occasion that the pride of a king was in the multitude of his people. I would ask is not the pride of a Republic in the intelligence of its people? How long should we be a Republican government if we were deprived of schools? Or, if a great portion are withdrawn, the necessary consequence will follow. There will be a great gulph between the two classes; wealth and intelligence on the one hand, ignorance and poverty on the other. If we refuse to adopt the principle that all the children shall be educated, we undermine the basis upon which our government is instituted. Can a Republican government be sustained without intelligence? It may be attempted, but the pyramid is resting upon its apex, and the first political convulsion will overwhelm it into ruin. What has given the American people their success in government? education; it has opened every avenue to industry; suppressed crime; expanded the energies of all; if it taxes wealth, it creates wealth in the community. Why should our roads be made by a tax upon property?

Mr. CHURCH—Not a gentleman has opposed the tax upon property.

Mr. WALKER—They have carried the bottle under the cloak; It might be said that the man who had ten children should work ten times the highway tax as the man who has no children. He travels the road ten times as much. So with poor houses; so with courts; so with prisons; for the wealthy, honest man, with no children, might say, I don't intend to commit crime; I want no poor house; I have no trials in the courts; let those pay for them that are poor; let them support them that may use them. This is the doctrine, if carried out. And I believe the support of all that I have named should be based upon property, because it is a general benefit to the whole community.

Mr. N. PIERCE denied the charge that he was opposed to primary schools. He did not want any untried system, but that the Legislature might have power to improve or alter. He did not think that people should be charged with illiberality or hostility to a system, because they did not choose to go through his machine.

On motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the same back to the Convention, and asked leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

Mr. CRARY moved that the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole on the article entitled “Education.”

But the motion did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the article entitled “Education,” Mr. McLEOD in the chair.

The question being upon Mr. N. PIERCE's amendment to Mr. WALKER's substitute, the same was not agreed to.

Mr. REDFIELD moved to strike out “children between the ages of four and twenty-one years, and insert “persons.”

Mr. CHURCH supported the amendment. Married women, and that class of persons that were nearly the age of twenty-one, could not be called children.

Mr. REDFIELD stated that the object of the proposition was to allow persons of all ages to attend school, instead of children.

Mr. CHURCH—I then cannot sustain the amendment. I am willing to concede that the children of the State and those who cannot labor should be educated by the State, so that in mature years they may be able to withstand temptation; but because that is granted it does not follow that persons of mature years should be educated at the expense of the people.

Where are the manual labor schools, about which lately so much was said? But there, at any rate, cannot be any propriety in educating persons who can by labor of six hours study six hours, without any help from the State. I therefore think that the amendment is objectionable in its present shape.

Mr. REDFIELD—The gentleman supposes an extreme case; it is so allowed in the State of New York, and I have heard no objection, as I have never known the privilege abused.

Mr. HANSCOM—I am opposed to striking out. I thought that the object was to train the youth of the State, not every person who wishes to go to school. Take an individual of the age of eighteen years, and if he has brains enough to make it worth while he can educate himself without being a burden upon the public.

Mr. WITHERELL saw no difficulty. There would be few found after that age that would wish to go to school. The difficulty was this: in a county where the population was sparse, there were not, and could not be any schools except the primary schools. If therefore any persons wished to be educated, they could not, except they hired a schoolmaster themselves, which was of course frequently impossible. Except they go free, they cannot go at all; and it is scarcely worth talking about as the cases will be very few where application is made. If they have arrived to mature years by their labor, they are adding to the property of the State; and I see no reason why they should be deprived of the benefit of attending common schools; and they should not be shut out from the only schools they can attend.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—There is one objection: one school will probably only contain all the children between certain ages. If you admit others you may have to exclude them. I have never seen any objection where there is room. I have seen a person nearly 40 years old, attend school, and nobody thought of objecting; but there should be an objection, if any of the children are shut out.

Mr. SKINNER—I regret that so many of the prominent men of the Convention have seen fit thus far to withhold their views on the subject now under discussion. I deem it by far the most important topic that has occupied the attention of this body since its commencement, or that will before its close. All the wisdom of this Convention is needed to settle this matter rightly; and if not settled rightly, the evils resulting may be incalculable. We are well agreed on general principles. We all seem to entertain this noble sentiment, that the children of the State are in a certain sense the property of the State; that they should, in some degree at least, be educated by the State. But how shall this be done? Various plans are suggested; but none of them are unobjectionable; none seem to meet the views of but a small portion of the Convention. That offered by the chairman of the committee of education is in my opinion preferable to the rest, and for this I shall vote if nothing better is presented. I hope, however, that something less objectionable will be offered. I have not risen to express my own views, but to draw out the views of others, in whose opinions on this subject I should have much more confidence than in my own, and who have hitherto kept silent in this discussion.

The amendment was lost.

The question then recurring upon Mr. WALKER'S substitute,

Mr. CRARY said, we have been some time discussing this subject, and as yet have come to no conclusion. There is such diversity of opinion that it seems impossible to arrive at a result that will meet the views and feelings of all. A portion are unwilling to believe that there can be any patriotism in our future Legislatures. They are disposed to tie everything down, supposing all the wisdom of the State to be concentrated here. Not fully believing this proposition, I am willing that the details of this subject should be left to the Legislature. We can mark out the outlines, and leave the rest to legislation; for we cannot satisfactorily fill up the details of the system.

We have before us the proposition of the committee, and from their respectability, their number, and the zeal with which they sustain these propositions, those of us who differ with them can scarcely expect to obtain a majority of the Convention in opposition to what they have laid before us as the unanimous result of their deliberations. Yet I do not believe that they have given to the subject all the attention which it demands, or looked at all the consequences which will follow the adoption of their report.

The language is: "any deficiency that may exist after the distribution of the income from the primary school fund, shall be raised by a tax upon the whole property of the State." The tax shall be general throughout the State; the same in Oakland as in Barry; the same in Berrien as in Wayne. Now, sir, what will be the effect of this general legislation, without reference to the future action of the Legislature? Having apportioned the public money, amounting at present to 33 cents on the scholar, you have a deficiency in 3060 districts to be reported somewhere, that the same for a 3 months tuition, may be made up by general taxation. The deficiency must be raised by general taxation in the State. Such a provision will lead to one universal scramble, to see who shall get the largest share of the money. This scramble can only be prevented by allowing the Legislature to fix the maximum and the minimum of the wages of the teachers. If the Legislature must do this much, why not leave all the details to them? Why not say the Legislature shall provide a system of free schools, leaving to them the plan of taxation, and the mode of applying it?

The committee proposed a mongrel system; for that was not a free school where there was any charge for tuition—not a free school where the poor man might have his child frozen to death for the want of wood, or the teacher starved for the want of board. In a free school, fuel, board, and implements for school house, must be provided; and these in some instances amount to half the expenses, especially in schools kept by females. New York has a four month's free school, and they covered the entire expenses, fuel, board, school books, and insurance for school house. What was the expense of that system? Fifty cents per scholar was received from the fund; then fifty cents tax per scholar from the county, and fifty cents more from the town. But that was not sufficient. A further tax was authorized to be levied upon the school district, and it was this last tax which seems to have ruined the system.

We propose to levy a State tax to make tuition for three months free. We propose to make it imperative; but if it be too expensive, or if it does not meet the wants and wishes of the people, you may insert it in the constitution, you may make it imperative, but it will be in vain. The people will overthrow the system if they do not like it, and there will be no remedy; it will be made a nullity, or the clause will be repealed. What we are attempting was tried by the State of Louisiana, and the system had to be changed. The State now gives annually $450,000 in aid of a free school system, and leaves the rest of the money to be raised by the locality. Delaware made a similar attempt, and she has had to change her plan. New York is about abandoning the system she first adopted, for one more suited to her circumstances. Yet we propose to uproot our present system and adopt another that we know nothing about. We have a system that all admit to be a good system, although the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] made a side attack at it. I do not say that it cannot be improved, but it works well. If the new system is adopted it may not suit the people; and if it does not, you will not be able easily to change it if you fix the details in the constitution.

I would suggest that the amount of a mill or two mill tax be distributed to each school in proportion to the number of the scholars or to their attendance, and then let the towns or school districts raise such amounts as they may deem proper. They will then have an inducement to use economy; they will then have no temptation to squander the money which, under the other system, they could. If we are to have a free school system, we had better give such a direction in the constitution, and let the Legislature manage the rest. We shall then have a system which can be adapted to our circumstances.

The question then recurring upon Mr. WALKER's substitute, the committee refused to so amend.

Mr. MORRISON offered the following as a substitute for section 3:

"The Legislature shall provide by law that in the year 1855, and every year thereafter, a general tax shall be levied in the State for the support of primary schools, not exceeding five mills upon each dollar upon the valuation of the taxable property in the State. Such tax to be levied and collected in the same manner as the general State tax for State purposes, and appropriated for the support of primary schools throughout the State in the same manner as the primary school interest fund; and shall provide that during the time required to expend the amount thus apportioned among the several districts, a school shall be kept in each district, without any charge for tuition to all scholars residing in such district between the ages of four and twenty-one years; and the instruction in such schools shall be conducted in the English language."

Mr. M. said—The latter clause provides for all the difficulties in raising the funds and making it a free school—provides that the money so raised shall be expended, and during the time it is expended the school shall be free—that during that time no rate bill shall be charged. This will not prevent the inhabitants from employing the teacher a longer time, if they choose; and it will prevent no temptation to squander the money. I would move to strike out "charge for tuition."

The motion was lost.

On motion of Mr. H. BARTOW, "five mills" were stricken out, and "two mills" inserted.

Mr. MOORE moved to strike out "1855" and insert "1852;" but the committee refused to strike out.

On motion of Mr. W. ADAMS, "exceeding" was stricken out, and "not less" inserted.

Mr. MORRISON's substitute was then disagreed to.

Mr. N. PIERCE offered the following as a substitute for section three:

"The Legislature shall establish by law a system of primary schools, by which such schools shall be kept in each and every school district for at least three months in each year, free to all children between the ages of four and eighteen years, and shall provide for the levying a tax not exceeding two mills upon the dollar upon all the taxable property in the State, for the support of said schools; and the English language be taught in such schools."

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend the substitute by striking out the words "and the English language shall be taught in such schools," and inserting the words "and all instructions in the said schools shall be conducted in the English language;" which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the words "and without charge for tuition" were inserted after "free."

Mr. N. PIERCE's substitute, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out section four; but the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out the first, second and third lines of section five; which did not prevail.

Mr. BUSH moved to strike out section five; but the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out of section six all after "University," in fifth line; which was disagreed to.

Mr. MASON moved to strike out section seven; but the committee refused to strike out.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the words "according to the terms of the grant or appropriation" were added to section eight.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the following, to stand as section nine, was adopted:

"Institutions for the benefit of those inhabitants who are deaf, dumb, blind or insane, shall always be fostered and supported, and the proceeds from the sale of all lands that have been or shall be hereafter granted or appropriated for the support of such institutions, shall be inviolably appropriated according to the terms and conditions of such grant or appropriation."

Mr. CRARY said that there was a grant of twenty-five sections of salt spring lands for that purpose, and the object is to set them apart for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. SOULE, the following was inserted in section 9, as printed, after the word "therewith," in line 3:

"And the 22 sections of salt spring lands now unappropriated, or the money arising from the sale of the same, where such lands have been already sold; and any land which may hereafter be granted or appropriated for such purpose, shall be set apart for the support and maintenance of such school and farm. And the proceeds of the sale of all such lands that have been or that may be hereafter sold, shall be a perpetual fund, the interest of which, together with the rents and profits of such lands, shall be appropriated for the support of such school and farm."

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out all after "township," in line 4 of section 9.

On motion of Mr. RAYNALE, "collected" was inserted after "assessed," in line five.

The words proposed to be stricken out containing two propositions, Mr. CRARY called for a division of the question, and the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to strike out "of at least," in line 4 of section 9; which was disagreed to.

Mr. CRARY offered the following to stand as section 11:

"Until the existing State debt is paid, all specific State taxes are set apart and appropriated to the payment annually of the interest that may become due from the State to the school and other educational funds, or so much thereof as may be necessary for such purposes, and from and after the payment of said debts, such taxes shall be inviolably appropriated annually for the support of primary schools."

Mr. BUSH would ask what the gentleman intended by specific State taxes?

Mr. CRARY—Specific State taxes will be confined to rail roads, plank roads and the imposts upon banks, if we have a banking system. I want this set apart for the purpose of paying the interest of the primary school fund. We are largely indebted to the fund, and shall continue to be more so as the lands are more and more sold; and after the debt is paid, I propose that the whole shall be set apart for the purposes of education.

Mr. BUSH—I am opposed to the amendment. It is legislating for a period too far into the future. We have a large fund to set apart, when available; and by the terms of the amendment, it shall be kept inviolate. The interest now set apart for the support of primary schools will eventually amount to millions—will be large enough to support the primary schools of the State. I think that this will trammel the Legislature, and that as we have no fear that the interest of the primary school fund will not be paid, we should not place impediments in their way.

Mr. CRARY—I don't think that it will be so large. It will not be more than forty-one cents upon the scholar. The children in the State will increase so rapidly that I consider that the largest amount that we can reasonably suppose. The interest has always been paid, but I think it right and proper to set apart a fund that shall be inviolate.

Mr. REDFIELD—I agree with my friend from Calhoun, that there should be a specific determination after the liquidation of the State debt, and I know of no direction where it could be as well employed as in the support of the school fund; and I think that the apprehension that the fund will be too large need not be indulged in for twenty years to come, as we shall probably take our own time to pay the State debt. When paid, the tax upon rail roads and banks should become the property of the people of the whole State, and the whole should have the benefit.

Mr. J. BARTOW—This amendment is useless, and out of place. The chairman of the committee on finance and taxation reported this morning, and the discussion would come properly up in this report. It is a question of much importance; it had better be passed over until the other reports come up, and then the whole matter will be before us.

Mr. N. PIERCE thought this was the proper place. The larger sum there was, the less difficulty would there be in having a free school. If it was as large as some gentlemen supposed, there would be no difficulty in establishing a free school system.

Mr. BUSH did not think the fund would be too large; but objected to that species of legislation that provided for contingencies that would not happen for twenty years to come. Improvements are going on daily; the constitution will have to be revised again, and by that time the State debt might be paid; then we could place the specific taxes where we chose.

Mr. FRALICK—I think that the specific State tax should go into the treasury to help to pay the State debt. We borrowed money, built a rail road, sold that rail road; we now tax it, and until that debt is paid, the money we receive should be appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. CRARY—I was aware that there would be some objection to the application of this money for the cause of education. I propose to have the interest of the primary school fund paid from year to year, and secured by sources about which there can be no question. I want it so that the Executive department cannot expend it; that the Legislature cannot expend it; that it shall be understood and known that it belongs to the cause of education; that it cannot be used for any other purpose. If left in the treasury, the first difficulty in legislation would probably be to authorize the use of the money. From time to time there may be a Legislature that will do injury to the fund. The general legislation may be right; but one Legislature may do an injury that we cannot recover for a series of years. I propose to guard against the evils which one Legislature may do.

Mr. WHIPPLE—The proposition of the gentleman from Calhoun is an important one. I understand that the specific taxes are derived from rail roads, plank roads, banks, and any other moneyed corporation. I venture to predict that in a few years the fund from this service will be very large; perhaps in ten years it will amount to $100,000.

The gentleman from Calhoun says that the State is largely indebted to the educational fund, and that he wants some better security than the faith of the State. I want no better security than the faith of the State, and I think that that being pledged, it is sufficiently ample for any security. But it must be recollected that in addition to being indebted to that fund, the State is indebted to private individuals to the amount of one and a half or two millions.

While we are taking care of ourselves, we should not lose sight of our foreign creditors. I should have no objection to place it upon this fund if our State debt was liquidated; but while that remains, I am unwilling so to do, as we shall by so doing add to the burdens of the people of the State. I think, moreover, that it is the duty of this Convention to make some provision for the payment of this debt. I think it should not be left to the fluctuations of public opinion, or of legislation.

We are a young community—we are not poor—we are in comparatively comfortable circumstances; but we are a rapidly growing community, and we ought on that account not to place upon our own shoulders too great a burden, but to leave a portion to those who will come after. I believe that the people of this State will not neglect to pay the interest of the primary school fund. But we must bear in mind that the principal of the State debt, as well as the interest, will in a short time have to be arranged. If we take our available means and divert them to other purposes, we may be the means of placing a burden upon this people, greater than they will be able to bear. We had better leave a portion to those who come after us; they will be more able to sustain it than we are.

After some debate, Mr. CRARY withdrew his proposition.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the committee rose, reported the article back with the amendments, asked the concurrence of the Convention therein, and to be discharged from the further consideration of said article.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the same back to the Convention with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Convention was asked. The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same; and

On motion of Mr. WHIPPLE, the article was laid on the table and ordered printed.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. CHURCH in the chair.

The committee having under consideration the article entitled "Corporations;" and section two having been read,

Mr. WOODMAN moved to fill the blank with "ten."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH with "two."

Mr. WITHERELL with "four."

The question being taken on the largest number first, Mr. WOODMAN's motion did not prevail.

Mr. WITHERELL's amendment prevailed, and the blank was filled with "four."

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike from the section all after "elections" in the third line.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the same back to the Convention and asked leave to sit again. Leave was granted.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, (39th day,) July 25.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. FRALICK: of Seth Hughes and fifty-five other citizens of Wayne county, praying that an article may be inserted in the constitution restraining the Legislature from passing any laws granting licenses for the sale of intoxicating drinks; and if deemed expedient, to make it the duty of the Legislature to pass laws making it a misdemeanor to vend intoxicating drinks as a beverage.

By Mr. SULLIVAN: three several petitions of citizens of the county of Cass, praying for a provision prohibiting the passage of any law authorizing the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage.

By the PRESIDENT: two petitions of ladies of the city of Detroit, for a like prohibition.

The above were severally referred to the select committee upon the subject.

By Mr. ALVARADO BROWN: of A. A. Amidon and one hundred and five others, citizens of Branch county, praying the insertion of a clause in the constitution prohibiting the employment of convicts in the State Prison at those branches of mechanical labor which interfere with mechanical trades in this State. Referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. COMSTOCK, the minority report of the committee on banking and other incorporations, except municipal, was taken from the table and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. ALVORD submitted the following:

Resolved, That when the Convention adjourns at noon to-day, it stand adjourned until to-morrow, and that the Sergeant-at-arms be instructed to remove the carpet from the floor, and thoroughly cleanse the Hall.

Mr. CRARY moved to amend so as to adjourn at noon to-morrow over till Monday, but withdrew the motion.

The question was taken on the adoption of the resolution and decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. CHURCH in the chair.

The Article "Corporations," being under consideration, and the question being on striking out the last clause of section two: "When any such banking law shall have been passed, and been submitted to a vote of the electors of the State, and shall have been rejected by them, then no further banking law shall be passed for the next succeeding — years."

Mr. BARTOW was in favor of striking out the whole section. It was all wrong. The idea was wrong of submitting a long article in all its details, such as the incorporation of banks, to the people. We never can get an expression of public opinion on a long article, that will be valuable. If you submit to the people for their decision a single principle to be engrafted in the constitution, it may be proper; but to submit a long article and let them discuss its details and not the principle, would be wrong. You may as well say that every act of the Legislature shall be sanctioned by the people before it takes effect. They do not want it. They have not time, and will not devote proper attention to it.

Mr. COOK said the question before the committee was on the motion to strike out all after the word "election." That involves only one consideration, if the section is retained. If the people should decide against the law for banking, either on account of its details, or the principle, the proposition is, whether they shall have the opportunity of reconsidering their decision. If so, their Representatives can go on and submit a principle to them again. We change our opinions with a change of circumstances. If they decide against having any banking institutions, the time may arrive when the people may wish to reconsider that decision, and may wish to establish banks on what they consider safe and sound principles. That is the proposition of the gentleman from Oakland, on which we have to decide.

Mr. HASCALL said it seemed to him that there were some essential reasons why it should not be struck out. The sessions of the Legislature are limited to forty days, and the members will not have time to be bored by the lobbies. The object is this: that if a general banking law be passed and the people reject it, no other shall be passed within a specified time. If you strike out this clause, the Legislature may be bored by lobbies every session, till they get up another banking law. If they decide on the principle, it should be fixed that no other banking law shall be passed for a number of years, because it would interfere with the business of the State.

Mr. CORNELL was of opinion that the whole section was unnecessary. The gentleman from Genesee had well remarked that the people would not enter into details. If honorable, honest and candid men are sent to the Legislature, they will be impervious to the solicitations which the gentleman from Kalamazoo has represented.

Mr. SULLIVAN said—Under the clause proposed to be struck out, when a question had been submitted to the people and rejected by them, it could not be submitted to them again for a series of years; but a banking law might be rejected on account of a single provision, or for some deficiency in respect to security. If rejected on such considerations it would prevent another law being proposed. That would be wrong. There seems no reason for refusing to submit to the consideration of the people another banking law of a different character. It is not to be supposed that a precisely similar law would be submitted to them. It appeared to him that it ought to be struck out.

Mr. REDFIELD said the idea suggested by his colleague [Mr. SULLIVAN] was not applicable to the case. We have banking laws. Our banks are intended to be created under the same laws and rules. This restriction will apply to all cases.

Mr. HANSCOM said he did not rise to discuss the question under consideration, but to call attention to the principle sought to be fastened upon the people of this State by the proposed system of banking, as shadowed forth in this article. He was conscious that much diversity of opinion existed among the members of this Convention, and among the people, upon this subject; and before we proceeded to settle upon the details of a system of banking to be incorporated into the constitution, it would be well to settle the preliminary question and determine whether we will authorize, under any circumstances, the creation of such institutions in this State. On examination, he thought it would be found that several of the sections in the article might with propriety be stricken out. With the exception of five out of the eleven as reported, he saw no use in their retention. What is here proposed? That we will permit a system of banking, and base all the issues of notes and bills under that system upon stocks of the United States or our own State. Gentlemen tell us that this will render the system absolutely safe and secure. Then why clog and encumber a plan so specious with useless provisions and details? Upon the assumption of the friends of banks, these cumbrous provisions will only prevent the introduction of capital into our State from abroad. Some gentlemen propose to submit the system, as a whole, to the people in a separate article; others wish to submit each charter, with all its provisions and details, to the people. Are gentlemen certain that such a plan will render all safe?—that even that guard may not at times be found entirely ineffectual? If we are to adopt any system, most assuredly we should make it as perfect as possible with guards, if human ingenuity can devise guards, that will protect the bill holder. But as yet the wit of man has never been found equal to the accomplishment of such results. I would not absolutely condemn all systems of banking, merely because we have had a bad system; but when all experience demonstrates that all systems are bad ones, we should proceed at least with great caution. I shall, for the purpose of testing the sense of the Convention on the main question, offer a substitute for the section under consideration. Should the Convention concur with me in preventing for all coming time the creation of any banks in the State, we shall be saved the labor of preparing any plan at all.

Mr. COMSTOCK was in favor of striking out the clause for the reasons assigned, and for other reasons. He saw no reason why a law of that kind should be submitted to the people more than any other fundamental law. There was one evil which would attend it. At every election it would produce great excitement. If it were necessary to have banks—and on looking round on the circumstances of the country, and the business and commercial pursuits of the people of the State, he thought the necessity would be apparent, or those who have banks will monopolize—if their circulation were secured, he saw no necessity for those clogs upon their operations.

Look (said Mr. C.) at the securities required. If our government stocks are pledged for the redemption of their notes, the bill holder is safe. As for others who have transactions with banks, leave them to manage their transactions as other individuals, but the bill holder should be secured.

Mr. MOORE said—Mr. Chairman, I think members will see the necessity of opening out this question before they vote upon it. It is as broad as the land in which we live, and it should be considered in unity, and discussed fully in all its provisions. The question of bank or no bank, sent to the people to vote upon, without the plan or system proposed, would meet with no favor, and of course would be rejected by them. I am sorry this section has been stricken out. It contained the system proposed, the plan to be adopted; and this is the only light in which the question should be proposed to the people. I have no objection to a healthy system of banking—to sound banks—and I believe they can be created under general laws, and the system should be incorporated in the constitution, and not left to the Legislature.

If we could reduce our circulation to specie, we should not want banks; but this is impossible. We shall have the bills of other States circulating among us, if we have not our bills; and we might as well have our own as to have those of others. If they are safe, ours can be made so.

Let the system, as in the section stricken out, go before the people; let them pass upon it, and then we shall come to the conclusion whether this system is safe or dangerous. I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, this question may be restored to form and passed upon, and settled in a sensible manner, as it should be.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped it would not be struck out. He recollected the system of wild cat banks, with their issues based on broken glass, nails and swamps. This is a system adopted to rob labor of its reward, by enabling persons to bank on a debt and nothing but a debt. Basis it has none. What better is it than the basis of our wild cat banking? It enables certain persons to withdraw from the productive interests of the country ten, twenty or thirty per cent. A person may go and purchase State stocks and deposit with the Treasurer, then take the notes and purchase more stock. It is a machine by which labor is robbed of its reward. This system of banking is debt and nothing but debt.

Mr. WHITE considered this a mere matter of expediency; but it appeared to him if the principle involved in the section were carried out it would be an innovation. We might with as much propriety say the acts of the Legislature shall have no force till sanctioned by the votes of the people. He saw no particular reason why this should be acted upon here—why this particular case should be made an exception. If those corporations are necessary for commercial or other purposes, leave that power with the Legislature, that power which will exercise the functions of sovereignty.

It strikes me (said Mr. W.) that it would be an innovation on our republican institutions; it is an assertion that we have no confidence in the Legislature, and can place no reliance on those elected by the great body of the people. It seems to me the clause, if retained in the section, would be an imputation on the integrity of the Legislature.

Mr. DANFORTH hoped it would be struck out. If any one principle should be submitted to the people, it was this one on banking. It was the only thing about which he was ever embarrassed in the Legislature; his constituents considered his vote on questions of banking more than any other.

He [Mr. D.] saw no reason why the Convention should mistrust the people. It was a question the people wished to have settled. He trusted that members would be willing to let it go back to the people, and forever settle the question. It is well known to every person who has been in the Legislature that the influence of the banks over the Legislature is irresistible. He would ask his friend from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] how those influences are brought to bear?

The people should have a direct vote upon it; they understand the question. They are ripe for it; they perfectly well understand the State stock system. What would be the effect of that policy but to keep the State in debt? He hoped the State debt would be extinguished in five years. Our indebtedness deters emigrants from settling among us; persons are afraid to come into the State. Remove that, and you will increase the prosperity of the State.

Mr. HANSCOM withdrew his motion made yesterday to strike out all after "election," in third line of section 2, and offered the following as a substitute for section 2:

"No banking law or law for banking purposes, nor any act creating any association or corporation for banking purposes, shall ever be enacted by the Legislature."

Mr. J. BARTOW asked a division, and the question being taken on striking out, the same prevailed.

Mr. GOODWIN moved to amend Mr. HANSCOM's substitute, by striking out all after "no," and inserting the following: "bank shall be established under any banking law or law for banking purposes, unless the question whether the same may be established shall have been first submitted to and decided by the electors of the State, under the provisions of law."

Mr. GOODWIN said he would take this opportunity of making some remarks on the subject. The first section in the article provides that corporations, except municipal, may be established under general laws, and general laws only; so that under that provision it will be competent for the Legislature to establish banks by a general law. In consequence of the experience we have had as to banking in this State, and the feeling on the subject, I deem it proper that such a provision as that contained in my amendment should be inserted in the constitution.

In reference (said Mr. G.) to what has been stricken out, the provision that no new law should be again submitted to the people, if they rejected the first proposed, I think would be an objectionable feature. So in the other case; if a banking law were passed, and found defective, it would prevent them from altering it. Now, sir, the first section provides for a general banking law; subsequently, under this section, as amended in the manner I propose to amend it, whenever it is sought to establish a bank, the question, instead of being decided by the Legislature absolutely, would be necessarily presented to the people, whether that bank should be established or not; leaving it, if established, to be governed by the general law to be made on that subject.

I need not turn to the period of '33 and '39, when the people were scourged by the system of banking then established—the so called wild cat system, under which such immense frauds were committed. I need not call to mind the other system—chartered banks that were but little better in their effects on the public interests, and the losses which the people sustained under them. I need scarcely remark that in regard to this subject public opinion and public feeling are strong; and in that opinion and feeling I confess I participate. While a banking law is provided, I believe, to establish a bank under it, the question should be submitted to the people. They have been scourged by banks—they are the sovereign power—they wish to hold control over this subject, and I go with them. If a bank is necessary to be established, if it be more for benefit than injury to the community, the people will establish it. My proposition is susceptible of amendment; as to its form I am not tenacious; I wish only to carry out the object.

Mr. COOK—The proposition of the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. Goodwin] suits me. I am not particular about forms, if we only obtain the substance. The question is, whether the law in relation to banks, or the banking law itself, shall be submitted to the people. The committee have no particular anxiety about the mode of accomplishing it, if the object only be attained.

The committee were under the full conviction that no authority should be given to the Legislature to establish banks, without obtaining the sanction of the people in regard to the law. They were in favor of submitting this question to the people in some shape or way, because the Legislatures have heretofore gone on creating banks and banking laws, and every universal thing.

The people have lost more by banks than would pay the public debt. But the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. Hanscom] says we are going to establish a safe system; State stocks are going to be the panacea for all the public evils. How does he know that? Have not the friends of banks always said so under all their systems—that the people were protected? How can we tell what will be the state of things two years hence? Suppose the country should be convulsed, as in '37 and '38—where should we be then? Who would buy our State stocks? They would not, perhaps, sell for fifty cents on the dollar. Sir, there is no absolute actual safety in those institutions of banking which may be got up in this State or any other. Legislatures are not beyond the influences of those who want those institutions. Sir, the history of this State and of others demonstrates the fact. You never knew a Legislature to come together but they would decide against banks by a three-fourths vote, and before the close they would charter banks by a two-thirds vote. I think no gentleman will say but when the Legislature assembles here directly from the people, it expresses the views of the people.

Sir, the member from Oakland [Mr. Hanscom] staves off this question by saying this submitting the question to the people is all a humbug. But, sir, other States have fallen into this humbug. Illinois has a similar provision, that when a law is passed it shall be submitted to the people. Wisconsin has a provision similar to the one proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. Goodwin,] that bank or no bank shall be submitted to the people; if they vote aye, the Legislature may go on and charter banks; and then each charter is submitted to the people; yet the gentleman from Oakland says it is all a humbug. They did not think so there.

Sir, I am opposed to the adoption of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Oakland, for the reason that it is an acknowledged truth that there is a great difference of opinion among the people. If submitted as a separate question, I shall vote no banks; but it is well known that putting a provision of this kind in the constitution would surely hazard the adoption of the constitution by the people. There is a large number of persons in the community in favor of banks; they have not lost enough by banks to come out in opposition to them; they still think those institutions necessary to carry on the business of the country. Well, sir, when the people come to that conclusion, I shall be willing that they shall have banks. To ascertain that fact they should have the right to vote on the question.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—It seems surprising that any gentleman should object to submitting a question of this kind to the people, especially when we look back to the history of the last fifteen years—a history of fraud. It is said we must have banks. I have no objection, if a man has money, that he should lend it, if he chooses; but I contend that the banking system is a system of fraud, and we know the people have suffered from it severely. I would not put in a clause absolutely prohibiting banking; but I would leave it so that the people may control it. The State stock system will perpetuate our indebtedness, that they may bank upon that indebtedness. The business part of the community will be interested in perpetuating that indebtedness, as the moneyed men of Great Britain are in perpetuating their indebtedness, that they may live out of it.

(Mr. P. referred to instances in which the Legislature had refused to pass bank charters, but which had been lobbied through at the close of the session.) This would not have been the case had the people had a direct vote upon it.

Mr. WALKER had no objection to submit to the people the question of banks or no banks. That might with safety be submitted to the people; but he should not consider it safe to submit to the people any matter of detail or of a local nature. They could not act understandingly upon it. The proposition of the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. GOODWIN] was, that no bank should go into operation under the general banking law till its charter had been sanctioned by the people. To such a proposition there appeared to him [Mr. W.] to be strong objection. Suppose the people at Constantine wanted a bank, which they might consider necessary to facilitate their business and mercantile transactions, it must be submitted to the people at some general election, whether a bank shall be established at Constantine. Now, what would the mass of voters in the northern parts of the State, the islands of the lakes or the mineral regions know or care about it? They could not act so intelligibly upon it as their delegates in the Legislature. The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] says that the Legislature may act correctly; that when they meet they are pure; but on the subject of banks they are tampered with, and at the end of the session they carry out every proposition in favor of banks.

Now, sir, the proposition is not a bad one—to leave banking open, provided you establish a system under which the bill holder shall be protected from loss; such a system as is established in New York and other States. They do not depend on the honor or honesty of bankers; they require security for the bill holders, and it is the interest of the bill holders that we should protect them. The State authorizes the issue of those notes as money, and the State should see them paid. By requiring a deposit of stocks equal in value to the notes issued, and by giving the bill holder a preference in case of failure, it is easy to make him safe.

If we are to have no banks, depreciated bills from Ohio, Wisconsin and Canada will fill up the circulation of the State, and we shall use them instead of our own, that we could make secure. There cannot be that interchange of opinion on local matters and matters of detail, as among the members of the Legislature.

I have confidence in the Legislature; in their honor and integrity. I believe they are disposed to legislate for the benefit of the people, and I do not believe they can be so easily turned away from the path of duty. We are not authorized to say that the Legislature will not always act and shadow forth the views and opinions of the people. I would leave something to them: I would not trammel them when it might operate to the injury of the State.

Mr. BRITAIN said—Mr. Chairman, there are two or three things which I think the Convention ought to accomplish. One of them is the removal of all expense and difficulty in regard to the legislation on the subject of banks. That should be settled forever, so that our Legislature may go about the business for which they were sent. This, I suppose, some members will think worthy of consideration. More evils are to be anticipated from that source than from any other that can be pointed out. It has heretofore been the case that after our Legislature had been in session a few weeks, and applications from banks were made, the Legislature was not fit to legislate for the business of the country; they had to go with the influence of the banks, against our own interests. That is a fact, and it should not be overlooked; and to that cause may be attributed the time spent by our Legislatures. You are about to limit our sessions—the first to 60 days, and after that to biennial sessions of 40 days each. How much time will be occupied on these bank petitions, backed up by the people of a county? They will be backed up, because people will go for their own interests in opposition to the interests of the country. The business men of my county will sign a petition for a bank, who at the same time cry out against banks. How much will business be expedited, and with how much justice to other interests, if this legislation for banks be cut off? The gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] says you ought to calculate on having men of integrity in the Legislature; but on what ground does he base his calculation? Does the history of past legislation justify it? Such speculations have generally resulted in disappointment. The members of a Legislature are always more or less under external influences. A man may be influenced. The men sent to the Legislature are liable to be influenced like other men. Sir, this should not form any part of the system to be sanctioned by this Convention.

Mr. Chairman, I would say a word or two relative to the general banking law. I see that the prejudices against that law, which arose from the failure of numerous banks under it, still remain strong against that banking law itself. I am not in favor of banks; but if we have any, I would have them under a general banking law, and relieve the State from the vast amount of expense every year in legislating for banks, and from those influences for and against banks, which under our present system always surround the Legislature, and disqualify them for legislation upon any subject.

Now, sir, what reformation was ever established without meeting reverses in the beginning? Even in the establishment of a Republican form of government, how often failures occurred, which gave triumph to its enemies. We might as well say that we ought to oppose our free system of government, as to say we will oppose a free system of banking on account of the ill success attending the first effort under our defective general banking law, when we have the evidence of our senses that a neighboring State, by correcting a few of its errors, has obtained for it the preference over any other banking system. It is the pride of the State of New York, and is being copied by other States. Notwithstanding its success in the State of New York and elsewhere, it is designated here as a degrading, odious law.

To whom is the world indebted for the general banking law—the State of New York? No, sir, not at all; no more than they are to Mr. Bain for the electric telegraph. Who ever heard of a piece of machinery being invented that was not, immediately after its invention, improved?—Fulton, for instance, in his application of the power of steam to navigation. So much for the evils of the Michigan general banking law. It was got up during a time of general inflation, when land was considered more valuable than money. It was got up not with the intention of increasing banks, but to prevent their increase. Bank charters were being granted every year by the Legislature, and sold in Wall Street by persons getting them, at from $10,000 to $20,000.

If persons (as for instance the projectors of the Michigan State Bank did) could get themselves named in a bank charter so as to control it, they could sell one-half of the charter for $10,000, hold one-half of the stock, and pay the first installments with the $10,000 received, as history says they did. Does it not offer a reward of $10,000, and the privilege of being a banker besides, for getting up petitions and overwhelming the Legislature with such applications. It was not only the case with that bank; it was the same with others. I know of no other charter but what sold for enough to allow the first proprietors to pay up their shares and hold half the stock.

The numerous petitions with which the Legislature of 1837 were flooded, amounted to an instruction by their constituents to go for bank charters. Under these circumstances it was evident that the time of the Legislature would be occupied in creating banks, I may say, with instructions from the whole people. The Legislature knew there was no money in the State to take up the stock. There were more banks chartered than could live in the State, yet they were instructed to go for more; nor was the two-third rule of any avail. The friends of twenty charters combined, could carry each of the twenty through with unerring certainty, as in the case of the famous Kimble and Bishop combination in the State of New York, for the creation of twenty-seven banks, which was discovered and broken up by the arch enemy of banks, Mr. Young, after seventeen of them had actually been chartered and fastened upon the people.

The Legislature of Michigan saw no remedy for this evil but in the passage of a general banking law, under which men having capital might go into banking without paying a premium for the privilege. The world will judge some day whether there was propriety in such a measure or not. The projectors of this bank law were anxious to try the experiment cautiously, and required a capital of $100,000 to start a bank; but the enemies of the measure united with its more indiscreet friends, and so the law that $10,000 could start a bank. Persons engaged in banking, and stock jobbers, knew that stock jobbing would be at an end, and that they would not have a monopoly of stock jobbing speculations. They came in and patronized the system—they became friends of the measure. I have before me the faces of those men, and I shall never forget them. I recollect them from every county. One gentleman said: "I should wish to have a system that will give to every city and village a bank, and even two if they want them." This was against the wishes of those who wanted to check the creation of banks under the operation of the general banking law; but the law was so modified by those persons as to carry with it the elements of its own destruction; and the subsequent results of that law were but the fulfilment of the predictions made by some of the friends of the original measure at the time of the passage of this modified proposition.

A word or two relative to the administration under this banking law: for objectionable as the law was, it was nevertheless as safe as any other banking law or charter at the time, and the losses under it occurred from bad faith in the administration of banks under it.

The law required as much specie to be paid in, in proportion to the circulation, as any bank charter in the State at the time; and all other securities that were in addition to those required of other banks. It was the small amount necessary to start a bank, which enabled a few individuals to borrow the amount necessary to start a bank, and then borrow it back and return it to the original owner. I would ask how those banks were started? Who started them? Who furnished the capital for those banks? In most cases the capital could be traced from the chartered banks into the hands of the principal subscribers to the stock, and from those holding largely in chartered banks. What was the object of this? I was importuned to go into the speculation. Sir, the secret was let out. You can create banks, throw out a circulation, pay it out for property. Some will pay in for their shares in good faith; they will mortgage their farms for security. You may draw out the entire strength of the bank—you can avail yourself of all this in buying property, and permitting the bank to go down, when you may then redeem your paper at twenty-five cents on the dollar. Under this the people will suffer—the system will become odious—it will stink in the nostrils of the people, and they will reject it altogether; and then we shall have our old system of banking again. If members are not disposed to believe it, let them look at what took place. Was it not in accordance with such a proposition?

It may be answered that the gentleman had something to do with those banks. Sir, I did hold stock in the bank of Brest. I paid in $10,000 stock in good faith, which I lost and $8,500 more. It was found when the bank failed that one stock holder had drawn out $7,000 more than all the stock holders had paid in. I suffered as much from banks as most other persons, but am not aware that I have ever been benefitted by them. But I do not go with the prejudices against the system. Sir, the State of New York has profited by the system of Michigan.

I may be permitted to examine in detail some of the propositions. I should regret to see section 2 struck from the bill; because if any banks are to be created hereafter in Michigan, I want them to be created under a law submitted to and sanctioned by the people. I want to have the whole law submitted to the people, and I want all the banks in the State to be regulated by the same law. I believe the people are competent to judge on this subject. I do not wish a single bank to be submitted to the people, but under the general law approved by the people. I would have them created by the stockholders, without going with each bank to the people. If this be done, it will be a fair trial of strength between those in favor of banks and those opposed to banks. I do not wish to fasten upon the people even the banks now in existence; but if they want banks I am willing they should have them. If gentlemen wish to submit the single question of bank or no bank, I have no objection; but I want it submitted to the people on some general principle. I do not want to have one-half of the State vote themselves all the banks in the State, by voting with some of the Wayne delegation against all other banks.

I differ with the gentleman from Wayne. What is his proposition? It is to submit the question of a bank being established at a particular place by the people—suppose at Coldwater. I presume he is honest, and means what he says; but he would be deceived by his project. He has made it, I am confident, without consideration. Let us look at its effect. You ask for a bank at Detroit. What influences will you bring to bear for the purpose of leading the people to suppose that a bank is needed? that it would be good for the millers and business men of the country. Sir, some of us know how it operates. Many persons on this floor know how necessary facilities are for some quarters. Now, a bank is about to be created in Detroit. How many persons will get assurances in the city that they will get facilities for carrying on their mills, and thus enhance the value of the agricultural products of the country; and how many of these are wanting the advantages of others to buy the products of the people? It will thus be seen what influences will be brought to bear to make the farmers believe that such a bank is necessary. They will be led to believe that they will get ten per cent. more for their products, and they will go in for a bank in Wayne county.

But, sir, look at the other side of the picture. Suppose they want a bank at Kalamazoo, and they have voted for the bank at Detroit, expecting a return of the compliment. Will they receive the support of Wayne county, or any of the adjoining counties? Sir, they will not receive it. Experience shows the contrary; and the course of the Wayne delegation in this Convention on this subject, as well as those of the adjoining counties, should convince every western and northern member that there will be no good faith towards the west or north upon this subject; and that the road companies, the bankers, the tavern keepers, and in fact, all classes of eastern interests will combine, for the purpose of holding the west and the north in a kind of commercial bondage to the east, by withholding from them their share of those facilities which have already been so liberally extended to the east by "irrevocable contract," as the gentleman from Wayne calls it; and that these eastern banks will carry with them, in this opposition to the west and north, every western and northern man who shall be dependent upon them for commercial facilities.

Mr. Chairman, there are two important questions connected with this subject which should be decided wisely and justly by this Convention. Should the banking facilities of the whole State all be located in one part of the State? Should the millers and produce dealers of Niles, Kalamazoo, Grand Rapids, and other important western towns, be dependent upon Detroit for their common commercial facilities? Sir, the great expense and inconvenience of procuring them at so great a distance; the certainty of their claims being considered second to those of commercial men in the more immediate vicinity of banks, and the frequent disappointment resulting from this cause, and the great influence which Detroit could exert over commercial prices throughout the whole State, to the manifest prejudice of the western producer, ought to be sufficient to decide both of these questions in the negative, and render it unnecessary to adduce further arguments to prove either their impolicy or the injustice which must result to the north and the west by the adoption of such measures by this Convention. Sir, I am unwilling to believe that the Convention will sanction measures so unequal in their operations, and so unjust to the producing and commercial interests of a large portion of the State, and I will not trespass longer upon the time of the Convention to prove their impolicy. But I beg leave to ask this Convention how these evils are to be averted or avoided? Yes, sir, that is the question, and I put it to every member of this Convention. How are these evils to be avoided? Sir, there are but two ways in which they can be avoided.

1st. Prohibit the creation of banks, and repeal all of the bank charters in the State, and permit capital to go, unawed by banks, wherever the commercial interests of the country requires it. Shall I be told that this would be unjust to the banks? Sir, were we sent here to advance the interests of one class of the people at the expense of the balance of them? Were we sent here to advance or even to protect the interests of the banks, to the prejudice of the interests of a large portion of our constituency? And is it possible that these bankers who deal in the most available capital known to man, are so helpless that they cannot submit to those changes in your laws which public interest from time to time demands, with as little prejudice to themselves as the merchant, the farmer or the mechanic, whose capital is mostly invested in unavailable property? Are the dollars and the eagles in which those bankers deal made less valuable by a change in, or even the loss of a charter, when the public interest requires it? Well, sir, if these bankers do not suffer a depreciation of their dollars and cents, in consequence of the modification or even a repeal of their charters, in what way do they suffer? If their dollars and cents are ready, in full value, to be used in some other business, and can be as easily and safely transferred from one business to another, as the more cumbrous and unavailable property of other portions of the people, in what way can they suffer, unless it be in the modification or loss of their banking privileges. Well, sir, suppose they have lost their banking privileges, have they lost anything for which they ever paid a valuable consideration? Were they not entrusted with this privilege for the time being by the Legislative agents of the people for the avowed purpose of promoting the public interest, and could any other power on earth have entrusted them with it?

Now, sir, if the privilege of banking for the people is a right inherent in the people, and can only be conferred by the representatives of the people, is it not like other inherent rights, and only to be conveyed for the same purposes? And now, sir, for what purposes have the Representatives of the people a right to confer the rights, powers and privileges inherent in them? Have they a right to confer them except for the benefit of the people? Have they a right to confer them for the abuse and injury of the people? What a monstrous proposition! And what if the people's agents should either corruptly or unwisely, and in violation of representative duty, confer some of those inherent powers, to the manifest detriment of the public interests—have the people no power to appoint other agencies for the purpose of relieving them from the evils thus improperly inflicted upon them? What an exalted idea of State sovereignty! and what an enviable position for a sovereign State! But gentlemen say that the State had delegated her sovereignty, and that an inviolable contract was made with that delegated authority for the use of the power conferred.

Mr. President: the general proposition already established, that these powers can only be delegated for the purpose of advancing the public interest, should be a satisfactory answer to this objection, because it would leave the sovereignty at liberty to declare the contract void whenever it could be made to appear that it was against public interest; and such a contract as delegated power had no right to make. But, sir, a fear that this is not satisfactory induces me to examine for a few moments the doctrine of "inviolable contracts," and "vested rights;" and the Convention will pardon me for using a simple illustration as that is, as I have frequently found, the only way to arrive at infallible conclusions.

1st. Suppose sir, that the Legislature of 1846 had stipulated in the charter of the Central rail road that no other rail road should ever be constructed in the State.

2d. Suppose that the Legislature of 1848 had stipulated in the charter of the Farmers' and Mechanics' bank, that the charter should be perpetual, and that no other bank should ever be permitted in Michigan.

3d. Suppose the Legislature had stipulated in the charter of the Lansing and Detroit Plank Road Company the perpetuity of their charter, and that no other plank road should ever be constructed in Michigan.

4th. Suppose the Legislature which chartered the Albion Seminary had, for the purpose of making the stock more valuable, stipulated in their charter that no other literary institution should be authorized in Michigan.

Will any one doubt the validity of so much of their charters as shall be found promotive of public interests? Sir, I think not. Now, sir, will even the advocates of inviolable contracts and vested rights dare to maintain the unchangeable validity of those provisions which prohibit the creation of similar institutions in the State? Will they deny the right of the State to nullify those provisions, whenever public interest shall require the creation of similar institutions? Sir, they dare not do it; and why not? Should the Legislature incorporate another bank, could not this monopoly bank claim a contract with the Legislature of 1848 for the exclusive privilege of banking in Michigan—that the State had delegated her sovereignty to the Legislature—that the Legislature had delegated to them all the right of the State over the business of banking—that neither the State had remaining any power over the business of banking, nor the Legislature even; and that both were precluded from the further exercise of the power—and that, of course, any charter granted by the Legislature would be void, and leave the chartered company liable to all the penalties of making and circulating bank notes as money without authority. Should not your judicial tribunals, in their holy zeal to sustain the inviolability of contracts, and preserve judicial consistency, even though it be at the expense of every principle and of every interest, come to the rescue and sustain these several monopolies, so destructive, if sustained, to the future growth and prosperity of the State? Now, sir, I do not believe that this Convention is prepared to sustain the pretensions of these monopolies just described; and why not? Because, in the exercise of their common sense, they at once discover that if early Legislatures were to have granted monopolies similar to those described, a recognition of them by the present generation would be blighting to every interest of the State.

Well, sir, if these increasing pretensions may be nullified by the Legislature, because they are against public interest, may not all other claims be modified by the Legislature when they are found to be against public interest? And may we not discard that doctrine, so inconsistent with State sovereignty, which would enable a Legislature to sell the State to a corporation in which they were to become stockholders, and under the doctrine of vested rights and inviolability of contracts, hold the purchase forever? And may we not also express our astonishment at the success with which the stockholders of the various corporations have wheedled the world into an idea of the sanctity of their privileges,

Sir, if I am not in error, all the banks in Michigan, except one, are subject to legislation by the provisions of their charters; and if public interest really require it, I should think it singular indeed if some way could not be devised to remove all banks from Michigan, and permit private capital to pursue its enterprises unmolested and unawed by banks. But, sir, I said long ago that there were but two ways in which the evils of which I have been speaking could be avoided; the first of which was to dispense with all banks; and the second of which is to permit banks to be formed, under proper restrictions, when business invited their formation. Now, sir, I do not propose to discuss this point, as it must, I think, be a self-evident proposition, and sufficient has been said upon it already; but I propose to examine briefly an objection made against the practicability of the proposition. It is this, sir. Detroit is made the commercial metropolis of the State—that exchanges will be steadily and unavoidably in favor of Detroit, and that banks cannot live out of Detroit.

Sir, this objection is altogether unfounded. Michigan is an exporting State, and her exports furnish the eastern exchange for the whole State, not excepting Detroit herself. Now, sir, it would certainly be more for the interest of any place having produce to export, to transact its business with the eastern markets, and receive eastern funds or drafts, than to receive the below par paper of Detroit for their produce, and permit Detroit banks to realize eastern funds themselves. If gentlemen investigate the matter a little, they will find that the present banks of Michigan cash but little paper, except that which is payable in some part of New York, or in drafts on some part of New York, drawn upon produce, either shipped already, or to be shipped to meet such drafts. Hence, it must be obvious that a bank located in any part of the State, and furnishing facilities for purchasing the produce of its vicinity, has the same means for supplying itself with eastern exchange, and for maintaining the value of its issues, as banks in the city of Detroit, and that in fact no substantial objection can be made against permitting the establishment of banks in any part of the State where business requires them, provided they be permitted in the State at all.

Now, sir, how can one or the other of these desirable ends be accomplished? Sir, it can only be accomplished in one way, and in one way only. Your general banking law must be so formed as to repeal all banks, if it be rejected, and authorize free banks, under proper restrictions if accepted. This, sir, would make up a true issue between the friends and opponents of banks. It would strip off the mask from those demagogues who are hired by the present banks to democracy and opposition to the whole creation of banks. If a majority of the people should be in favor of banks, they would have them wherever public interest required them. But if a majority of the whole people should be opposed to banks, they would have no banks in the State, and private capital could safely go wherever public interest required it.

Mr. HANSCOM—I regret that my proposed substitute finds so little favor, judging from those who have as yet addressed the committee on the subject. It proposes, sir, the entire inhibition of the creation of banks by the Legislature. I am most decidedly in favor of it. While, sir, I cannot pretend to the experience in the business of banking which my friend from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] has had, yet, sir, I do know that the history of banking, from earliest times to the present day, throughout the world, exhibits nothing but a continuous scene of rascality, plunder and fraud—the toiling millions swindled and robbed to swell the coffers of moneyed aristocrats and mushroom aristocrats. Point me, sir, to any system of banking that has ever yet been devised, that has not directly or indirectly produced such results and led to precisely such consequences, and I will yield the whole principle.

But, sir, gentlemen tell us that the high exigencies of business and commerce absolutely require the creation and continuance of this species of institutions, and that these great purposes must be subserved, even at the expense of the evil consequences attendant upon the system. I do not propose to be thoroughly or even properly skilled in the business of commerce to judge with much accuracy as to the exigencies that really do exist for the continuance of banking; but, sir, with what light I have upon the subject, I am called upon to decide; and I do not believe but that the evils attendant upon the system far counterbalance any benefits ever yet derived, or that can be derived from its continuance.

The recent influx of the precious metals—the discovery and working the inexhaustable mines of gold in California—the rapidity with which this gold is being coined at the various mints of the country, furnishes, in my judgment, a full answer to many of the arguments adduced by the friends of banking. I need not go over the ground and advert to the thousand arguments pro and con, as applied to this subject. The experience of our own State has, or at least should have, taught us some salutary lessons. But gentlemen tell us this system of government stock securities is the great panacea for all the dangers that have hitherto been found incident to this system. The philosopher's stone has at last been discovered. But, sir, is not this proposed plan liable to most serious objections? I will advert to some that I regard as obvious, before I close.

The gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] assumes that the system adopted in New York is a perfect one;—

Mr. BRITAIN—No.

Mr. HANSCOM—Well, “nearly perfect” were perhaps the words. I think, sir, the New York system one of the most dangerous and worst, and destined in the end to be productive of more mischievous consequences than any other that has ever existed in this country. Revolutions in the business and commercial world will ever occur at intervals; and any one who has studied the history of any commercial country that ever existed, must well know that these revulsions are as certain to occur as the seasons are to change; and when they do occur they set at naught all the calculations of prudence, and break down all the safeguards designed to protect and guard the interests of society. In this country those revulsions have occurred, with greater or less intensity, at intervals varying from fifteen to twenty years; and I most confidently predict that ere the lapse of a quarter of a century the present system of banking in New York is destined to complete and final overthrow, bankrupting the State and beggaring the people.

Talk of a safe system of banking! There is no safe system; and I for one am unwilling to concede as a fact, by a provision in our fundamental law, what the experience of ages has demonstrated to be false. But, sir, let us look at the proposed guards that it is assumed puts the matter beyond the reach of danger. Submit the question, say gentlemen, to the people, whether there shall be a bank in this county, township or village. Yes, the Legislature at some session pass an indefinite number of charters for banks—they go in a batch to the electors—they pass upon the question. Aside from the entire impracticability of the thing, I do not regard it as any guard at all. Suppose the recurrence of an era like that of 1836–7 and '8, and what guard would your plan furnish? Worse than none at all. The people were as crazy as your Legislature, and would have voted for a bank, or a dozen of them, in every village or school district of the State. The object of organic law, of constitutional inhibitions, is to guard against just such a contingency.

But, sir, let us look at this State stock security system, and see if there are no objections to it. Why, sir, you are compelled to assume, as a first fact, that the general government and your State government is forever going to be in debt, and have in the market large amounts of stocks. I am among those that believe that governments, like individuals, in order to be prosperous should be out of debt. But look for a moment at the danger of this plan. By it you create, as matter of necessity, an organized, unscrupulous and active party in your various States, who favor the policy of States not only getting in debt, but keeping in debt. To illustrate: suppose we have in our State fifty banks, with an aggregate capital of two or three millions of dollars, based upon an amount of State stock deposited as security for that amount of circulation. Every officer, stockholder, employee and party in interest in these institutions, scattered over the State, are leagued in efforts to keep your State involved in debt. Add to this the fact that every person and every class of persons who seek to engage in the business of banking, are combined to induce still more extended indebtedness to furnish them with a basis for operations, and then tell me whether your system is not liable to the most serious and grave objections. I said, sir, that I had had no experience in this kind of business, but I have read much upon the subject, and my deliberate conviction is, that all systems of banking are but modifications of the gigantic plans for swindling, that the history of the South Sea bubble, of John Law's Mississippi banking scheme, and the old bank of the United States, and thousands of others that might be instanced, discloses.

But, sir, one other notable plan to make a safe system has been hit upon, to which I must advert. I do so to call attention to it without assuming the one side or the other of the proposition as the true one. "Personal liability of the stockholders" is the last anchor proposed to hold to its moorings, with absolute certainty, this treacherous bark. I presume it will not be pretended that the personal liability of a man pecuniarily worthless, will be of any possible use to the creditor or bill holder of these institutions. Now, let me ask gentlemen whether this absolute liability provision for all the debts of the proposed bank will not prevent men of real capital, who actually have money to loan, and look to banks as a good mode of investing, from becoming stockholders? If so, the direct tendency of the whole thing is to confine the business of banking to that class of men who have been, in this State and others, generally engaged in it—men who want to borrow money, rather than those who have it to lend; in short, adventurers without capital, sharpers seeking to live by their wits at the expense of honest men.

I have already extended my remarks far beyond what I intended, but I could not in justice to my own convictions of duty, do less than to define briefly the amendment I proposed. You talk of safe banking systems—of good systems—of creating by banks a sound currency, and furnishing facilities to commercial men for the prosecution of their business. Experience has demonstrated the futility of the first, and proven that the latter objects can be attained without the aid of this system of legalized robbery and plunder. I hope the substitute may be adopted.

Mr. HANSCOM then modified his proposed substitute so as to read "creating or renewing."

Mr. GOODWIN said, this presents the distinct question between the prohibition of all banks and whether any banks shall be authorized, either under a general banking law or the direct sanction of the people. After what I have said, sir, the committee will see that I am keenly alive to the evils that resulted to this State under the banking laws that existed in 1838 and '39. No man can be more so; no man observed more of those evils and the distress occasioned; and unless the Convention shall decide in the first place, that banks shall be established under a general law, sanctioned by the people, or that the question as to particular institutions shall be submitted to the people, and in that I am not particular, I shall go for a prohibition against all banks. I know, sir, that many men of business and good citizens, believe that, as we have a banking currency from other States, it is desirable and necessary to have banking institutions of our own, under our own constitution and laws. A large portion of our currency consists of bank paper introduced from other States and the Canadas. If that could be avoided, if you could erect around our State a Chinese wall against this foreign currency, and have for our circulating medium nothing but coin, I should be disposed to favor the proposition. I believe you would have an ample currency; that the precious metals now existing in the commercial world, and the quantities now so rapidly produced by the mines of California and other countries, would furnish an ample supply.

It is insisted, however, by men of wisdom and experience, that you must have some of those institutions in the State, but guarded by law so that the bill holders shall be protected. An objection has been made that if the people are called upon to establish an institution in a particular part of the State, those in other parts would not be advised so as to act understandingly on the subject. I do not concur in this view. A proposition for an institution of that kind will be generally known; it will circulate with rail road power and telegraphic speed. Intelligence in regard to it and all its incidents will be communicated, and they will act as well, as intelligently, in one part of the State as another. If it can be submitted to the people, I am not particular about the mode, so that it effects the object. To provide a circulating medium is part of the sovereign power of the State. It has been always so considered. The power of determining what shall circulate as money belongs to the sovereignty of a country. The government of the United States, under the constitution, say what shall be money; but in the States they have in fact substituted bank paper, which has taken the place of the constitutional currency. You have in fact abolished the circulating medium established by the United States government. If these banks are to be established, who should have the power? Those in whom the sovereignty is vested.

This brings us back to the proposition before the Convention, and the question is, who shall exercise this sovereignty, the people or their agents?—for the Legislature are but agents when they exercise this attribute of sovereignty. It is right that the direct agency of the people should be recognized in the first instance. In view of the feeling on this subject, I am in favor of referring it to the people for their own action in their sovereign capacity; if this cannot be done, then I am for the prohibition.

The gentleman from Berrien has alluded to the past operation of banks, and to the banking law which resulted so disastrously. Surely, from the mortgage of wild lands as a basis, failure might have been expected. Such was the result. But there was another feature in that system to which the gentleman has not alluded. It was the suspension of specie payments. The Legislature not only applied the suspension law to those banks in existence—to those institutions already in operation,—but to those which might afterwards come into operation under the general law. These were in fact permitted to issue their notes without the obligation to pay. But for that measure, I do not believe those disasters adverted to would have ensued. Without that, a large portion of those "wild cat" banks would never have existed; the specie circular of the general government would have prevented, or soon have extinguished them, and the injury could not have been so extended.

Mr. BUSH was opposed to Mr. Goodwin's amendment. It proposes that the question shall be submitted to the people whether they will or will not have banks. If they decide in the affirmative, then the Legislature shall go on and provide a law, under the uniform operation of which banks may be created. This, sir, is not so safe as a banking law submitted to the people—its provisions and details analyzed and criticised by the people and the public press. Let a law be first passed by the Legislature, and if sanctioned by the people, banks may grow up under it. He [Mr. B.] would go for the proposition of the gentleman from Oakland in preference to that of the gentleman from Wayne.

Mr. BRITAIN—Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. Goodwin] has called our attention to the evils growing out of the suspension law, and particularly those resulting from that portion of the law allowing banks under the general banking law to come into operation under the suspension of specie payments. Now, sir, I want to call the attention of the Convention for a few moments, first, to the objects and consequences of the suspension law; and, secondly, to the extension of that law to what the gentleman has been pleased to denominate the "wild cat" banks.

1st. Was there a necessity for the first suspension law? What did the law provide for the banks, what were its objects, and what were its consequences?

Sir, suspension did not begin with Michigan; had it so begun, Michigan had been without apology. But, sir, it began with States east of us, and extended to States south and west of us. New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and, in fact, all the States with which Michigan had any commerce, adopted the policy of suspension; and was it possible for Michigan to sustain herself without it? Sir, when the people of Michigan asked their Legislature to grant the banks of Michigan a suspension of specie payments, those banks (and they were all of them chartered banks) had more than a million and a half in circulation, which would certainly have been brought home to them for redemption in specie, and much of it by the brokers of those States which had refused specie payments. Now, sir, was it possible for the banks of Michigan to redeem their circulation in specie, when they could not obtain specie from the banks of neighboring States upon their bills? And what would have been the consequence to the bill holders of a failure on the part of these banks to redeem in specie on demand?

Why, sir, how could the banks of Michigan redeem in specie? Where was the specie to come from for such a redemption? Suppose a broker from Cleveland or Buffalo had demanded payment in specie from the Detroit banks upon half a million of their bills, and the Detroit banks had promptly tendered him in payment the bills of Ohio or even New York banks, would this broker have received it? Every gentleman who has given the subject a moment's reflection knows that he would not, because he had a legal right to insist upon specie, and specie was then worth a large premium.

Let us now follow this process of redemption a little further, and suppose that the Detroit banks had met this first demand of half a million, by payment in specie; could they have replenished their specie by sending home the bills of Ohio or New York banks, or those of the banks of any other State? Sir, the idea is preposterous. Then how could they have replenished their specie, and from whence could it have been obtained for continuing specie payments? Sir, it could not have been obtained, except by the payment of such premiums as no bank could pay and sustain itself; and sooner or later these banks must have failed to pay specie on demand, which would have worked a forfeiture of their charters, and carried with it to the bill-holders all the attendants upon broken banks with an extended circulation.

Sir, it was to prevent the occurrence of this dreadful evil, and to enable the banks to redeem their circulation without loss to the bill holder, that the suspension law was passed; and the law itself only relieved the banks for a given period from a forfeiture of their charters for refusing or failing to pay specie on demand. It did not either directly or indirectly relieve them from any of the legal remedies provided to enforce the collection of debts.

Sir, this law was not passed, like the suspension law of 184, to enable banks to increase their circulation; but it was passed to enable banks to redeem their circulation. And it most fully accomplished the object for which it was passed; for under its exemptions almost the entire million and a half of circulation was redeemed, without the loss of a dollar to the bill holders. An intelligent public will judge of the wisdom and justice of the measure.

Mr. Chairman, I consider it the duty of every citizen, on all proper occasions, to defend his State against all unjust imputations, and I therefore beg permission to call the attention of this Convention for a few moments to another measure, which necessarily grew out of this measure of suspension, and for which Michigan has been most unjustly and immeasurably censured, both by the designing and inconsiderate. I allude, sir, to the law granting redemption to persons having lands sold upon mortgages.

Sir, it is the duty of public men to ascertain the effect of public measures upon all the different interests of the State, and they have no right to advance one interest at the expense, or even to the prejudice, of another. Now, sir, the passage of the suspension law, without giving to the mortgager a corresponding time for the redemption of his lands, sold during the suspension, must have been ruinous to this numerous, industrious and respectable portion of our citizens.

Let us, by a simple illustration, see what the operation would have been, as that is the only way to arrive at infallible conclusions. A. has mortgaged to B. his farm, worth $5,000, to secure the payment of $2,000 and interest in three years. About the time the mortgage becomes due, A. goes to B. with the money to take up the mortgage. B. looks upon the money and declines taking it because it is not specie. A. pleads with him, and says this money is all of it upon good Michigan banks; they were paying specie when I took it, and they will pay specie again next June. You are abundantly able to hold it until that time, and if you insist upon it I will pay you for holding it. But B. knowing his advantage, declines all arrangement, saying the law gives me the specie, and I must have it, or seek my remedy under the mortgage. A. now flies to the banks with their bills, in the hope that he can induce them to help him out of his difficulty. He is received with great kindness by the bank officers, who assure him that they will do anything in their power to relieve him, and for a moment he is encouraged; but the next moment he hears with pain, the sentence which had been begun in such kindness, concluded as follows: "it would give us great pleasure to help you, sir, but there are thousands of others in the same situation. If we help one we must help all, which would be ruinous and impossible; and besides this difficulty, the board of directors in June last, entered upon our books a resolution prohibiting the payment of specie upon any of their bills during the existence of the suspension law, and that they really have no discretion in the matter." The case of the mortgager is now become hopeless. The mortgagee forecloses the mortgage, and on the day of sale demands the specie, which is not to be had—bids in the farm for $500, which is worth $5,000, and still holds the bonds of A. for $1,500 more.

Now, sir, what could the Legislature do? They could not by law relieve the mortgaged premises from sale, as that would have been a "law impairing the obligation of contracts," and prohibited by the constitution. They must pass the suspension law to save the banks from failure, and A. from the loss of his money, in addition to the loss of his farm. Now, sir, I ask again, what could the Legislature do? Sir, they could do just what they did do; give to A. a remedy for the evils which the public interest required them to inflict upon him, by giving him such a time for redemption as would enable him, on the resumption of specie payments by the banks, to obtain from them specie upon his bills, and to redeem his farm with it, by paying to B. a fair interest for the use of his money; and thus, Mr. Chairman, saving from ultimate sacrifice, every legitimate interest of the people; and, notwithstanding the noise which has been made about "ex post facto laws," and exemption laws, by persons who were defeated in their unholy designs of plundering their neighbors, and turning them with their families houseless into the street, and by persons who have, without examining the equity of the subject, joined them in spreading this base slander upon our State. I am willing also to leave the wisdom and policy of this measure to the judgment of an enlightened public.

Now, sir, one word to my friend from Wayne, [Mr. GOODWIN] who informed us when last addressing this Convention, "that the great error of the suspension law was that of extending it to the wild cat banks, and permitting them to come into existence under a suspension of specie payments, and that most of the evils experienced under the suspension law originated from this source." Now, sir, the gentleman from Wayne was in error. The provisions of the suspension act extending the privilege of suspension of specie payments to the wild cat banks, as they are called, was a very stringent one, and only entitled them to the privilege of suspension so long as their circulation did not exceed once and a half the amount of specie actually paid in and contained in the vaults of the bank at the time. Now, sir, had these banks been in a condition entitling them to the privileges of suspension, they would have been perfectly secure, and no evil would have been felt from them.

Now, sir, let us see what would have been the condition of a free bank coming into existence under the suspension law, with $15,000 paid in. Under the law she could put in circulation $22,500; what would she have to redeem this $22,500 with:

1st. She would have specie,	$15,000
2d. Endorsed notes, just received, and should be good,	22,500
3d. Real estate securities at one-half the assessed value,	50,000

Thus giving to the bill holder $87,500 as security for the redemption of $22,500. And if the bank should decrease its specie to $10,000, it must reduce its circulation to $15,000, or lose the privilege of suspension; and for the redemption of this $15,000, it would have:

Specie,	$10,000
Endorsed notes,	15,000
Real estate securities at one-half their cash value,	50,000

Making in all in availables just taken out, and of course good, $75,000 for the redemption of $15,000. Now, sir, if such banks would not have been safe, I would be happy to have the gentleman show me a safe bank.

At the time of the passage of the suspension act, several of these free banks were coming into existence. It was not expected that they could do business under the provision made for them, nor was it intended that they should; and it was given them merely to enable them to complete their organization and live to the expiration of the law. The evils to which the gentleman alludes did not arise from the suspension law, nor from their charters; but from the direct violation of both; and those laws are no more chargeable with the evils practiced, than the law punishing murder is with violations of that law. Had gentlemen examined the law and informed the bill holders what their rights were under it, instead of joining in the cry of "wild cat" and "red dog," raised by designing and interested bankers, they would have rendered the State a much more essential service.

When the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] offered his proposition this morning, prohibiting the State from creating banks and from passing any law under which banks could be formed, I could not avoid realizing the embarrassing condition in which it placed the Convention. If they voted with him, they voted for giving Detroit a monopoly of banking for all time to come; and if they voted against his proposition, they would be branded by him as opposed to the democratic doctrine of opposition to banks. Now, sir, the gentleman from Oakland would have us understand that he is opposed to all banks, and he may be so; but if the banks of Detroit were to draw from their sinking funds $50,000 and send here in the hands of an adroit manager to influence this Convention, they would instruct him to accomplish precisely what the gentleman has attempted to do. Sir, the proposition looks well on paper, because it smacks of the popular doctrine of opposition to banks; and no doubt it will receive the support of gentlemen whose democracy can never be found in their measures, but whose mantles are full of democracy and opposition to banks, and at the same time do precisely what persons fed by the banks to attend to their interests here would do.

Now, sir, if the gentleman will add to his proposition a provision that no banks shall exist in Michigan after 1852, he would show himself a consistent opponent of banks, and the Convention could vote understandingly upon the subject. But, sir, to vote for his proposition as it is, would be to vote for giving Detroit all the banks she now has, and prohibiting the balance of the State from having any; and every unprejudiced mind must see that this would be great injustice to the balance of the State, as it would continue the whole produce business of the western portion of the State subject to the control of the city of Detroit.

Sir, justice to the different portions of the State demands that you shall have no banks in the State, or that you shall permit them to be located where the business of the people requires them. If you reject banks from the State altogether, and the theory of those opposed to banks be true, capital will at once find its way into the State for the transaction of all legitimate business; and when it comes, sir, where will it stop? Will it all seek and find the same location? No, sir. It will go where the business requires it, and our flourishing manufacturing towns in the west will be sure to have their share. But, sir, will individual capital go to those places from the transaction of the produce business while you have banks in other portions of the State? No, sir, individual capital cannot compete with bank facilities, for the following reasons:

1st. Individual capital must be on hand for business, at the expense of interest, while bank facilities only pay interest on the amount actually in business.

2d. If there are banks in the country, persons coming into the country to purchase produce or provisions always go to the banks for the purpose of making an exchange speculation between the funds they bring in and the less valuable funds of the banks, which they are told will be good enough to purchase the farmers' produce with; and also to learn from the banks what business men of the country are worthy of confidence. Now, sir, any man can see that a bankrupt who was receiving bank facilities would be spoken of as worthy of credit, by being told that the banks were doing business with him; while the individual doing business by the side of him, with an available capital of $50,000, would be spoken of as a person of tolerable business habits, but about whom the bankers knew but little; they think he is a pretty good man, but say the bank has always preferred to do business with the other. Sir, this account from a banker is always sufficient to carry the stranger into the hands of the bank pet. And now, sir, let me ask gentlemen if this is a fancy sketch? Have they not seen wealthy and industrious business men actually robbed of their business in this quiet but sure manner, until they have become bankrupts, and this same business carried to bankrupts who remain in banks still, the banks securing to themselves all the profit of the transaction? Sir, if capitalists go into the produce business in the vicinity of banks, it is their true policy to invest their own capital at interest, and depend upon bank facilities, because they cannot, upon their own capital, compete with bank facilities.

Now, sir, I wish to apply this conclusion to the question under consideration. The only safety for the farmer is in competition for the purchase of his produce; and four things are self evident, all of which prove that a few banks in one part of the State are against this competition:

1st. If there be any banks in the State, bank facilities must purchase the farmers' produce; because, as already shown, individual capital cannot do it in competition with bank facilities.

2d. If there be but few banks, and these all in one part of the State, they can confine these facilities principally to their own friends, and only grant them upon conditions which prevent the competition above spoken of, so necessary to the producer.

3d. The produce dealer and the producer in the immediate vicinity and under the eye of the banks, will have a preference and an undue advantage over the produce and dealers of the more remote portions of the State.

4th. The dealers of the more distant portions of the State must add to the ordinary expenses of their business that of procuring bank facilities at so great a distance; all of which must be paid by the farmer in the decreased price of his produce.

Now, sir, do not these facts prove that one of two things should be done by this Convention. 1st. Either free the State entirely from banks, and permit individual enterprise to carry capital wherever business invites it; or 2nd. permit individual enterprise to make banks wherever business invites it to make them. Sir, anything short of one of these two things would be injustice to the western portion of the State, and should not be entertained by this Convention.

But, the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. ROBERTSON] says "he cannot go with the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] in favor of uniting all the banks, with the friends of banks in favor of a general banking law, by which more banks would be created." Well, will the gentleman from Macomb do another thing? Will he go with us and do equal justice to the east and the west, by repealing all bank charters in the State? Oh no, he cannot possibly do that, because bank charters are vested rights, and inviolable contracts.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Macomb, has in these statements said one of two things, which I regretted to hear from that quarter.

1st. He has said in effect that he could not consent to let the whole people have banks, even if they wanted them.

2d. He has said in effect that he would secure to the banks and their friends in his own eastern portion of the State, all of their present banking privileges and facilities, as a bribe to induce them to join him in withholding from us those privileges which he and they so liberally enjoy, and compel us to remain tributary to them for commercial facilities forever. Sir, I have said that I regretted such sentiments from such a quarter. Sir, I do regret them; they savor more of calculating selfishness than of self-sacrificing patriotism; they do more honor to the head than to the heart.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the Convention will pardon me for this trespass upon their time. I have both felt and witnessed the evils of which I have been speaking, and I have been so strongly impressed with a sense of the obligation of this Convention to secure to the different portions of the State an equal opportunity for commercial facilities, and so entirely satisfied that this can only be accomplished by either rejecting all banks from the State, and thereby making it safe for private capital to go wherever business invites it, or by permitting individual enterprise to create banks, under proper restrictions, wherever business will justify it, that I could not forego the privilege of urging it upon this Convention.

Mr. MASON hoped the amendment would not be adopted. He had no objection to submitting a general law to the people; but to submit each and every bank charter to the people would be a perfect farce. The gentleman from Wayne proposes that each institution shall be submitted to the people. He [Mr. M.] would submit to the Convention whether such a proposition would be a test of the opinion of the people on banking generally? Suppose the Legislature passed an act to establish a bank in the village of Lansing. Who would care about it except the people of Lansing? Other parts of the State might go against it, however necessary it might be for this place or this section of country.

Mr. N. PIERCE had calculated this was not a new subject; he presumed every member knew something about banks. These are all old stories about banking. It has been handled by political parties; and of crimination and recrimination we have had enough for years. If any banks are to be established, we want safe banks. He would not give anything for a corporation whose circulation was worth nothing. If any gentleman could bring up anything new on the subject he would be glad to hear it.

The question is whether we shall have no banks and have a flood of paper from other States. It has been the case that we have used notes of other States and done business with them. He would rather have no banks than have them doubtful, irregular, or evading the payment of their notes in specie. If you increase the circulation it will increase the price of stock; it is more for the interest of the producer than the consumer.

I am in favor of having a plenty of circulation, because I am a farmer. If you increase the circulation, then farms are worth more. With a specie circulation we shall get three or four dollars for an article which with a paper circulation we may get fifteen. A man traveling, too, would have more money to spare. But (said Mr. P.) as this subject has been much agitated, I think it may be settled without arguing the matter a week.

Mr. HANSCOM—From some of the remarks of democratic members, I think I have been misunderstood, or they are deluded. I had supposed that they would have gone against banks, which they have been battling for years, and have almost got the victory. But they come in here and throw down all the barriers and let in all the influences that can be brought to bear in favor of them. The gentleman from Wayne, to whom we must award some credit for purity of intention, would leave the power in the hands of the Legislature, or the people, on this subject. Sir, it is too idle. In 1837 the people would have voted for a bank in every school district in the State. We have trusted the Legislature with that power, and what has been the result? If his proposition prevails, I have no doubt the same result will prevail in future.

Mr. ———.—The gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] when moving to strike out, said we needed banks, and that they should be put in a safe condition, and the bill holders be protected; and that the rest of the article should be struck out. Among those provisions he would strike out what is in the individual liability clause. By his adroit parliamentary tactics, he comes up against all banks, and has withdrawn that proposition. Whether he is sincere or not, I do not know; but when he first came out, I supposed he was in favor of banks.

I am not surprised at his course, when I recollect he was opposed to single districts for representation—to biennial sessions, and to limitation of the time of the session. I was not surprised at his action on this question. He, and others on the same side, are opposed to leaving it to the people—they have a distrust of the people—it is natural to suppose so, because the banks are opposed to the interests of the people; they are endowed with special privileges, distinct from the general privileges of the people.

The gentleman, [Mr. PIERCE,] contends we should have bills from banks of our own, because others would come in. But, should not we establish a principle? Should we establish a monarchy because there are monarchs around us? The protective system is opposed by the people, but it is advocated by the high tariff party on the ground that other nations have protective laws. The gentleman would sustain banks on the same principle. But there was no reason that because other nations had protective tariffs, we should; or that we should establish banks because other States have suffered and are suffering from them. I am in favor of submitting the question to the people whether we are to have any banks or not.

Mr. GOODWIN said there had been three propositions before the Convention: the question of bank or no bank—the proposition to submit the general banking law to the people, and that also requiring each separate charter to be submitted to the people. The gentleman from St. Clair [Mr. MASON] thinks the proposition to submit every charter to the people a farce, and that where they were not interested in the particular institution, they would vote against it. I do not know, if he believes the people would vote against establishing them, whether he would give the power to the Legislature to establish them. The people would take interest enough to examine and decide whether an institution should be established or not. If the people in their sovereign capacity prohibit it, I would say no. Let us have an entire prohibition or leave it to the people to say so or not.

Mr. MASON—I said I saw no impropriety in submitting a general proposition, but that in establishing a local institution there would be no public test of the opinions of the people. I said it would be a farce in submitting the question of a bank at Lansing to the people of St. Clair. If some general principle was about being adopted, the people generally would be interested, but not in mere local institutions.

Mr. KINGSLEY said—I like to agree with the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. Goodwin,] for he is generally right; but, in this case, he is clearly wrong. It is provided in the first section of the article under consideration, that corporations may be formed under general laws; this allows the Legislature to make a general law under which banks may be organized; and the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne is, in effect, that no single bank shall be established under such general law without a vote of a majority of all the votes cast in the State at some general election upon that single question. This provision seems to me to be unwise, if not impracticable. Several important things must be well understood by all the electors in the State before they can vote understandingly on such a proposition. They must first be well acquainted with the general law under which the bank is to be established; they must be acquainted with the place where the bank is proposed to be located—its location, its population, and the amount and kind of business done therein, and its proximity to other banking institutions. Suppose the proposition is to locate a bank at St. Joseph; tickets must be provided for all the electors, something like this: "Bank at St. Joseph?—Yes." "Bank at St. Joseph?—No;" and the people in all parts of the State, even in the Upper Peninsula, are to vote upon the question;—people who may never see a bill from the bank they may authorize, and who cannot be acquainted with the subject upon which they vote. And further, many propositions of the same kind may be presented at the same time, enough to make a little book. Still more, this question will be likely to be presented in some form at every general election—the exciting question of "bank or no bank;" for that will be the question. We have just made provision in the constitution to get rid of one exciting question which was continually occurring at elections—the question of "license or no license;" now we propose to provide for leaving the people questions to decide at the general elections far more mischievous and exciting than the one we get rid of; questions which cannot be decided intelligently by all the people. The proposition, it appears to me, is too absurd to receive the sanction of this Convention.

In speaking of the question directly before us, gentlemen have spoken to the question whether any banks shall be allowed to exist in this State. Following the example of others, I will say a few words upon that question. If the question were, shall there be any banks in the United States? I think I would say no. That would place all the States upon the same footing. But we are so situated that it becomes a question of State policy, whether we shall incorporate banks in this State to supply the currency for the State, or depend upon the institutions of other States to furnish that currency. In voting upon this question I shall not vote for the provision that prohibits the establishment of any bank in the State. Nor is there any danger that future Legislatures will grant loose and dangerous charters for banking purposes. They are too well acquainted with the whole principle of banking to allow themselves to be over-reached by the applicants for bank charters. The people of no State are so well schooled in the mysteries of banking as the people of this State. No people have paid so dearly for their instruction on that subject, and none will remember it longer.

The wild cat banks which gentlemen have spoken of, are fresh in my recollection. I voted for the law that established those banks, and for the law that authorized their suspension of specie payments. But there was incorporated in that law a severe penalty for issuing paper for more than a fixed amount beyond the amount of specie actually in the vaults of the banks. If this law had been regarded, no injury would have been done. It was not regarded by the banks, and no one enforced the penalty; hence the country was flooded by a worthless currency. The general banking law of that day was voted for through ignorance and the pressure of the times. The people themselves would then have voted for the same system, had the proposition been submitted to them.

Mr. WHIPPLE, (in his seat.)—I did not vote for it.

Mr. KINGSLEY—That may be. Sometimes members will vote against a measure that they wish may succeed. The remark may not apply to this case, but it is a trick of some to vote against a law that may operate injuriously, so that if it does operate so, they can point to the vote and say—"I voted against that law." It is true that, with whatever good motives one supports a measure that turns out bad, he will be condemned for it, though his very constituents were in favor of it; for they will say he should have known better; while, however beneficial may be a measure that he may carry, he will get no credit for it, for he has done no more than his duty.

But, to go back to the bank issue. After having been caught in voting for the general banking law, and seeing the evils that grew up under it, I endeavored to inform myself upon the subject of banking, and read "Gouge on Banking," "Cobbett on Paper Money," and whatever I could find written on that subject. I will not admit, now, that I am entirely ignorant of the principle of what is called banking. The question is not whether banks are beneficial or injurious to community, but it is whether this State will, in all future time, prohibit the establishment of banks within its limits.

All the States with which the State does business have established banks, and use a paper currency which their own institutions furnish: the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, and to these may be added Canada—all of which may be said to join us, and most of our trade is with them—that trade is daily, and to a large amount. Now, it is impossible, while the States that surround us, and with whom our commerce is, use a paper currency, that we should use a specie currency. The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. GOODWIN] says if we would exclude bank paper from the State, specie would follow in and take its place. It cannot be so. It is impossible among thirty States, all of which use a paper currency, to select one State therefrom and say that it shall have only a specie currency, while commerce is kept up between that and the other States. It is an established principle that specie will not become a general currency where bank paper is used as such. A number of years ago we passed a law to prohibit, under a penalty, the circulation of bills of other States of a less denomination than five dollars. The law was a dead letter upon the statute book; no one regarded it. Much the same may be said of the law prohibiting the circulation of bank bills from Canada. Who has ever been prosecuted for a breach of that law? And yet it is broken every day. But for information on this point, let us look to a State that has no bank and can have none. The constitution of Illinois provided that there should be no bank established in the State except a State bank. There was a bank at Shawneetown, established under the territorial government; and the State after its organization established a State bank, which went into full operation with its branches. A crisis came which crushed all these banks; their bills depreciated in value, and finally went out of circulation. Since that time they could have no banks.

Mr. COOK (in his seat)—Illinois has had a new constitution since that time.

Mr. KINGSLEY—Then in that I am behind the times. The recent volume of constitutions has no new constitution for Illinois in it. I obtained my information from the book before me. But that will make no difference with the argument; there are no banks in the State of Illinois. Have they a specie currency? Far otherwise; they have the worst possible paper currency. A man in Chicago by the name of Smith issued last year, it is said, half a million of dollars in paper, without any authority of law.

Mr. BRITAIN (in his seat)—Fourteen hundred thousand dollars were issued by him.

Mr. KINGSLEY—Then I have named much too small an amount. This fourteen hundred thousand dollars was issued and kept in circulation for the want of a better or different currency. No one was legally responsible for its redemption. It was issued under a pretended license to the Wisconsin Insurance Company; which indeed was no license at all—or if there was any such license, it was long since taken away by repealing the act.

Yet, this large amount was kept in circulation in a State where they will have no banks! A currency for which no one is responsible, and which appears to be entirely beyond the control of those who tolerate it. And this is not all; for this one man cannot supply a sufficient currency for the State. I have been informed by those who have travelled through the State for the purpose of collecting money, that no other State has so bad a currency—that the most uncurrent money from other States found its way there—that even that was very scarce; and when they had made their scanty collections they were compelled to pay, on reaching Chicago, five per cent. for a draft on New York, in such money as they could collect in Illinois.

I had occasion to be in Chicago last winter, and learned these things and more in relation to their money matters. In going along the streets of Chicago you will very often see signs out: "money to loan," "money to loan on deposit of goods." You would think money was plenty in that city. Go into one of the offices and ask them how they will advance money on good paper; they will tell you for from five to seven per cent. if the paper suits them. But you will be surprised to find that they mean from five to seven per cent. a month; and that the paper they want is a kind of pocket judgment, which the money lender always has with him, printed ready to fill out. If this pocket judgment can be obtained against a man unquestionably good, so that the lender can go at the time the money is to be paid and get an execution, and levy on property immediately, if it is not paid, you can get money for about seventy per cent. per annum. The same state of things, it is said, exists in the State of Wisconsin, another State in which they will have no banks. They have the worst paper currency, and very little of that.

The State Legislatures now require ample security for the redemption of bills which they authorize banks to issue. They require that the stockholders shall be personally liable for the redemption of the bills; and they require State stocks to be deposited as security for the payment of the bills. The last Legislature incorporated a bank at Ann Arbor. They required that the stockholders of the bank should deposit in the treasury of this State, United States stocks to the amount of the bills they are allowed to issue. They required the deposit of fifty thousand dollars, which cost, it is said, sixty-five thousand dollars, before they could issue bills to the amount of fifty thousand dollars. This bank may not be of much benefit to the county of Washtenaw; but it can do no injury. The bills of the bank are redeemable in the city of New York at three-fourths of one per cent.; which makes them better than any other paper currency in the State.

It is also very convenient for those living in the vicinity of the bank to buy drafts payable in New York. Heretofore we were compelled to go to Detroit to a bank or broker to get drafts. Whatever bills of that bank do circulate among us we shall know to be good. If other large villages in the State shall have established in them a bank on as safe a basis as that at Ann Arbor, it will be a convenience to them, without doing injury. If such banks, with those we already have, furnish the currency for the State, we shall be saved from that doubtful and depreciated currency which finds its way into a State where they have no banks.

I will vote for the proposition to leave it to the people to say by their votes whether they will have any banks in the State; but will not say by my vote here that we will have none.

Mr. CRARY was opposed to the proposition of the delegate from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] and from Wayne, [Mr. GOODWIN.] The amendment of the latter gentleman pre-supposes that the people will make themselves familiar with the wants of localities far removed from them. Our own want of knowledge of the situation and condition of several of our northern counties should teach us that the voters at Copper Harbor will not be likely to be very well informed of the banking necessities of an interior village in the southern part of the State.

The amendment of the delegate from Oakland would operate as a bonus to the present existing banks. The adoption of our constitution with such a clause in it, would enhance the value of their stocks as much as the adoption of the Texas constitution did the stock of the old bank of the Texan Republic. Individually, I am opposed to the establishment of banks in the State. We are, to so great an extent, a debtor country, as every new country must be, that banking cannot be legitimately carried on among us. You can throw no safeguards around, so as to render them safe against the fluctuations which are ever incident to a new country. In a season of great prosperity banks may flood the country with their paper; but one short crop will force them to contract their issues, so that money can only be plenty when the people have abundant means to purchase it. At such times money will be plenty without banks. My opposition to banks, however, will not prevent me from making provision for them, if desired by the people. We propose leaving to them the settlement of some other important questions, and this may be included among the number. If you say there shall be no banks, your constitution may be rejected; for there was one party in the State who were generally in favor of banks, and perhaps one-third of another party. Let the people decide the question as proposed by the Article. The question should be taken on a bill drawn up and submitted, and not on a proposition of banks or no banks. If taken on a bill, the details would have to be acceptable; but if taken on the proposition of banks or no banks, we might afterwards have established a system of banking that would not accord with our wishes.

Mr. HANSCOM—I had supposed my proposition embraced the whole; but as the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. Crary] says it will be a bonus to the banks which have been established, I will go for the proposition of the gentleman from Berrien, for the total annihilation of banks. I would desire to reach the root of the whole evil, in the proposition I made. I would only further say that gentlemen have either designedly, or for some reason or other, misunderstood my first proposition. I did not intimate that I was in favor of one word of it. I have been for years opposed to this system of plunder and fraud. Our own experience is the best experience. But gentlemen must know, on reflection, that we are coming on the verge of a commercial revolution. Those convulsions come round in rotation. While we are free from their influence, let us guard against those monopolies and those crises. In '37 the people would have voted for a bank in almost every school district in the State, and a rail road to every man's farm. This shows that we should throw around all the guards we can, that the people, in a moment of excitement, may not overthrow every thing.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH was opposed to submitting single charters to the people. A number of questions are involved which involve principles. First, shall banks be chartered? If so, how? By special charters or by law. Shall banks or no banks be submitted to the people? Shall any banks be chartered? Will the Convention countenance the opinion that they have been beneficial to the community? Did they prove so in times gone by? The gentleman from Wayne says the community have suffered. Have they not always been a gangrene on the body politic, sending out their victims to beg their bread from door to door?

It appears to me (said Mr. VAN V.) that the experience of our State and of all the States should warn us against an improvident system, at least. I am with my colleague, [Mr. HANSCOM.] I would make war on banks. Since President Jackson strangled the monster, public sentiment has endorsed it. With the California gold and mint drops, we can get along very well without banks; but if we are to have banks, I would submit it to the people—banks or no banks—and then leave it to to the Legislature to establish banks, in case the people sanction it.

The gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. HASCALL] asks if my colleague [Mr. HANSCOM] is sincere? What reason has he to call him to account for his sincerity. I believe him to be sincere. I will not doubt it, because I do not know the reason of his hostility to banks. If banks are to be chartered, I am for submitting banks or no banks to the people.

Mr. GOODWIN—The vote on a single institution would not be considered with regard to the general law. I do not see the difficulties with regard to determining whether a bank should be established at a particular place. What are the particular circumstances in reference to which that proposition should be determined? It involves two propositions: the first is, whether there should be an increase to the banking capital? The people are the only tribunal to decide that. If that is decided, then it becomes a question as to the particular point at which it is about to be located. Can they not consider the wealth, business or prosperity of a place which shall have a charter, not for their particular benefit, but for the whole State?

The substitute offered by Mr. Goodwin was negatived.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to amend the substitute by adding thereto as follows:

"Until the same shall have been submitted to a vote of the electors of the State at some general election, and been approved by a majority of the votes cast on that subject at such election."

Mr. McCLELLAND—At the commencement of the session, I offered a resolution of inquiry, which contained the principle of the section stricken out, and about to be reinstated by the amendment of the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. WOODMAN.] Having great confidence in its application, it shall receive my cordial support.

I believe that if the bare, isolated proposition of "bank or no bank," be submitted to the people of this State, unless a most radical change has been effected recently, it would be decided in the negative. I only judge from the sentiment prevailing in the section in which I reside. There, and I think in most of the southern counties, the people in the country are opposed to the banking system, unless you can satisfy them that the system about to be adopted will perfectly secure the bill holder. In order to do this, the details must be exhibited, so that they can scan and scrutinize every line and feature, and decide for themselves. The absolute power of adopting a system without any reference to them they are unwilling to confide to any body of men; and is it to be wondered at? Never was a people so much imposed upon, and defrauded by bankers and those engaged in banking; and the Legislature was made the instrument by which these frauds were perpetrated. Gentlemen need not flatter themselves that the people are so forgetful of the past as to authorize, blindfold, the incorporation of another batch of banks. I would not myself vote for an unqualified power in the Legislature; and when the law is presented for ratification to the people, I must be convinced that all its provisions are safe and satisfactory before it receives my vote.

It is true our State is flooded with the issues of banks of other States, and generally the most worthless kind of currency. It may therefore be necessary, in order to avoid paying tribute to others, and to escape from the evils we cannot otherwise prevent, to adopt some system in our own State. The great difficulty is in so guarding it as to protect the bill holder, and prevent the frauds that seem to be incident to every system heretofore devised. If it is, on examination, found to be impossible to secure those who must from necessity receive the bills issued, then it is our duty to prohibit it entirely. The depositors and stockholders usually take care of themselves—at all events, their participation in the concerns of a bank is voluntary. Not so with the bill holder; the course of business may be such as to compel him to receive the notes of a bank in which he may have little confidence. The poorer classes of our citizens are the greatest sufferers on the failure of banks, and they must be protected.

Why object to submit the law, with all its provisions and details, to the people. They are intelligent, and many of them fully competent to judge correctly of the general character and effect of such law.

Mr. WHITE—Will the gentleman from Monroe permit me to ask him one question: that is, does he propose to submit the law proposed to be passed to the people, as he would to the gentlemen of the bar, for their opinion?

Mr. McCLELLAND—I believe the people would be as safe judges as gentlemen of the bar. I myself belong to the profession, and think it an intelligent and honorable one; but I would rather, on a subject of this kind, rely on the virtue and intelligence of the whole people, than any particular class of our citizens. If a law is thus submitted for the sanction of the people, it will of course give rise to discussions—elicit the opinions and views of those conversant with such institutions in all their bearings—its defects will be exposed—its provisions severely scrutinized—and every one that pays attention to it can vote understandingly. If they afterwards suffer, they have themselves alone to censure.

As I before remarked, this, in my judgment, is the only method you can adopt which will satisfy the people. Ask them to trust the Legislature, and until this generation is swept away, and the terrible effects of past years are entirely effaced from the memory, your application will and should be rejected. I was in the Legislature when some of these obnoxious acts complained of were done, and remember well the manner in which they were accomplished, and the sad results to our people and State. In 1840, those bills which ruined many of our citizens and embarrassed every body within our limits, and whose effects are still sensibly felt, could not, as I believe, at the commencement of the session, when the members were fresh from the people, have obtained ten votes in the House; and yet, by some unaccountable change, they were finally passed and became the law of the land. I do not ascribe this to party feeling—for I would not introduce it here—but all I mean to say is, that sometimes members of the Legislature forget they have a constituency, and are persuaded to do things which they sorely regret afterwards.

It is a well established fact that most of our bank charters are drafted by those to be interested in them, and that therefore the provisions are favorable to the bankers. The guards necessary to protect the public are either imperfect or not found in the bills. If the present proposition is adopted, I will venture the assertion that those who desire a general banking law will make it as perfect as they can before they submit it to the criticisms and scrutiny of the people. Their object will be to obtain their approval; and knowing the extreme sensitiveness that exists, and that the slightest defect exposed may defeat the project, they will act honestly and in good faith. This is right, and is not requiring too much. All in favor of a good banking system should willingly assent to it.

I am opposed to the latter clause of the original section, which prohibits the Legislature from passing another law for a given number of years, if the first be rejected. I would rather enable them to cure the defects pointed out, perfect the system, and again present it for the consideration of the people. If they reject every thing, then no banking system should be established. But, in my opinion, they are far more intelligent and reasonable than some here appear to suppose they are. If a good system is presented, it may be favorably received. I say to gentlemen, frankly, that I have no great attachment for such institutions; yet if they believe our citizens approve them, I am not disposed to prevent their testing their opinions; but I will not support any scheme that is not to be submitted to the decision of those who are most deeply interested in the question of its establishment. Let them judge for themselves, and I shall be satisfied.

Mr. BACKUS would enquire whether the terms would not indicate that the Legislature might pass a general or special law? He supposed the practical result would be to leave it in the hands of the Legislature to make either a general or special law. The sole proposition presented to this Convention is "bank or no bank." For one—from the disastrous and fatal results of the system in the State—I am prepared to go with my friend from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] and say "no bank;" and exclude all the evils which have followed us with those institutions based on broken glass, broken nails, and swamps.

The State has been dotted over with these institutions. The process was begun again last winter. I am prepared to stop it. I will go with my friend to stop it. I believe with public opinion that the community are better able to carry on their mercantile affairs without them.

Mr. BRITAIN—Will the gentleman go to put down the present banks?

Mr. BACKUS—I will go as far as the law allows, and would submit the bank charters to the people. Individual bank charters I should be opposed to under a general law. I think the people have sent us here to impress in the constitution, bank or no bank, and I am prepared to go it.

Mr. MOORE moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again; but the committee refused to rise.

Mr. WOODMAN's amendment was then disagreed to.

On motion of Mr. CHAPEL, the following was substituted for Mr. HANSCOM's substitute:

"No banking law or law for banking purposes shall have any force or effect until the same shall, after its passage, have been submitted to a vote of the electors of the State, at some general election, and been approved by a majority of the votes cast on that subject at such election."

The substitute was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, the committee rose, and through their chairman reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention resolved into committee of the whole and resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Corporations," Mr. CHURCH in the chair.

Section 3 was read:

"The officers and stockholders of every corporation or association for banking purposes, issuing bank notes, or any kind of paper credits to circulate as money, shall be individually liable, as co-partners, for all its debts of every kind."

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to amend by striking out the words "as co-partners," and "of every kind." The motion prevailed.

Mr. GOODWIN moved to amend sec. 3 by inserting after the word "association," the words "established under such laws."

Mr. G. said his object in the proposed amendment was to prevent a misconstruction, which would make it conflict with the constitution of the United States.

Mr. COOK did not understand the object of the amendment; he supposed it was to exempt corporations at present existing. If it did include them, it would be a salutary provision and beneficial in its results. Under the system proposed, better securities will be required of banks than are required of those now in existence. Therefore there would be much propriety in bringing them under the operation, if it were possible.

Mr. GOODWIN would enquire if it was the intention to bring under this provision the institutions now existing, which have no such provision in their charters? If so, it would bring them in conflict with the constitution of the United States and of this State.

Mr. FRALICK said he had attempted to get in something to protect the people. It says, "issuing;" which will apply to those notes that may be hereafter issued. If the Legislature has power to take away liabilities of contracts, what harm can arise from this? We have no security from them by deposits of stocks or otherwise.

Mr. COOK said it was supposed that this clause would affect those corporations in existence; what its effect would be, he could not tell. He had found this singular provision in the constitution of the State of New York: "Every corporation, after the first day of January, 1850, shall be liable," &c. He had understood it to apply to corporations then in existence as well as to those afterwards created.

Mr. GOODWIN—The gentleman has not answered the question, whether it was the intention to alter the provisions of the charters of corporations now in existence.

If so, it must be in conflict with the constitution of the United States. If not, it is useless. He presumed it was the intention to place in the article only such provisions as would be operative, and not such as would lead to doubt and litigation. As to the remark of his friend, [Mr. FRALICK,] he did not know how his argument could apply; because the Legislature had done wrong, he would do wrong in this case. If the ground he assumes is correct, it is no reason the Convention should do this. The Legislature have attempted to repeal the charter of the Bank of Michigan, and the State Bank, but the United States court has decided such acts a nullity.

Mr. FRALICK—I only said if that were a good principle, it would be well to carry it out. With all due deference to the legal knowledge of the gentleman, [Mr. GOODWIN,] I believe it is brought into operation on the banks of New York. Several of the banks which were in existence have given up their circulation.

Mr. GOODWIN—Most of the old banks have organized under the general law, and it was to meet them that it was introduced in the constitution. No man of any legal information can for a moment suppose that this clause can reach those charters now in existence.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. FRALICK moved to amend by inserting after the word "liable," the words "to the amount of their respective share or shares of stock in any such corporation or association."

Mr. WITHERELL wished to know what would be the effect of the amendment, if adopted. Whether it would apply to the amount of stock held at the time the suit was brought, or stock they might have held at the time of the failure?

Mr. FRALICK supposed it would apply to stock held at the time of the failure; that was the case in New York. He believed if it were made more stringent than that, you would not get the best class of men to engage in the banking business. It would be enough to make them liable to the amount of their investment, and as much more in addition.

Mr. J. BARTOW would inquire when a man's individual liability would come into effect?—when would he become liable? If you introduce a clause of this kind, you may as well strike out the individual liability clause. The public would receive no benefit from it. There is but one rule. Let the public know, and let the individual know, that all they have, and all they ever will have, is liable for the faithful performance of their duty. This is the true ground. If you do not do that, you may as well sweep away every incumbency. Do not keep the promise to the ear and break it to the heart.

Mr. CORNELL would wish it limited to the time when the debt was contracted. If not, the person would sell out to avoid his liabilities, and the clause would be worse than useless.

Mr. FRALICK withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SULLIVAN moved to amend section 3, by adding thereto, "which were contracted during the time of their being officers and stockholders of such corporation or association, and for one year thereafter."

Mr. S. said it was evident that the stockholders, under difficulties, would remove their responsibilities to persons not responsible. To meet that case he offered the proposition.

Mr. WHITEMORE inquired if it was the intention of the gentleman to make the officers only liable? It appeared to him that it would make the officers only who were stockholders liable.

Mr. SULLIVAN—It perhaps does not go far enough; but it goes farther than the original section.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out "and for one year thereafter."

Mr. WITHERELL—Suppose a debt is contracted, the officers are liable; the debt may remain three years, fresh officers in the mean time having been appointed. Are they to be made liable for the debt?

Mr. COOK—I can explain. It was the intention of the committee to make every person liable that had anything to do with banks. But here are so many judges, that it may be difficult to harmonize opinions. It was intended to make them liable when the debt was contracted.

Mr. WITHERELL—A suit may be commenced against a corporation on a debt contracted a year before. You will have to get at the officers of that time, which is a secret in the hands of the bank.

Mr. HANSCOM said, the true construction would be to hold the parties liable at the time the suit was commenced. By adding the amendment of the gentleman from Cass, before adopted, it will be plain enough.

Mr. CRARY's amendment was lost.

Mr. SULLIVAN's amendment was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. COOK, section 4 was amended by striking out "ample," in the second line, and inserting after "security" the following: "to the full amount of notes or paper credits so registered."

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL, "on" was stricken out, and "bearing" inserted in the second line.

Mr. TIFFANY moved to amend section 4 by striking out all after "security," in the second line, and inserting the following:

"For the redemption of the same in specie; such security to be in stocks, bonds or evidences of debt issued by the United States, or of individual States, or both, bearing interest, which shall be deposited with the State Treasurer, and be at least when offered, equal in value to the amount of bills or notes registered and issued for circulation." Which was withdrawn.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend by inserting after "stocks," in second line, the words "of this State or of some other State, or of the United States." Which was also withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL, the words "which shall be deposited with the State Treasurer," were inserted after "stocks," in the second line.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH offered the following as a substitute for section 4:

"The Legislature shall provide by law for the registry of all bills or notes issued or put in circulation as money, and shall require security in the stocks of this State or of some other State of this Union, or stocks of the United States, bearing interest, for the redemption of such bills or notes in specie, to be deposited with the State Treasurer."

Which was not adopted.

On motion of Mr. COOK, "bill" was stricken out of the first line of section 5, and "of the notes or bills" inserted after "holders."

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL, the words "issuing bank notes of any description," were stricken out of section 6.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL, "unless with," were stricken out of the third line of section 8, and "without" inserted.

Mr. EDMUNDS moved to strike out of section 10, line 2, "or secured."

Mr. WHITE said it was provided in the Bill of Rights that no property of an individual shall be taken for public use without compensation being made therefor. As this section now stands, it reads: "The property of no individual shall be taken by any corporation other than municipal, for its own use, without compensation being made or secured, as provided by law." A State may take private property for public use, and may allow a corporation to take it, if its use be for the public; but it was never contemplated that a bank should be allowed to take property for their own use. That the Legislature can allow a corporation to take property, depends upon whether it is a public corporation. It can never be supposed that private corporations would be allowed to take property under any such provision as the Legislature might present.

Mr. TIFFANY said, under the provision in the old constitution, the courts had decided that they might take property without first making compensation. He hoped the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. WHIPPLE—No court in America has made such a decision, or ever could under such a constitutional provision. The courts have decided that it is competent for the Legislature to give them power to take property for their use, provided the use is public. Suppose the Legislature should grant a charter to a plank road company; that is for public use, because all have a right to travel on it; but would they allow a gentleman to build a plank road for his own convenience, and take, in doing so, a corner of his neighbor's lot? Clearly the Legislature could give no such power. If the public have the right to use the road, they may give the power.

The amendment was withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL, "other than municipal" was stricken out of the first line of section 10.

Mr. WHIPPLE moved to strike out section 10.

Mr. CRARY moved to amend section 10 by striking out "its own," and inserting "public;" which motion prevailed.

Mr. WHIPPLE then withdrew the motion to strike out.

Mr. McLEOD moved to strike out the first line of section 11, and also the second line to the word "no."

Mr. McL. said the first part of this section contemplates that, after thirty years, the Legislature may step in and repeal the charters of those corporations that may have an existence at that time. Now, sir, if, at the end of thirty years, there should be in existence any corporate powers, and there is no violation of their charters, I would ask if there is any reason why they should be deprived of their corporate powers? Is there any particular charm in the words "thirty years?"

Mr. COOK hoped the amendment would not be adopted. The section provides that thirty years hence all corporations in the State shall be placed on the same footing. If we have passed acts of incorporation heretofore which may be supposed by some to be irrepealable and perpetual, we wish to say that we shall have the right at the expiration of that time to control them. It does not provide that the Legislature of 1880 shall repeal them; but simply a declaration that we claim the right to amend or repeal those acts, as we do under the article on corporations.

Mr. DANFORTH—Such a provision would extend over the charters of our plank roads. Those charters have been given for sixty years. Some of them may build a plank road for one hundred miles under their charters. Would it be proper to cut off their corporate rights at the expiration of thirty years?

Mr. McLEOD—It does not say that they shall, but it gives them a power to do injustice. We say, in our acts of incorporation, if you will do such work you shall have such privileges for sixty years. Then if we allow the Legislature to cut off those charters at the end of thirty years, they may do great injustice.

Mr. WITHERELL was in favor of the motion to strike out for the reasons assigned, and for another reason. The charter of the Central rail road has a longer time to run—a corporation with a capital of six millions of dollars. Most of the plank road charters run longer than the time mentioned here. He (Mr. W.) would be in favor of it if it applied only to the expediency of the matter. It has been decided in the United States courts that we cannot do it. It will effect nothing except assuming that the Legislature may grant charters and allow investments to be made, and then say a Convention may come in and cut away their rights.

Mr. WHIPPLE—The State courts and the United States courts have decided that it is not a constitutional power to repeal a charter, because it is in the nature of a contract. The decision of the courts are uniform on the subject, and such a provision would be of no use. We have the Central and Southern rail roads. It would be improper to put a clause in the constitution empowering the Legislature to repeal those charters. It would evidently be unjust, because it is a contract made constitutionally.

Mr. GOODWIN said he had offered an amendment which had not been adopted. He had done so with the same view and on the same principle. It struck him that this clause would be inoperative, because if retained it would place the constitution in opposition to the constitution of the United States. He entertained precisely the same views—that as these charters have been recognized as contracts, it would be at variance with the statute books of the United States. Though his proposition did not carry, he should not vote against this.

Mr. COOK said a similar clause existed in the constitution of the State of Louisiana. It is said that the courts always decide against it; but, sir, I am one of those who believe that those decisions are not in accordance with the institutions of the country. The people have not granted to Legislatures a power to grant irrevocable acts of incorporation. The proposition looks preposterous on its face—to give a right for a company to construct a road fifty feet wide across the State. Gentlemen get up here and say we cannot touch that corporation; that we can never touch the rights granted in any manner. Sir, I do not believe in any such doctrine. I believe the right is with the people. They cannot confine themselves in perpetuity and prospectively. I propose that the people of the State shall say, that in 1880 the people of that time shall take the power into their own hands. I believe the courts will decide in favor of the constitutional provision. They will carry it out, although in foreign countries the charters are eternal.

Mr. WITHERELL—Does the gentleman from Hillsdale [Mr. Cook] mean to say that a power could be given to the Legislature of 1851 to repeal all the charters of all the different corporations in the State? We may get so far from the people that they may not be impressed with the feelings and opinions of individuals.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I fully accord with the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Hillsdale, [Mr. Cook.] I concur with him that the State has a right to provide for the repeal of charters; and I am hence opposed to the motion to strike out the section which provides for it.

I do most cordially abhor the doctrine of vested rights, as held by some of our courts. It strikes at the foundation of State rights and State sovereignty. A multitude of corporations, and the State no control over them! However detrimental to the public interests, they must not be touched—their rights are sacred, vested rights. No matter how much evil they may induce—no matter how much mischief may follow in their train, they must continue to all time; their rights are permanent—they are vested rights.

Mr. GOODWIN and Mr. WHIPPLE (at the same time) asked the gentleman from Calhoun what he meant by "vested rights."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I will answer the gentlemen. I will give them two examples, which will sufficiently illustrate my meaning. The Dartmouth College case is one. The court held that the royal charter granting certain privileges was of the nature of a contract; and hence, that no legislation could reach it. The other case to which I refer is to be found in the history of Canada. In 1763 France ceded her North American provinces to Great Britain. In the treaty it was stipulated that the existing tenure of land should remain inviolate; this tenure was the feudal system. By this means the old feudal system has been perpetuated in Lower Canada to this time. According to the doctrine of vested rights, this system of unmitigated evil can never be reached. No legislation can ever remove it. The system must remain and go down to all time. How absurd the doctrine! A system of unmitigated evils must forever remain, because of some old charter or treaty—some act of some tyrant of bygone time. No relief can be had—all must forever remain as the valley of death. As I said in the beginning, so say I now, that such a doctrine is utterly abhorrent to all my views of right.

Whether the Legislature, as suggested by the gentleman from Hillsdale, has the power and the right to repeal a charter, I shall not now stop to discuss. But of one thing I am certain, this Convention has a perfect right to do it. If so, it has a right to provide for its being done. Deny this right, and the people have no remedy; however inconsistent with the public good; however burdensome and oppressive, and productive of evil corporations may become, they are sacred, they are not to be touched; no remedy is left but the last resort of oppressed people—revolution by physical force.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I am in favor, sir, of striking out the section under consideration. I admit that it is, and will continue to be, a harmless provision, as any attempt to give effect to it by the Legislature would be successfully resisted in the judicial tribunals of the country. They would pronounce a law passed in pursuance of the section before us, a palpable violation of that provision of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the States from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. But, while I admit that the section will be a dead letter in your Constitution, I am not the less opposed to its retention. A vote of this Convention affirming its validity would, in my opinion, reflect dishonor on the State, and argue insensibility to those great principles of right and justice which should be observed with scrupulous fidelity by every free government in its dealings with its citizens. What power does the provision confer upon the Legislature? Why, sir, it proposes to authorize the Legislature to repeal every act of incorporation heretofore passed; to divest rights secured by compact the most solemn; to trample under foot obligations assumed by the State, and to the faithful observance of which the faith of the people has been pledged through its constitutional representatives. If the Legislature may repeal those acts in 1880, they may be repealed at its next session; and I appeal with confidence to the sense of justice of the members of this body to say whether such an act would not be denounced as flagrantly unjust and oppressive.

But, it is said by the delegate from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] that one Legislature has no right to bind future Legislatures for a longer period than one generation. I did not rise, sir, to discuss theoretical opinions, although the great name of Thomas Jefferson may be invoked in their support, but to speak to a question of great practical importance, vitally affecting the honor of the State and the rights of individuals. I will say, however, to the gentleman from Calhoun, that he will find it a difficult task to vindicate the vote he is about to give, in any opinion ever expressed by Mr. Jefferson. If the public life of that eminent man proves anything, it proves his devotion to the Constitution of his country, and that our safety depends upon a strict adherence to its letter and spirit, and in the faithful observance of the obligations we may have assumed. The honorable delegate has re-produced on this occasion an argument offered some days since, when I proposed to guard by constitutional restriction the vested rights of individuals. I shall not again travel over the ground I then occupied. The question then discussed has no connection with the proposition embodied in the section we are considering. The Convention have decided that such rights may be made the sport of legislative action; to that decision I must submit; but, sir, the question now presented is, whether we shall maintain in all its vigor and purity the Constitution of the United States. To that question I trust gentlemen will address themselves, and not seek to conceal it under the rubbish of other questions which have received the final action of this body.

I am utterly incapable of comprehending the force of the argument, founded on the idea that we are dealing with corporations. This fact cannot influence the judgment of the Convention, unless, indeed, it be contended that rights secured to our citizens by the Constitution, in their natural capacities, are lost, when the same rights are secured to them by a corporate name. The Constitution, sir, recognizes no such distinction; it is not obnoxious to the criticism which might be justly cast upon it, did it thus discriminate between those who contract with the State in their private capacities, and those who contract in their corporate capacities. Over all lawful contracts the Constitution extends its protection; it interposes a barrier against State aggression, securing to the humblest citizen an easy victory, though engaged in a struggle with a sovereign power.

But, it is suggested by the gentleman from Hillsdale, [Mr. Cook,] that the Supreme Court of the United States will, before the expiration of thirty years, reconsider some of their opinions in respect to corporations; that many of those opinions are erroneous and not justified by a sound exposition of the Constitution. I will not stop, sir, to consider whether the criticism of the delegate from Hillsdale is just or unjust—right or wrong. It is sufficient to say, that any action of this Convention, founded on the supposition that the highest judicial tribunal of this country will modify opinions which have been maintained for a period of forty years, is unwise. Sir, the decisions of that tribunal upon all questions arising under the Constitution, are authoritative and binding, as well upon individuals as States; they constitute a rule of action, and are as conclusive as though they were incorporated in the Constitution itself. But it is said by the delegate from Hillsdale, that he is a republican, and thinks it is anti-republican to withhold from the Legislature the power to repeal acts of incorporation. I, too, profess to be a republican, but I have yet to learn that a republican government has a moral right to violate the Constitution, or perpetrate an act of injustice. Why, sir, if any government on earth is bound to observe the most perfect good faith towards its citizens, and to fulfill with scrupulous fidelity all its engagements, it is a republican government.

Now, sir, permit me, for a moment, to glance at the practical operation of the section proposed to be engrafted in our constitution. It is well known that the State incorporated two companies, and sold to one of them the Central rail road, and to the other the Southern, upon the terms and conditions in the acts of incorporation expressed. The first named company have paid into your treasury the large sum of two millions of dollars, and have in all other respects, I believe, performed each and all of the provisions of the contract entered into with this State. They have incurred the enormous expenditure of the further sum of four millions of dollars in completing and putting into successful operation this great thoroughfare across the State. In consideration of the sum thus paid and expended, the State, on its part, granted to the company certain rights and privileges. There was, then, as between the State and corporators, a solemn agreement entered into, which each of the parties is bound in good faith to fulfill. Will it, Mr. Chairman, be for one moment contended that, in the absence of any breach of the agreement by the corporation, the State may impair rights secured to it by the act through which it claims title to the immense property it acquired and now holds? It cannot be so contended, unless the State is freed from all obligations to respect those obvious and universally acknowledged principles which should regulate the conduct of governments as well as individuals. As well might the State declare the title under which you hold your farm void, or seize and appropriate it to the use of the State without compensation, as to dissolve the corporation, unless authorized to do so in consequence of some act done or omitted, involving a breach of the law which defines its duties, or of the contract under which they claim to hold the property acquired by its terms. Such an act on the part of the State might find its justification under a government whose sway is despotic, but cannot be sustained under a system which promises security to the property of the citizen, and professes to be guided by an enlightened morality.

Again: The section in question is unnecessary. If the Convention have the constitutional power to authorize the repeal of the charter, then do the Legislature possess the power, independent of the provision proposed to be engrafted in the article now under consideration. I know of no restrictions upon the law making power, except such as are to be found in the Constitution of the United States or of this State. If, therefore, an act of the Legislature repealing the charter, would not be repugnant to the constitution of the United States or of this State, it would seem to follow that such an act would derive no additional force in consequence of the authority proposed to be conferred upon the Legislature by the Convention. On the contrary, if it be repugnant to the constitution of the United States, then the act of the Legislature would be nugatory and void, notwithstanding it might be founded on an express grant of power found in the constitution of this State. It is said, sir, that the provision can do no harm. This proposition I deny. Its effect will be to impair confidence in the honor of the State, and will drive away from us capital seeking investment in our plank roads and other works of internal improvement. The charters on your statute book calculated to develop the resources of your State, will remain a dead letter; the rights they purport to confer are rendered insecure by constitutional enactments, or are to be left to the tender mercies of State Legislatures.

The people of the State have abundant security for the protection of their rights in that provision of the charter of the Central Rail road, which authorizes its repurchase by the State upon the terms therein prescribed.

In conclusion, sir, I trust that the plighted faith of the State will be preserved inviolate, and that a section will not be incorporated in our constitution, which is in direct conflict with the constitution of the United States, and of a provision in our own constitution which received the united vote of the Convention.

Mr. HANSCOM was desirous of retaining the section as put in by the committee. The gentlemen have assumed that the Legislature of 1880 will go blindfold and tear down and destroy every institution; they would find that both in Europe and in this country changes are going on. They begin to adopt more liberal rules. I predict (said Mr. H.) that in thirty years the decisions of former courts will be overruled in this State and every other. No State will have its sovereignty forever bound to the Legislature.

Mr. BRITAIN spoke at length in opposition to the motion to strike out.

The committee refused to strike out.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE offered the following to stand as section 11, which was not adopted:

"Whenever damage shall be done by any corporation to private property, such corporation shall be liable to the full amount of such damage."

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the following was inserted after "thereof," in 1st line of section 5: "issued or put in circulation as money."

On motion of Mr. BUSH, the committee rose, and through their chairman reported the article back with sundry amendments, in which they asked the concurrence of the Convention.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the article was laid upon the table and ordered printed.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the Convention then adjourned.

FRIDAY, (40th day,) July 26.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. STOREY: of Mrs. Electa M. Sheldon and 157 others, ladies of the village of Jackson, praying for the insertion of a provision in the constitution prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage.

Referred to the select committee upon that subject.

By Mr. HASCALL: of Martin Wilson and 32 others, citizens of Kalamazoo Co., for a like prohibition as the foregoing.

Referred to same committee.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. ROBERTS in the chair.

The committee took up for consideration Articles —, "Exemptions and the Rights of Married Women," which were read and passed over, and Article —, "Of Cities and Villages," considered.

Sec. 1. It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages, and to restrict their powers of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts, and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments and contracting debts by such corporations.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend section 1 by adding the following: "And when the boundaries of any city or village shall be enlarged, the territory annexed shall not be taxed for the payment of pre-existing debts of said city."

Mr. W. proposed the amendment because he considered it just, equitable and right. A city or village should not be permitted to extend its boundaries for the purpose of compelling those living beyond the limits to pay its expenses previously incurred. If they wished to extend their boundaries, it should not be for the purpose of getting money.

Mr. J. BARTOW—The proposition embraced in the amendment of the gentleman [Mr. WITHERELL] was duly considered by the committee reporting this article, and it was thought best not to embody it in the constitution. It may be a proper subject for legislative action; but if placed in the constitution it is fixed and unalterable, and it may not be correct as a general rule. I am, therefore, opposed to the proposition here, as I was before the committee.

Mr. N. PIERCE desired that the gentleman offering the amendment would inform the Convention whether it was not right that a territory enjoying all the benefits and privileges of a city or village, should not be made to bear a portion of the expenses—why not?

Mr. WITHERELL had intended offering another section, so that the inhabitants of the territory proposed to be annexed could not be taxed without their consent. As to the question propounded by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. N. PIERCE,] he would remark that it operated unequally and unjustly. It was often the case that a heavy debt had been incurred, and the only object of the corporation in extending its limits was to raise money.

He admitted that where the inhabitants of the territory were taken within the boundaries with their own assent, it was proper they should bear a due proportion of the expenses; but otherwise, they should not. He knew of one instance where there was a large territory, with only four or five inhabitants, which a corporation desired to bring within its boundaries, and the only object was to annex territory for the purpose of taxation. He repeated that, without their assent, the inhabitants should not be taxed.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. WITHERELL.] I consider it just as the territory proposed to be annexed may have no benefits from the Fire Department, or any other village or city organization; and the territory is only sought to be annexed for the purpose of liquidating debts already contracted, and of which the property has had no benefits. I therefore hope that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the amendment would not prevail; it was fraught with mischief. Take for instance any city; persons living just over the limits reaped all the advantages, enjoyed all the benefits of those living within the corporation, yet they did not share in any of the city expenses or debts. Now, would it not be unjust to exempt these persons from taxation, if it were proper that the corporate limits should include them? He knew of instances at his village, of persons residing just beyond the village boundaries who enjoyed every advantage of the market, and all other benefits, and yet they bore no portion of the village expenses, when if justice were done, they would bear their proportion. Should the limits of the village be extended so as to include them, the proposition of the gentleman would exempt them from tax, when they had enjoyed the same benefits and privileges of those living in the village. All must see the injustice of it.

Mr. GOODWIN was opposed to the amendment. In cases where improvements in a city or village were rapid, the very debt incurred might have increased the value of the property proposed to be taken in. Suppose a case: A city debt might have been contracted and the money expended in water works, building school houses, and rendering the fire department more efficient; and by this very expenditure the property laid out in lots be increased ten fold in value. He would ask if it were right or just that this property should be exempt from taxation if it should be taken in the corporate bounds?

Mr. WITHERELL said, even admitting all that the gentleman [Mr. GOODWIN] had based on a supposition, yet he would ask if it were right that the boundaries of a city should be extended to embrace individuals without their consent? Had any one the right to compel them to come in? For instance: Gov. Woodbridge resided near the city of Detroit. He did not ask that the limits of the city should be extended so as to include his property, yet petitions were got up and signed, and sent to the Legislature for the purpose of enlarging the city bounds, so as to include his [Gov. W's] property. He had a farm, and none of the advantages of the city, and asked for none; yet they wanted to make him pay a portion of the city expenses. This was one case only. There was no reason or justice in it.

Mr. COMSTOCK desired to say a word more. He owned a lot of land about half a mile from the village of Adrian, say planted with corn. Now, what advantage would the fire department be to this corn? The fact was, property near the corporation decreased in value instead of increasing. There were two sides to this question.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend the same by adding thereto as follows:

"And the boundaries of cities and villages shall not be extended over adjacent territory without the consent of a majority of the owners or occupants of such territory."

Mr. J. BARTOW thought that pertinacity in this project ought not to be insisted in. He was not the gentleman's keeper; but the gentleman should refrain from urging a proposition after it had once been decisively voted down. The principle embraced in the amendment was clearly wrong. Because it met a particular case, that was no reason why it should be adopted in the Constitution as a general rule.

Mr. WITHERELL had always supposed that courtesy, at least, gave to the affirmative of a proposition the right of being heard first; but in this instance it seemed otherwise. The shaft of fate had been launched, and it was doomed—all argument foreclosed by the chairman of the committee reporting the article. He believed that he [Mr. W.] was also a member of that committee. The proposition was not his own; it was the suggestion of his constituents, and he would go for it if every other man in the Convention went against it. He had no interest in the matter, other than to reflect the wishes of those sending him here. Personally, his interests were balanced, and he cared not much about it; but as a matter of principle, founded on right, reason and justice, he would go for it. It was a principle held good as applied to large matters, and why should it not be to small. If farms were brought within city limits, they would be subject to all the police regulations. This, of itself, constituted a strong position in favor of this amendment.

Mr. BACKUS said he could not suppose that the committee would consciously do anything but what was right. It was an established principle that neither counties nor towns could be organized without the consent of the inhabitants living therein. This fixed principle was founded in justice—admitted by all to be so. Now, what were the provisions of this amendment? precisely similar to the principle mentioned. He considered this amendment proper, although the first was, in his opinion, incorrect. The proposition was simply this: persons living just beyond the limits should not be added to the corporation at the mere beck of a city. Such a thing had been done in this State, when the petitioners consisted promiscuously of persons living every where, and the proposition merely guarded against it in future. There had been an application to extend the limits of the city of Detroit, and it was signed entirely by non-residents. Now, he would ask, if it were right, under the circumstances, for the Legislature to grant the extension sought? The truth was, the Legislature was frequently imposed on, and sometimes did injustice from a want of a proper knowledge of the facts.

this: that when the limits of a city or village were proposed to be extended, it should not be done without the knowledge, assent and consent of those owning or occupying the territory to be embraced in said limits. He considered it clear and correct. The moment those residing near a city or village found it to be to their interest to become united with a municipality, they would ask it themselves; and until then they should not. They should not be coerced or compelled to do that which was an injury to them. How was it with new counties in their organization? It could not be done unless those interested, living within the county, asked it. How was it with regard to the organization of townships? The same; and on the same principle the proposition was just. It was wrong to force persons within the limits of a corporate city or village on the application of those whose motives were, to say the least, suspicious.

Mr. HANSCOM considered this proposition more objectionable than the first. For the purpose of exemplifying the proposition in its bearings, he would suppose an individual owning land adjoining a city or village. In the course of time it might be necessary to have a portion of this land within the limits; yet the amendment puts in the power of the owner or occupant to dictate and lay down his own terms. Exigencies might arise where the interest of the corporation made it necessary to have some portion of the adjacent territory within its boundaries—absolutely indispensable—yet, by the proposition, the corporation would be at the mercy of the owner or occupier, completely subject to his caprices or obstinacy.

Mr. DESNOYERS moved to add to the amendment as follows: "unless such adjoining territory is laid out in city or village lots."

Mr. D. said there was a great difference in the matter with regard to the condition of the property. If the land were laid out in city or village lots, the amendment was proper.

Mr. CRARY said he hoped that neither the amendment nor the amendment to the amendment would prevail. The amendment to the amendment would not meet the difficulties which surrounded many of our villages where individuals had sold lots not included in any recorded town plat, and not, in fact, laid out into village lots. Our cities and villages had no analogy to our general municipal organizations. We divided the State into counties and townships for the general purposes of government. Cities and villages constituted an exception to this general division. We did not incorporate a village or a city until the number of inhabitants in any locality became so numerous as to make it necessary to infringe upon personal rights more than was required by the law in township and county organizations. We granted these incorporations to give greater facilities in improving streets, making sidewalks, removing nuisances, and enforcing a more rigid police system. It was oftentimes necessary that the land around cities and villages should be brought within the limits of the corporation without the assent of the people living on it. It was often necessary to do so for the purpose of removing the nuisances that might be created on such lands. Take for example the city of Detroit. Persons living on the line of, but beyond the limits of the city, could establish a market and enjoy all the advantages conferred by such an aggregation of population, without being subject to any of the burthens of a city government. They could create nuisances which might infect the whole city, and their removal would have to be subjected to the slow process of the proceedings in our courts. Such places might never consent to come within the limits of the city, and yet the public good might require their inclusion within the limits of the corporation.

Mr. WITHERELL accepted the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. DESNOYERS.] With regard to the argument of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] it was all wrong—the baseless fabric of a vision. By such reasoning there would be no limit to the boundary of a corporation, except the habitable globe. The gentleman's own village (Marshall) might extend its boundaries to Battle Creek, to Albion, or even to Lake Erie, on the pretence of removing or getting rid of nuisances. A city or village had the power to remove any nuisance; so the argument of the gentleman amounted to nothing.

Mr. BACKUS said the gentleman from Calhoun had based his remarks on the as-assumption that nuisances might be made near the borders of a corporation; and to get rid of them, it might be necessary to extend the limits. Now, it would readily be seen that if the limits were extended, the same inconveniences might occur on its borders; hence, unless the boundaries were extended so far that the corporation would have control for miles over contiguous territory, nothing could be effected.

In providing for cities and villages, they should be guided by special rules. Take for instance the case alluded to by his friend from Lenawee, [Mr. COMSTOCK.] A man adds to his farm, improves it, and wishes to use it entirely for agricultural purposes. It happens to be situated near a city or village. Now, if he wishes to remain on it, ought he to be compelled to go within the corporate limits or leave, when his farm is actually injured? If property were worth anything, its value consisted in the right of individuals to appropriate it to any use they might wish; unless by so doing they injured a large number of their fellow men. Applications were easily obtained for anything, however monstrous; and he trusted the Convention would act with due caution and deliberation.

Mr. J. BARTOW had only one word to say to all the arguments of the gentlemen. If their arguments showed anything, they showed the necessity of rejecting any principle or proposition based on a particular state of facts. We must deal only in general principles. If we attempted to make provisions applicable to particular localities—to Detroit, Adrian, Coldwater, Marshall, &c., &c., it would lead to insurmountable difficulties.

The question was taken on the amendment as modified, and lost.

Mr. SKINNER moved to insert after "villages," in 2d line, as follows: "extending or diminishing their boundaries, laying out or discontinuing streets and alleys."

Mr. S. said he did not know that the amendment was of any consequence, but it seemed to him necessary. It had been suggested to him that the word "organization" included everything—all that was necessary—but he thought not.

Mr. J. BARTOW was of opinion that the word "organization" comprehended all that was necessary—carried with it all the adjuncts. If he were right in this opinion, then the additional words were surplusage; if wrong, he was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. CHURCH desired to remark, in reference to this matter, that in the 26th section of the legislative article, after providing that the Legislature should have no power to authorize, by private or special law, the sale or conveyance of any lands or other real estate, &c., there was also this provision: "nor to vacate or alter any road laid out by commissioners of highways, or any street in any incorporated city or village, or in any township plat." This clause was inserted on the motion of the member from Lenawee, [Mr. TIFFANY;] and he regretted that it did not cover more ground. He was opposed to the power being possessed by any other than a judicial tribunal. The rights of parties interested should only be determined by a court in which the parties could appear. The acts of the Legislature had opened the way to much litigation in his village, and he was opposed to granting any such power as the amendment of the member from Washtenaw [Mr. SKINNER] proposed.

The amendment was lost.

Sec. 2. All judicial officers of cities and villages shall be elected at such time and in such manner as the Legislature may direct—all other officers of such cities and villages shall be elected by the electors thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose.

Mr. DANFORTH moved to strike out section 2; but the committee refused to strike out.

Sec. 3. Private property shall not be taken for improvements in cities and villages without the consent of the owner, unless the compensation therefor shall first be determined by a jury of freeholders of such city or village, and actually paid or tendered in the manner to be provided by law.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out section 3. By the action of the Convention the day before, it was rendered unnecessary. The 13th section of the article "Corporations" covered the ground, and if the Convention concurred in the amendment made yesterday to that section, this was useless.

Mr. J. BARTOW hoped that a healthy provision would not be stricken out on account of the action of the Convention on some other article. If this section were in its proper place, it certainly should be retained.

The motion to strike out was withdrawn.

Mr. SULLIVAN moved to strike out "of such city or village," from line three of section three.

It appeared to him wrong to confine the jury to the freeholders of the city or village.

Mr. HANSCOM thought the motion correct. The objection was founded in reason.

Mr. J. BARTOW thought the freeholders of the city or village decidedly the most proper men to compose the jury. If the amendment prevailed, you brought in A. B. and C. entirely disinterested; men who had nothing at stake, and they might not do justice. On the other hand, if those interested were made the judges of the matter, they would be much more likely to do what was right.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, if he understood the matter at all, all the jury had to do was to fix the compensation. He certainly thought this should be done by disinterested persons.

Mr. COMSTOCK thought the amendment proper, and hoped it would prevail.

The question was put and the motion lost.

Mr. WITHERELL offered the following to stand as section 4:

"Previous notice of any application for an alteration of the charter of any corporation shall be given in such manner as the Legislature shall by law direct."

Mr. W. proposed to make the provision applicable to all corporations. The Legislature were frequently applied to, to change the charters of corporations, when little or nothing was known of such application or intention, by the people, until after it was done, and the change made; and this was frequently done by being tacked on to bills with different titles. His amendment required that public notice should be given in all cases where a corporation desired an alteration of its charter. He hoped there would be no objection to it.

The amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the committee rose, reported the article back and asked the concurrence of the Convention to the amendment made thereto, and to be discharged from the further consideration of the article.

The question before the Convention being on concurring in the additional section made in committee of the whole, (offered by Mr. WITHERELL,)

Mr. J. BARTOW said, the proposition was so clearly a legislative provision, that it seemed entirely out of place. He thought, therefore, the Convention ought not to concur.

Mr. WITHERELL said he could not agree with the gentleman, notwithstanding he [Mr. J. BARTOW] was chairman of the committee reporting the article. The gentleman wished to keep his three children entirely aloof from any other company, and not to have a fourth, the offspring of the committee, although it was a comely personage, associated with them.

Now, what had the Legislature ever done in reference to carrying out the provision of this amendment? There was a provision of a somewhat similar nature, but all who had been in the Legislature knew that it was seldom carried out. He had not heard any good reason why the section was not proper. It struck him as being an excellent provision, as no change could be made in any corporation unless all knew it in time. He was surprised at the course of the gentleman, [Mr. BARTOW,] endowed, as he was, with so much good sense.

The amendment was concurred in, and the article being before the Convention,

Mr. SKINNER proposed the following substitute for section 1:

"It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide by general laws for the organization and regulation of cities and villages."

Mr. CRARY said, if the proposition were practicable—if it could be carried out—he would willingly favor its adoption; but he thought it would not answer the purpose intended.

Mr. SKINNER said, a great deal of the time of the Legislature would be taken up in legislating on these matters, if each particular case had to be acted upon; and it had been suggested, he believed, by the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] that courts were the proper tribunals in which the most important points relative to the organization and regulation of corporations should be decided. Under this system much time would be saved.

Mr. J. BARTOW asked if gentlemen really thought it possible to make a general law applicable to all the particular cases that must necessarily arise. The wisdom of Minerva and of the gentleman from Kent combined, could not do it.

The substitute was lost.

Mr. FRALICK rose to renew the motion of Mr. SULLIVAN, made in committee of the whole, to amend section 3 by striking out of the second and third lines, the words "of such city or village." As the section stood, the practical working of it in a city might do no harm, but in villages, he thought it might affect seriously the rights of parties.

Mr. J. BARTOW said, the principle was this: we make the very men affected by it establish the rule, and this is what we want.

Mr. FRALICK either did not understand the gentleman, or did not comprehend the question; they did not think alike. The main question was the matter of compensation; that was the point to be decided. Under the section, the men composing the jury would put it as low as possible.

Mr. COMSTOCK hoped the amendment would be adopted. Take, for instance, a public square; every man in a city would be interested in getting it put at the lowest price.

Mr. BACKUS said—Suppose there are twenty debtors, and the Legislature say that twelve of them shall decide the controversy between themselves and their creditors; such a proceeding would be identical with the plan embraced in the section, without the amendment. It would be a proposition applied to private transactions, of at least a peculiar character. In trying matters in court, the parties were always entitled to an impartial jury; and he thought it would be much better to leave this subject to be regulated by the common law.

The amendment was then adopted.

The article was then ordered engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CRARY said that, on the 20th of June, a resolution in the following words was offered by himself, viz:

"Resolved, That the article on the judicial department be recommitted to the judiciary committee with instructions that such committee so alter and modify their report as to provide that the judges of the circuit courts shall be judges of the supreme court."

He moved to take up the resolution, together with the article "Judicial Department."

Mr. MOORE said; before the question was taken, he desired to offer a resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the judiciary committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of incorporating in the constitution, the following:

"The Legislature shall, as soon as practicable, provide for the appointment of a board of commissioners, whose duty it shall be to revise, reform, simplify and abridge the rules and practice, pleadings, forms and proceedings of the courts of record of this State, and they shall provide for the abolition of the distinct forms of action at law, now in use in civil proceedings, and that justice may be administered in a uniform mode of pleadings, without reference to the distinction now existing between law and equity; and the said commissioners shall from time to time, when required, report their proceedings to the Legislature, subject to the action of that body."

He had not much to say on the resolution, at present. It must be apparent to all, that a great revolution was going on in the public mind, in reference to the proceedings at law, and to meet this change the practice in courts must be much simplified. It was not right that parties should be thrown back in suits by an error, perhaps technical, in the proceedings. An important question was involved in the resolution; he, therefore, moved to refer it to the committee of the whole.

The resolution was so referred.

The motion of Mr. CRARY, to take from the table his resolution, together with the article "Judicial Department," was then carried.

The question pending being the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. CRARY said, the resolution was offerred to test whether the article reported to the Convention was to stand or not. The Convention must decide now, by its action on the resolution, or go into committee on the article and then decide.

After some remarks by various members, as to whether the article or the resolution was first in order before the Convention, the President stated the question to be on the adoption of the resolution. The question being put,

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped that some legal gentleman would enlighten them as to the best course to be pursued.

Mr. CRARY had supposed that at least two speeches would be made. He did not intend to speak, himself, but doubtless others would; yet, as so long a time had elapsed since the resolution was introduced, members must have made up their minds as to what course they would pursue.

Mr. MOORE had not made up his mind as to what should be done. He hoped the matter would be discussed.

Mr. WHIPPLE said, by the course pursued, the Convention had involved itself in the difficulty he anticipated. The resolution supposed there were only two systems, and it was very clear the discussion could not be narrowed down to these two systems. Some other proposition might be better. He thought no good would ensue from the discussion of the single proposition embraced in the resolution. The Convention was not full, and it did not follow that it would hereafter adopt anything that was decided by the adoption of a resolution. It appeared to him, although he did not pretend to dictate, that the plan pursued in the New York Convention was the proper one to be pursued here. The resolution before them was narrowed down to one single system; he thought it better that some system should be printed and laid before the Convention. If the discussion should go on, it would be proper that the chairman should give his views. It was not proper to pass on the question without a word of debate. In New York the discussion occupied forty days, and he must say it was a most enlightened debate, evincing much learning and deep research. In the Ohio Convention it had been discussed at length.

Mr. CRARY—The delegate from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE,] seems a little captious because the resolution does not embrace a detailed judicial system. The object of the resolution was simply to obtain a vote of the Convention on a given point—whether they will have the independent supreme court system or the circuit court system. Here is the place to make the decision without waste of time, without any of that vacillation which is often exhibited when the Convention is in committee of the whole. In such committee it seldom happens that all the members vote: in Convention, where the question now is, all may be compelled to vote, and from the vote we shall know which system will be likely to prevail. The resolution is open to amendment. If the gentleman from Berrien or any one else has a system drawn up in detail, he can propose it. The true course is to vote upon the general system and leave the details to the committee, on a recommitment.

Mr. HANSCOM thought there was an obvious propriety in taking up the resolution. It embraced one single, isolated proposition—whether the judges of the circuit courts shall be judges of the supreme court.

He did not consider himself bound to go for all the measures in the article reported, but as far as general principles were involved, he did. Unless the Convention acted on the resolution, they might get into the difficulty which the Ohio Convention met with on this subject.

Mr. CORNELL was in favor of one course—of acting on one question at a time; but was disappointed in regard to this resolution. He had understood there was a division in the committee as to the article reported, and supposed that another report would have been made. This, he supposed, was the reason why action on this subject had been so long delayed. He must say he was disappointed.

Mr. CRARY said at the time he offered the resolution, he did not intend to discuss it; he expected that duty would have been performed by others. By the action of the judiciary committee, and from the opinions expressed by different members of the Convention, he knew there was a diversity of opinion on the judicial system. Some were in favor of the independent supreme court, while others favored a circuit court, or as it was sometimes called, a nisi prius system. The article reported embraced the independent supreme courts system, and the question for consideration was whether the Convention would adopt that system or the circuit court system. If the Convention wished the independent system, they would not recommit; if they preferred the other, they could recommit with instructions. He did not wish to waste time and labor in drawing out a circuit court system, if a majority wanted the other. He believed all had made up their minds on some system, and were as well prepared to vote on it then as at any other time. He favored the circuit system because it made better judges. True, all judges must read the black letter and musty records of the past, and apply the decisions drawn from them to the existing condition of things.

In this country, our judges had often erred in making this application; they did not seem sufficiently to understand the decisions necessary to carry out our institutions, and those necessary for a monarchy. Take for example the grant of a charter. Here it is an infringement of liberty; a restriction upon the rights of the masses. In Great Britain it is an extension of liberty and an enlargement of the privileges of the many, and yet our judges have followed the English decisions almost implicitly on the subject of charters. This had arisen, he believed, from their being so far removed from the action of public opinion. He would have judges go out among the people; he would have them engage in trials on the circuit, where, in listening to the testimony of witnesses and the argument of counsel, they have to become acquainted with all the business relations of society. All branches of business sooner or later become the subject of investigation in our courts, and a judge who has to listen to what is said upon these various branches, by witnesses and by counsel, must almost of necessity become a learned man; at any rate, his intellect must be expanded, his knowledge extended, and his ability to make up a correct judgement in cases that may come before him, vastly increased.

It was undoubtedly the peculiar organization of the courts of Great Britain that had given their judges such high eminence in their profession. There the nisi prius system prevailed. The judge not only sat in banc, but went out upon the circuit, where he had, to a certain extent, to mingle with the community and become familiar with their business relations. Such a judge, even with ordinary capacities, must become an enlightened man. It was undoubtedly the system adopted in Great Britain which had given their courts so high a character, and had caused them to be preferred to those of our own country. In our own State we give preference to English decisions over those of any State in the Union.

In support of the position that the discharge of circuit duties made good judges, he referred to the Supreme Court of the United States. There many of the judges when put upon the bench must have been ordinary lawyers, and were men, generally, who had for a long time been engaged in politics, and out of the practice of the law; and yet these judges soon learned their duties, and soon commanded the respect of the country; for he believed that that court still held the respect of the country. Each judge discharged circuit duties, went from State to State to attend circuit courts, and thus became familiar with different State laws and practices, and was compelled to listen to the ablest and most talented men of his section of the country. A man thus situated must not only learn the law, but how to apply it to the existing relations of society.

He was aware that there was necessity for a circuit system in the United States which did not apply in this State. The judges of the United States must become familiar with the laws of the different States; but here we have the same law applicable over the whole State. He was aware of the difficulty of carrying out a circuit system over so large an extent of territory, and have the judges also discharge supreme court duties. It was his opinion that two terms a year of the Supreme Court was sufficient. With two terms of that court, some eight or nine judges—the number he supposed we would be compelled to have—could discharge all the duties on the circuits throughout the State. He wanted a plain, simple, economical system; one that would make good judges—a court whose decisions would have the respect and confidence of the people.

The question having been again put,

Mr. BRITAIN said, if the vote about to be taken was to decide the system to be adopted by the Convention, he thought it should be argued then.

Mr. HANSCOM considered the vote about to be taken a test between the two systems, and if gentlemen were disposed to discuss the matter, he was willing to give his opinions. On this question he agreed with his constituents, and should adhere to their wishes. The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] had assumed that, by the independent system, we could not have as good judges as by the circuit system. This was an assumption that the judges chosen to sit on the supreme bench would be without training, and the qualifications necessary for a proper discharge of their duties; which, in the opinion of the gentleman, can only be attained by experience on the circuit court bench. Now, what did the system reported—the independent supreme court—propose? The article provided that the judges of the supreme court shall hold terms annually, in each judicial circuit; and by this provision they gained every advantage and enjoyed every benefit the gentleman imagined to be had only in the circuit system. He was clearly of opinion that our court of last resort should be independent; removed from, and disconnected with our circuit courts. There was an impression among the people that, under the present system, inducements influencing the lower courts, entered into the supreme court, and gave undue influence to its decisions. This, if true, was a serious objection to the circuit court system. Another objection was, that the circuit court system would be hindered in the discharge of circuit court duties, and consequently, business in the several districts much delayed. Take, for instance, a circuit court in session in any district; the court may be dismissed by the judge, for him to sit on the supreme bench, and vice versa. There were many other objections that might be urged against the circuit system, and much said in favor of the other; but, until he knew whether the subject was to be discussed at length, he would not trespass on the Convention.

Mr. J. BARTOW was in favor of the resolution, but opposed to making it a test. It could not be so considered. If adopted, the Convention would be ready to hear any other system discussed.

Mr. CORNELL said he must again express his disappointment at the course that had been pursued. Why had there been so long a delay by the Convention in this matter to this late day?

Mr. CRARY, (in his seat.)—The Convention has put it off, and we cannot reflect on its course.

Mr. CORNELL supposed not. He regretted it had been done, and would be glad to hear why. He supposed it was to give time for another report to be brought in.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD said the reason why another system had not been prepared and reported, was because it was thought best to introduce the resolution at the time the article was reported to the Convention, and make it the test question on the two systems. It was then expected that the resolution would be discussed at an early day, and they thought it proper to await the action of the Convention on it before perfecting another system, as it was doubtful whether it would be adopted or rejected. He regretted that action had been so long delayed, or that a different course had not been adopted. Although not a lawyer, he had reasons that governed him as to the vote he should give, and that induced him to favor the resolution. He had hoped that those more capable would have argued the matter in all its bearings; but at this late day, if discussion were only to cause delay without changing the result, it might perhaps be better to vote at once. His mind was fully made up, if the subject should be discussed a week; and he presumed others were in the same situation. The committee reporting the article stood ten to nine.

Mr. CHURCH did not think the gentleman from Genesee [Mr. J. BARROW] would intentionally give a false impression as to the intention designed by the friends of the resolution. It was offered as a test between the two systems, and manfully so stated by the gentleman from Jackson, [Mr. BUTTERFIELD.] If the resolution were adopted, it would not bring up any other system than that embraced by it.

Mr. J. BARTOW denied the conclusions of the member from Kent, and objected to the gentleman [Mr. BUTTERFIELD] coming and taking the Convention by storm, and saying the minds of members were made up, and they were all committed.

After a few remarks by Mr. BACKUS, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT, and resumed the consideration of the resolution [Mr. CARY'S] pending at the time of adjourning.

Mr. McCLELLAND said, perhaps it would have been well to have taken the vote on the resolution at the time it was introduced, when it could have been argued fully; but the time had passed when all the systems could be discussed in Convention without great delay. He liked the suggestion of some gentleman, that all the plans should be introduced at once; their merits compared and discussed fully; and to carry out the idea, he moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after "instructions," and inserting as follows: "to report also, as soon as practicable, a plan for a supreme court, the judges thereof to perform circuit duties."

Mr. CHURCH would inquire of the gentleman why the resolution should contain a recommitment of the article reported?

Mr. McCLELLAND—That is not my object at all.

Mr. CHURCH said he was about preparing a resolution having the same object in view, without a recommitment of the article before the Convention.

(Mr. C. here read a resolution, which was not obtained by the Reporter.)

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the gentleman from Monroe would accept the modification. There was no use or necessity for a recommitment.

Mr. McCLELLAND said he was acting in good faith. Nothing would be done with the article before the Convention, should his amendment prevail.

Mr. N. PIERCE said the article ought to be recommitted, as they could not act on it until the other was reported.

Mr. BRITAIN thought if the gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] would reflect a little, he would see that parliamentary courtesy required a recommitment of the article if the resolution were adopted. Unless it be recommitted, the Convention could take it up and act on it before the other article was reported.

Mr. HANSCOM said the proposition was a mere species of tactics resorted to by minorities to avoid coming to a direct vote. The proposition of the member from Calhoun was an entirely different matter; it brought them to a direct vote on the two systems; and he would submit if a direct vote should not be had. Without the proposition of the member from Monroe, any member of the committee had a perfect right to report an article different from that brought in. He was opposed to any system of tactics being introduced here. It would lead to difficulty.

Mr. CARY then withdrew his resolution, and on his motion the article entitled "Judicial Department" was referred to the committee of the whole and placed on the general order.

Mr. WITHERELL moved that the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole on the article entitled "Exemptions and the Rights of Married Women," but withdrew his motion.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. BUSH in the chair, and took up for consideration "Article —, Finance and Taxation."

Sec. 1. 1st. All specific taxes shall be applied in paying the interest of the University and primary school funds, in defraying the current expenses of the State, and in paying the interest of the State debt, in the order herein recited.

2d. The Legislature shall provide for an annual tax, sufficient, with other resources of the State, to pay the estimated expenses of the State, and the interest of the State debt.

3d. The Legislature shall also, by taxes, supply any deficiency which may occur in the resources of the State.

Mr. BRITAIN said, since the submission of the report, the Convention had made an important provision in the article on education, making a two mill tax appropriation for educational purposes. He, therefore, moved to strike out the words "in defraying the current expenses of the State," and insert "balance of the," before "State," where it last occurs. Which motion prevailed.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the words "and other educational," were inserted between "school" and "funds," in line two.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to insert after the word "taxes," in first line, "except on charters organizing the mining companies in the upper peninsula." Lost.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to strike out the words "in the order herein recited." His object was to place all on an equal footing.

Mr. BRITAIN hoped the motion would not prevail. If any discrimination were proper, the plan reported he thought preferable to any other.

Mr. J. BARTOW said if any discrimination were made at all, it should be in favor of the public creditors, on the same principle that a man should pay his debts before building a house. We should discriminate in favor of justice. He was of opinion that the specific tax should go with the general fund.

Mr. WITHERELL agreed with the gentlemen from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN.] The specific tax should be appropriated to the purposes named.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. WITHERELL offered the following, to come in at the end of the third line: "After the payment of the State debt, except the debt due to the educational fund, the said taxes shall be applied exclusively to the purposes of education."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to strike out "purposes of education," and insert "support of primary schools."

Mr. WHIPPLE hoped the Convention would leave it to the Legislature. We were going too much into detail.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE withdrew his amendment.

Mr. FRALICK hoped the amendment of his colleague would not prevail. It would be perhaps twenty-five or thirty years before the State debt would be paid, and it was too far off to make any calculations as to what should be done after that time.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to amend section 1 by inserting after "paying," in the first line, the words "the expense of the governmental and judicial policy of the upper peninsula."

After some remarks by Mr. R., explaining the situation of the upper peninsula,

Mr. WITHERELL offered the following as a substitute for the amendment, which was accepted by Mr. ROBERTS and adopted by the committee:

Add at the end of first subdivision of section 1, as follows: "The foregoing provisions shall not apply to specific taxes on the upper peninsula."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to add at the end of the 2nd subdivision:

"And also the necessary amount including the fund appropriated to support the free schools established by this constitution."

But the committee refused to so amend.

Sec. 2. 1st. The Legislature, in addition to the above named taxes, shall provide by law for a sinking fund, of at least twenty thousand dollars a year, to commence in eighteen hundred and fifty-one, with compound interest at six per cent. per annum, and an annual increase of at least five per cent.

2d. Said sinking fund shall be applied solely to the payment and extinguishment of the principal of the State debt, other than the amounts due to the university and primary school funds, and said tax shall be continued so long as shall be necessary to secure the extinguishment of the existing funded and fundable debt.

3d. Said fundable debt may only be funded or redeemed at a value not exceeding that established by law in eighteen hundred and forty-eight.

Mr. EDMUNDS moved to strike out "one" after "fifty," and insert "five."

Mr. BRITAIN said it was an important question whether we should commence now or in 1855, to extinguish the State debt. The credit and honor of the State depended upon it, and it was certainly preferable to begin as soon as possible.

Mr. EDMUNDS said, it seemed to him that after the long session of the last Legislature, and taking into consideration the expense of the Convention and the next session of the Legislature, the time proposed in the article to commence levying a tax for the sinking fund was too early. This was his only objection.

Mr. BRITAIN suggested that a tax provided for in '51 would not be collected until '52.

Mr. CORNELL said it was a settled principle, that the sooner out of debt the better. People complained of the county and township taxes, but not of the State tax.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out "with compound interest at six per cent. per annum;" but after an explanation by Mr. BRITAIN, withdrew his motion.

Mr. WHIPPLE said he was opposed to the motion of the member from Washtenaw, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] because the time to commence the sinking fund was put off too long; yet he thought '51 too early, and therefore moved to strike out "one" and insert "three."

Mr. BRITAIN still thought '51 the best time to commence. The specific taxes would come in then, and there could be no more appropriate time.

Mr. WHIPPLE was willing the tax should commence as early as practicable; but we must recollect that although these taxes would come in then, the increase in other expenses would follow in proportion.

The amendment was carried.

Sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9 were severally read.

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike out section 9.

Mr. F. said the State might hereafter become interested in the Central rail road. It had the right to re-purchase the road, and it might be expedient to retain it.

The motion was negatived.

Section 10 was read.

Mr. COOK moved to strike it out; but at the request of Mr. BRITAIN withdrew the motion.

Sec. 11. The Legislature shall provide a uniform rule of taxation, except upon property paying specific taxes; and taxes shall be levied upon such property as the Legislature shall prescribe.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out the words "and taxes shall be levied upon such property as the Legislature shall prescribe."

Mr. R. made the motion because he did not fully understand the terms used. It brought to his mind certain laws by which property was exempted from sale. Was this property to be exempted from taxation?

Mr. BRITAIN said if the words were stricken out the matter would be left in the same situation still. It was thought best by the committee to insert them—leaving it to the Legislature entirely to prescribe on what property taxes should be levied.

The amendment was lost.

Section 12 was read and passed without amendment.

Sec. 13. The Legislature shall provide by law for an equalization of assessments upon all taxable property, except that paying specific taxes, by a State board, in eighteen hundred and fifty-one, and on every fifth year thereafter.

Mr. W. ADAMS moved to strike out "shall," in first line, and insert "may." The motion was lost.

Mr. COOK moved to strike out "by a State board."

Mr. C. said it would then be left to the Legislature to equalize as they thought best.

Mr. BRITAIN had no objection, if some other mode of equalization could be decided on. The property in the State was estimated now far below its value, and this was the reason why the per cent. appeared large. This had a bad effect abroad. If it were assessed at its cash value, the per cent. would be very small in comparison with many other States. It was returned last year at $29,000,000; when, had it been assessed at the cash value, it would be $100,000,000.

The motion was lost.

Section 14 was read and no amendment made.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD offered the following, to stand as

"Sec. 15. The Legislature shall provide by law for the final collection of all taxes within the several townships."

Mr. B. sent up the amendment, as he saw no provision in the article to change the present mode of collecting taxes; and under the present system he thought there was a vast amount of machinery that could be dispensed with. It was his opinion that the section proposed would operate beneficially, and it might, perhaps, be extended to counties. There was a manifest impropriety in the present unequal mode of collecting taxes; for every one must see the advantage the non-resident had over the resident. This certainly ought not to be so. In some respects they were on the same footing; but in others, not. He could see no reason why land should not be sold when taxes were not paid, as well as other property.

Mr. WHITE moved to add to said proposed section, the following: "at the same time and in the same manner."

Mr. CHURCH said the member from Jackson [Mr. BUTTERFIELD] seemed to think there was no objection to the proposed new section; it would be ruinous to the new counties.

Mr. WHITE would be glad to know how the new counties would be injured? He lived in a new county.

Mr. CRARY was in favor of the proposition, and saw not the least difficulty in carrying out the measure. It only proposed to authorize the collector to go on and close up matters in his township. It was a fact that non-residents paid their taxes as they thought proper. Their lands were first returned to the county treasurer, then sent to the Auditor General, where they laid over a year or two, and then sent back to the counties to be there disposed of. If confidence were placed in the county treasurer, what objection could there be against his closing up this business in the county? If the town treasurer were competent to collect resident taxes, he was equally competent to collect non-resident; if competent to sell a horse, he was competent to sell land, &c. We were required by Congress to put non-residents on an equal footing with residents; but instead of doing this, we discriminated in favor of the former.

He was aware there would be objections to the proposition; he had heard them repeatedly before. The advocates of the present system say the lists should be sent to the Auditor General for his inspection, that errors may be corrected. How could he do this? In every list returned there were many wrong descriptions—hundreds of them—which he could not correct, and so the matter was not made better, even after his inspection. By adopting the proposition of the gentleman from Jackson, it would save thousands of dollars to the State, and the system was only liable to a few errors, which might be easily corrected by the Auditor General. If the Convention desired to give five, eight or ten years for redemption, they should do it; but if they preferred to have the business of the State done at the proper time, and save an expense of thousands of dollars, they should adopt the proposition. How was the business, at present, done in villages? The lists were put in the hands of the marshals, who went on and closed up the matter; and this could be as easily and as well done in the different towns, for all the wisdom was not concentrated in villages. It had been said that a title from the Auditor General was preferred; but he would ask if a title from a village was not considered equally good? He considered the system proposed far preferable to the present one.

Mr. HANSCOM perhaps did not understand the proposition, but it seemed to him impracticable. He looked on these strained efforts at getting specific provisions incorporated in the constitution as improper and entirely wrong; he should not be surprised to hear a proposition to make every man deposit his own taxes with some officer. It all sounded very well and read well, but he had heard nothing to convince him of the propriety of placing such a provision in the constitution. It might operate very well in the old counties, yet he was confident it would prove disastrous to the new. The matter should be left to the Legislature. It had been a source of contention for fifteen years, and it seemed impracticable to be tied down to any one system.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD regretted that the member from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] had gone no further than barely to announce that the proposition, if carried out, would be disastrous to new counties, and he begged leave to dissent with his statement.

The argument of the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] proved that something specific should be placed in the constitution. The laws were constantly changing, and hence the very difficulty of which he complained. All that the people know of the tax laws is that non-residents are the more favored. He believed the people would prefer a bad law to one continually changing.

On motion, the committee rose and obtained leave to sit again.

The Convention then adjourned.

SATURDAY, (41st day,) July 27.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. WHITTEMORE: four several petitions of the ladies of Pontiac, praying the incorporation of a provision in the constitution, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic drinks as a beverage.

Referred to the select committee upon the subject.

By Mr. CHURCH: two several petitions of citizens of Kent county, that a clause may be inserted in the new constitution, prohibiting the employment of convicts in the State Prison in those branches of mechanical industry which interfere with those of our own citizens.

Referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. RIX ROBINSON,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of inserting a clause in the constitution prohibiting the enforcing by law the payment of any debts on contracts express or implied, of a less amount than twenty-five dollars; and that they report thereon as soon as practicable.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention was resolved into a committee of the whole on the article entitled "Finance and Taxation," Mr. MASON in the chair.

The question being upon Mr. WHITE's amendment to Mr. BUTTERFIELD'S proposed new section,

Mr. WHITE said—I hope that the amendment will prevail. The committee must see, I think, by looking at the proposition of the gentleman from Jackson, that it will place the tax papers on an equal and proper footing. It is plain and simple in its provisions—requiring that the taxes to be levied and collected for the support of your government shall be uniform—that is, collected at the same time, in the same manner, and in the respective towns.

Every gentleman on this floor must be aware that the present system of taxation does not operate equally—that in certain circumstances, in fact in very many cases, it operates oppressively on the tax payers. The amendment proposed is intended to do away with the inequality, the oppressive working of your system. It will be unnecessary for me to go into an investigation of this matter, because all are tax payers; and it is to be presumed all are familiar with the present system, and its operation.

In order to test the utility of the proposition now under consideration, it will only be necessary to look at the relation which the tax payer sustains to the State. That relation is simply that of debtor and creditor—every tax payer being a debtor to the State, and he sustaining that relation until his quota of tax is paid into the hands of the collector, and the tax cancelled. It is therefore for the interest of both parties that the debt or tax should be collected in a direct, simple mode, and in the cheapest way possible. This relation of debtor and creditor existing, as regards all tax payers, is it but just and proper that the resident and non-resident should be placed on the same footing; and when you require one to pay, then can there be injustice in requiring the latter at the same time to pay the tax levied on his property within your borders?

Under the present system, the resident has to pay his tax when called upon by the collector, and it is just and right that he should do so. But the non-resident is required to do no such thing—he is a privileged person, and walks abroad unconcerned about the payment of his taxes—that is an after-thought which does not trouble him. He lets his taxes run on for years, with interest and charges accruing, till at last he discovers some informality, when the tax is rejected by your Auditor General, and charged back as an item of contingent expense upon the town in which it was levied. And here the resident has again to be taxed to meet this delinquent non-resident portion of rejected tax, notwithstanding he has discharged the duty of a good citizen, once paying the quota assigned him for the support of government.

In this way the system works oppressively. The people have felt it, and do feel sensibly its operation; and they call for a change—they demand it. This they require at our hands; and the reason is, because for the last ten years the people have repeatedly called for a change in your tax system at the hands of the Legislature, and their calls have been unheeded.

Mr. Chairman, this proposition as amended can certainly work no injury; it is only intended to meet and correct the evils and abuses complained of by the resident tax payer, and should be adopted. The whole subject is left to be regulated and carried out by the Legislature, and will insure to the people uniformity in levying and collecting taxes—nothing more. It has been said by gentlemen on this floor that the people in the new towns are not competent to carry out the detail of levying and the collection of taxes—that there now are, and must continue to be, so many irregularities creeping into your assessment rolls, that it not only does, but will for years to come, require a supervisory central power to correct them, in order to carry out successfully any tax system that may be proposed, in the present condition of this State. Now, what are the facts in regard to the competency of the people of the new towns in levying and collecting taxes? Under your present law your supervisor is your assessor, and on him devolves the duty of preparing the assessment roll—fixing the value of the property taxed—apportioning the quota of tax to be levied to each individual, with his warrant for collection attached. The entire tax roll is thus made and perfected in the hands of your supervisors, as completely as the law can define it; and when thus made, it passes from the hand of the supervisor into that of the collector, who collects the resident tax.

Here is your tax roll, warrant, all that the law requires to be done in the premises, for the collection of the resident tax, made and perfected by the people of the towns; and yet, it is contended they are not competent to carry out the detail of collecting the non-resident tax. Such arguments, to say the least, are doing injustice to the ability and intelligence of the people of the new towns. What we complain of is that the non-resident is not required to pay his tax at the same time and in the same manner that the resident is required to pay his. We propose to place them on the same footing; and if in either case the tax be not paid, let the collection of it be put on the same basis. Let the debt or tax be made on the same principle that you now collect a debt as between individuals—through the instrumentality of an execution—and close up at once each year's tax list in the towns.

And why, let me ask, is not the collector who has the tax rolls as competent to make the tax of the non-resident by levy and sale of his property, as he is that of the resident? Both classes of tax payers are embraced in the same roll, with a description of their real estate. The tax of one is as just, and as much due the State, as the other; and the law controlling the right of property has made the tax a lien on the real property taxed. Why this lien, and so long delay in making the tax on the property of the non-resident? It is to give him time to pay, if he will—to return his lands to your Auditor General for his inspection and correction; and if found informal, although the tax is just, it is rejected and thrown back on the resident, as a penalty for his inability to comply with your complicated tax system.

Your present system is altogether too complicated and expensive; and I am led to believe that many of the irregularities and rejections grow out of transcribing the assessment roll, in making returns, and by its passing through so many different hands. It is all wrong, and works a direct injury to the resident.

Another objection which has been raised to closing up the taxes in towns is, that the title to land sold for taxes by your collector will not be good, and hence there will be few buyers of tax lands. I would ask gentlemen if the transfer of title in such cases is not the work of the law? And cannot a town officer fill up a blank deed as evidence of conveyance as well as your State officer?

But, let us look at the title coming from your Auditor General under the present system. Within the last ten days, where property was sold for taxes, title given, after passing through the hands and scrutiny of your Auditor General, facts were brought to his notice, that the tax was irregular, and thereupon he issued his certificate, invalidating his deed of conveyance. This is not a single instance, but the occurrence is so frequent that the people have very little or no confidence in these tax titles; and the reason is obvious; for, if an individual does purchase for agricultural purposes, he not only runs a great risk of losing the land, but all the labor and expense he may bestow in improving it. Your tax titles therefore are now worthless, or nearly so, from their uncertainty, growing out of the complexity of your present tax law. There is no subject on which we are called to act in which the interest of the whole people is more directly involved, than in this of finance and taxation. And, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that it has been the means of as mighty revolutions in the political world as any other subject; and I have only to refer to the early history of our own country for an illustrious example, which cost the British crown her North American colonies.

It will be seen by the Auditor General's report to the Legislature of 1849, that the non-resident taxable property of this State amounts to little over one-fifth part of the entire valuation of taxable property, real and personal; the evil, therefore, is one of magnitude, and calls for a speedy correction. And I am fully persuaded in my own mind that the present onerous tax system will not be borne much longer by the people; and if attempted to be continued, they will cause a revolution to be felt that will completely overthrow it.

It has been remarked by a celebrated author on political science, that the towns spread out all over our country were so many little republics, containing each within itself the elements of a perfect democracy. There it is, sir, we must look for the beauty and perfection of our system of government; and hence, from these pure fountains of political power will spring reform; and there we must bend our ear to catch the cry—"look not to your central power for reform." Place power in the hands of one man, or in the few, and it is liable to abuse. In time it will be abused; it ever has been the case; it is so now; and the very object of this Convention is to reform the evils and abuses that have fastened on the body politic by improvident legislation.

I hope that this Convention will look at this subject in all its bearings; that it may be fully discussed, and the rights and interests of the people sustained.

Mr. BUSH—I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Jackson; I consider it impracticable. It provides that all taxes, resident and non-resident, shall be collected by the township treasurer during the life of his warrant. This sounds very well—his arguments sound very well. It certainly is no more than reasonable that tax payers should all enjoy equal privileges. He tells us that the property of the resident, if he neglects to pay his taxes, must be sold forthwith under the hammer, to the highest bidder; that the land of the non-resident is no more sacred, and should be disposed of in the same summary manner.

I had not intended to speak upon this subject, supposing the impracticability of the proposition would be so apparent that no one would seriously advocate it; but, sir, I have been mistaken. The gentleman from Lapeer, [Mr. WHITE,] the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] and other gentlemen support it with eloquence and apparent zeal; they call upon me to come up to the rescue as one who has heretofore favored this project, and give them my aid or define my position. In defining my position it will become necessary for me to take a retrospective view of our tax laws; and other laws bearing upon this subject. The State government was organized in 1835;—the statute of 1833 was in force. The tax system of that territorial law was well adapted to the condition of our territory.

The gentleman from Lapeer [Mr. WHITE] tells us that each town is a little sovereignty, and has the undoubted right of closing up the tax roll. In our territorial condition, the United States paid our Governor, Judges, Council, and other territorial expenses; county and township government expenses were paid by direct taxes, as all our government expenses are under the State constitution. Taxes were levied then to pay township and county expenses. The town collector paid over to the town treasurer the money raised for township purposes, and next he paid over the money raised for county purposes to the county treasurer. In case of not being able to raise the money, he returned the non-resident land to the county treasurer, to be disposed of by him to raise the amount of the taxes. This law answered the end for which it was enacted, but it was soon found to be inadequate to the necessities of a State government; there was a vast quantity of non-resident land in every county of the State; in many of the counties resident taxes did not even pay township expenses, much less county; and not one cent towards the expenses of the State government. The general fund of the State was obliged to borrow money to pay the current expenses of the government. This statute continued until the 30th of August, 1838, when the revised Statutes of that year came in force. The tax law contained in the revised statutes was framed with reference to the necessities of a new and sparsely settled country. It provided that the township collector should collect the tax; that the first money collected should be retained for township purposes; the next, county purposes; last, State purposes; but, in case of not raising the money, the town collector returned his roll to the county treasurer; the county treasurer to the Auditor General. He was required to issue bonds bearing interest, to the full amount of all the non-resident taxes returned to his office, and to dispose of those bonds for cash, and immediately thereafter pay over to the respective counties their proportion of the money due for non-resident taxes, retaining in all cases the State tax due from said county. The taxes upon which those bonds were issued, when collected, were to pay or redeem the bonds. This system was well received by the people, as one that would be efficient. The Legislature of 1839 arranged the law properly. They likewise remitted the State tax due from some of the sparsely settled counties that had accumulated against them under the operation of the statute of 1833, and no disposition was manifested to interfere with the tax law; but a crisis was at hand—the paper bubble, upon which we rolled into existence as a State, had exploded. The community without stopping to inquire into the cause of the difficulty, began at once to cry—reform—change—ruin, &c. It had its effect. The next Legislature that convened, to wit, in 1840, were reformers. Mad with power, and elated with their brilliant political prospects, they went to work in good earnest, not directly at the tax law, but with the banks, to make money plenty by law; this they accomplished; but in making it plenty, it was furnished so cheap that non-resident land holders bought it at a great discount, and paid it into the State treasury at par. Until the Bank of Michigan and the State treasury could be separated, they were one and indivisible; and the best funds that could be obtained from either were irredeemable promises.

This was not sufficient; the public pulse, though gradually yielding, beat high; the glorious mission of reform had not yet fulfilled its destiny, and was extended by the election of the Legislature of 1841. This illustrious body of men, to show themselves superior to their predecessors, not only continued the bank suspensions, thus making bank paper still cheaper, but obtained plates at a large public expense, and issued State Scrip, or bills of credit; this Scrip was issued for the benefit of the internal improvement fund; but to give this cheap reform currency character, it was made receivable for taxes and all public dues. It has been well said, sir, that effects always follow causes; the effect produced in this case was terrible to the new portion of the State. The Legislature of 1840 defeated the object contemplated in the tax law of 1838, by receiving a cheap paper currency for the very tax upon which the bonds were issued, so that bonds would not sell; and the towns and counties were compelled to receive them. The Legislature of 1841 capped the climax; they issued the scrip to build railroads; it was received for taxes levied for the support of the poor, to build school-houses, to pay the township and county expenses. The locusts of Egypt were no more desolating to vegetation than this scrip was to the towns and counties. The tax bonds which they held as the representative of the tax, having lost its base, depreciated more than fifty per cent. Then, sir, this change in the tax system was demanded by the people. One voice was heard from the whole interior of the State in favor of a change. I was one of the representatives of the people of a neighboring county, and struggled hard to bring about a change.

The gentleman from Lapeer has asked me when I changed my opinion upon this subject. I will tell him. Sir, it was when the law was administered and not perverted—it was when certain necessary amendments were made,—one permitting taxes to be paid or redeemed in the counties, or at the State Treasurer's office, as best suited the convenience of the person wishing to pay. To be brief, sir, it was when, from experience, I had become satisfied that no more frauds would be practiced, or laws perverting taxes would be passed. No general complaint was ever made against our present system. Amendments have been made, as experience showed their necessity, until it works remarkably well, and every department of the government is protected. The townships first have the rolls, and thus have the means in their own hands of collecting and retaining the township taxes; next the county is entitled to its own proper taxes; lastly the State tax is paid, and in most of the counties it is entirely paid with non-resident land returned. Thus, township, county and State, all in turn, have what belongs to them. The State and county each collect taxes and compare monthly, and pay over the balance as it may be due. The tax that remains unpaid two years is collected by the Auditor General by selling the lands. The entire expense falls upon the delinquents, and is not, as has been stated, an expense to the State; being under the control of one head, one uniform system prevails.

The gentleman from Lapeer complains that, where mistakes are manifest, the Auditor General cancels the sale, causing inconvenience and expense. Is the gentleman opposed to this provision? Would he prefer a suit in ejectment where there is a positive error, or would he permit some eight or ten hundred men to have the cancelling power? If that is an evil now, it would be infinitely increased in either case. The gentleman from Calhoun insists that the collector of the township should in all cases collect, during the life of his warrant, all the taxes assessed in said township, both resident and non-resident. This might possibly be done in some few of the older and well settled counties; but in most parts of the State it would be impossible. Land could not be sold for money, and if bid in by the town, would very soon bankrupt said town. Gentlemen inform us that, under the Auditor General's system, there is but very little confidence in tax titles. If this be true, when the whole system is under the supervision of one competent head, adopt the township system, and you could not collect revenue sufficient to support the government. Confidence in tax titles would be entirely lost. We have been in the habit of trying experiments in this State, until legislation has justly fallen into disrepute, and this Convention has been called to limit the legislative power; but, was it expected that this Convention would run into the same error? I ask the gentleman from Calhoun.

Just before the election of delegates, I saw a very sensible article in a Calhoun county paper; I thought, perhaps, it was from the able pen of that gentleman. It was relative to the duty of the Convention. It declared that the duties of the delegates could be closed up in four weeks; that a general revision of the constitution was not contemplated; that public sentiment had clearly pointed to a few amendments which should be made promptly and submitted; that the main features of the present constitution were satisfactory.

But what has been our action? Every article has been materially changed—not only in principle, but we have gone into detail upon almost every subject, virtually doing up the legislation for the country for the next fifteen or twenty years. Not content to establish the great outlines of government, and define principles and powers, we have anticipated the necessities of the State in its future development, and prepared in our constitution a code of laws, with as much coolness as a legislative body would manifest in passing an appropriation bill to pay the ordinary expenses of the government for a single year. I warn gentlemen against this dangerous system of tying down everything in the constitution. We are not skilled in prophetic vision, and may be mistaken. Laws well adapted to older States do not always answer here. We once had a general banking law. It proved a failure; its odium is not yet wiped out. Now, sir, I contend that that banking law in New York or New England would have answered as well as their present systems. In New York they bank upon the debts they owe. That system is popular here; but compare it with the general banking law of Michigan, which proved a failure, and it sinks into insignificance. Our law was based upon specie and real estate—theirs is based upon indebtedness; theirs works well—ours was worthless. This grows out of the different conditions of the States. Here land has no real marketable value, and cannot at all times be exchanged for cash; there it can be; and the banking law of Michigan would practically work well there, while here it proved impracticable. So it is with a tax law. Then why incorporate it in the constitution? Why not leave it with the Legislature? If they continue to try experiments, they can retract; but, if we experiment in the constitution, we stamp an injury upon the country that cannot conveniently be erased.

I enter my solemn protest against this species of constitutional legislation, and predict that those who shall be called to act under this constitution, unless we, to a certain extent, retrace our steps, will pronounce their anathemas upon our folly.

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend the substitute by inserting before "townships" the words "counties and."

Mr. WHITE—I have listened with great attention to the discussion of gentlemen on the subject under consideration, especially to the argument of the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH.] That gentleman has told us, sir, that in 1838 a law was passed requiring the non-resident lands to be returned to the Auditor General's office; that from time to time the same was amended, to make it perfect. But, sir, in all this I have not discovered a change in the system; your lands are still returned the same, and are liable to the same expense and rejection. He has entirely failed to convince me that a change in your tax system is not called for. He has failed to answer a single objection that has been raised to it. But his argument shows conclusively to my mind, if it shows any thing, that a change is eminently called for.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that gentleman has given us the rise and progress of your odious tax law; and he has done us the kindness to trace out the slow, slimy, serpentine course of the oppressive system in its meanderings for the last ten or twelve years. The gentleman has said the present system was perfect—the most perfect tax law of any State in the Union. Yet, sir, before the gentleman from Ingham gets through with his argument, he tells you that, with a few other amendments to his perfect law, it can be made more perfect, and so as not to work oppressively on any class of tax payers. Even the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] admitted that the people required a change.

Mr. HANSCOM—I did not. I did not defend the present system, as I did not know enough about the machinery.

Mr. WHITE—The gentleman from Ingham has not answered our argument; he has simply recited the various acts of amendment to perfect the system, which I consider have failed in their object.

The gentleman admits that it works oppressively; that he has participated in the tax sales, and knows that wrongs exist. Another thing he admits, sir; that a "change has come over the spirit of his dreams." That gentleman has been the advocate of a change in your system; and now, sir, he is the advocate of its continuance. Think you, sir, the gentleman from Ingham, with his known political sagacity, would advocate the change of a system that was perfect? He may say, truly, a "change has come over the spirit of his dreams." And there should be a change come over your odious and oppressive tax system. It is expensive in its operations, and the people have sought to change it at the hands of your Legislature. They have petitioned year after year, but to no effect. They now require a modification at our hands, and to place it in the organic law.

The gentleman from Ingham has told us that we have the most perfect tax law of any State in the Union. Let us, for a moment, look into the reports of your State officers and see the workings of this perfect system.

In the year 1838, the amount of non-resident taxes returned to the Auditor General's office from the county of Lapeer was large. There was rejected and charged back to that county, taxes levied for that year, according to the statement sent to the county treasurer from the Auditor's office, the sum of $4,228 49. On one item of this sum which was rejected some four years after the tax was levied, viz: on $966 00, there had accrued the expense of 45 months' interest, $253 60; advertising, $354 72. Not only the original amount of taxes levied, when charged back, but the additional sum of $608 32, as interest and charges.

Another item embraced in the same amount of tax rejected and charged back for 1838, was $565 45; 45 months' interest on the same, $148 40; advertising 139 descriptions, $150 29; thus adding to the original tax levied an expense of over 50 per cent. In order to show more fully the working of the perfect system of the gentleman from Ingham, in its detail, I will give an example of one item of rejected taxes in the year 1839, in the county of Lapeer: On the west half of the south-west quarter of section 33, town 7 north, of range 10 east, was levied a school tax of $5.00. This was returned, with others, as delinquent unpaid tax, to the Auditor's office. It was afterwards rejected and charged back, with an additional sum, for interest, of $2.65; charges, $1.05; making the expense of collecting over 50 per cent; and, failing to do so, not only the original tax, but the expenses accruing thereon, come charged back on those who had once paid a just proportion. This system has been continued since 1838, down to the present time; and these rejections, more or less, come pouring down yearly upon the people, till it has become oppressive and odious to them.

The gentleman from Ingham has said that a change had come over the spirit of his dreams; that a curse was upon the land—a blight worse than the blight of Egypt. I thank the gentleman for that allusion, sir. He has told us that there was a wrong in the system; that he had advocated its reform—a change; and for what, if not to remove this curse and blight from the land?

I propose to show some of the results growing out of the sales of the tax lands under this system. In looking at the Auditor General's report to the Legislature for the year 1849, it will be seen that the amount of non-resident delinquent tax lands which had been previously twice offered, and remained on hand unsold, amounted to the sum of $25,636 25. In October of last year the sale of these lands was directed peremptorily. The sum realized on such sale was only $947, the State losing, in closing up two or three years' taxes, $24,735 76. In Lapeer county, of these lands, on $1,333 28, the State realized on the sale only $11 65. Here, sir, is a specimen of the perfection of your tax system, and the gross injustice practiced under it to the best interests of the people. Another argument that has been used to influence the continuance of the present system is, that the people of the new towns are not capable of collecting the non-resident tax; that the new counties are totally unable to pay the State tax, and the treasury would, by a change of the system, become bankrupt, and the wheels of government must stop.

The gentleman from Ingham, in discussing the article on State Officers, a few days since, became greatly alarmed at the proposition for abolishing a sinecure office—that of Commissioner of the Land Office, and the proposition to devolve its duties on the State Treasurer. He portrayed in strong and earnest language the danger that would, if overthrown, result to the liberties of the people, by uniting the two into one. It was, to his mind, a union of the purse and the sword. This proposition—the amendment we propose—will, in a great degree, remove the fears from the gentleman's imagination. We propose to disarm your Auditor General of his damask, in which he has been so near your Treasury, and a terror to the gentleman from Ingham. He alluded in his remarks to the Auditor's office, and said, sir, that honest men had filled it. I do not doubt this. I believe the present incumbent to be every way qualified for the discharge of the arduous duty of that office; that he has discharged that duty to the entire satisfaction of all who know him. I have not assailed that officer, nor any person employed by him. But, I would remind the gentleman from Ingham that there was a time when an inquiry was started in this hall, and on this floor, in relation to a certain ex-Auditor, and the two hundred dollars for extra services. How much more of the people's money may have gone in the same way I shall not undertake to say. The affairs of the office, under your present law, are intricate; your tax system is complicated, as the answer of the Auditor to the call for information from his office, which I submitted to this Convention at an early day, will bear me witness, and which you did not do him the poor compliment to print.

It was said by the gentleman from Ingham that the proposition might do for the old towns, where there were but few descriptions of non-resident land. But the new towns are not prepared for it—that they were not capable of collecting the non-resident tax—they could not do the business. I would ask that gentleman if the supervisor does not prepare and perfect the assessment roll? If the entire business of levying and collecting the resident tax is not done in the new as well as in the old towns? And if it would require any greater ability in the collector to make the amount of the tax from the one case than the other? This argument of the gentleman from Ingham is a reflection on the intelligence and capacity of the people of the new towns, that I shall leave with him to take off.

One other remark, Mr. Chairman, and I am done with the subject. The lands bid in by the State for taxes due on them, are withheld from taxation; consequently the valuation of taxable property is thereby diminished, and great injustice done to the people of the new counties, by increasing their burden of taxation.

Every gentleman, I think, who will give this subject a fair and impartial examination, will see the inequality and oppressive workings of the present system, and be ready, with the friends of the amendment, to do away the gross injustice which is now inflicted on the resident tax payer, and prevent a further loss to the people of this State.

Mr. CORNELL would inquire if it was not charged again upon the county?

Mr. WHITE—The act of the Legislature legalized the illegal act. The Legislature attempted to legalize an act which the Auditor General had declared illegal.

Mr. CORNELL—I did not wish to interrupt the gentleman. I only wished the matters to stand fairly before the Convention.

Mr. W. ADAMS' amendment was negatived.

Mr. ROBERTSON—This is a question of great importance, and therefore I propose to give my views in as few words as possible. This has always been one of the most difficult questions that have engaged the attention of governments—the proper mode of assessing and collecting taxes for revenue. And yet, it is proposed here to place a system in the fundamental law of the land, where, if it does not work well, it will be beyond all legislative aid. This has never been, and never can be, safely done in any organic law; because the mode of collecting taxes must ever vary according to the wants of the people. We cannot safely take away legislative control over this matter, unless we are sure that the same state of facts that now seem to indicate it will always exist. The arguments which have been adduced in favor of this proposition are all derived from a state of things which exist now; and to engraft a principle of this kind in the organic law, when the reasons urged in its favor apply only to the new counties—and only, perhaps, in these for a few years—is, in my opinion, neither prudent nor wise. What are the arguments brought forward by the gentleman from Lapeer in favor of his amendment? I will examine a few points, and see, if possible, where the difficulty rests.

The gentleman has complained that the present system is oppressive, and gives this instance: that a tax was assessed on a piece of land of only five dollars, and returned unpaid; and that after it had passed through the hands of various officers, it amounted to eight dollars and seventy cents. Now, where did this error originate—in the township, or with some of those transcribing? Undoubtedly in the township; and it was charged back as an invalid tax. Is it wrong, when an invalid tax is charged back, that the towns should suffer for the incapacity or negligence of their officers? It seems to me not.

Another instance is given—a case in which, within ten days last past, a deed was cancelled. Now, sir, this fact, and all such facts, I take to be the strongest arguments in favor of the present system. It is provided there shall be an Auditor General, and in his hands we have placed a large discretionary power—not to set at defiance the law, but to be exercised fairly, prudently, and with a view to the benefit of the citizen—a power to cancel deeds issued by him under the provisions of law, when the title conveyed is manifestly void. And I would ask, sir, if this is not an incalculable benefit to the people? Would gentlemen desire that a suit in ejectment should be brought in all cases to test the validity of tax titles? Is it not better far to give some officer the power to cancel the title, when, from a known defect, it is clear it cannot be sustained?

Gentlemen have mentioned the numerous defects in tax titles, but not one word has been said as to the source whence all these errors spring. They have told us of errors in transcriptions, and of those alone; and yet, I will venture to say that not one error in a thousand that occur, is to be attributed to that cause. Gentlemen, in asking for so great a change, and that, too, in the constitution, should have conclusively shown where these errors arise, and that they are attributable to the present system. But they have not; and I appeal to the experience of every person acquainted at all with this subject, to say that they are almost universally made by the township officers.

There are many things that invalidate a tax title. Perhaps the officer has not given a correct description—perhaps he has not been legally elected—perhaps the returns have not been properly made, or the necessary oath of office may not have been taken; these, and a hundred other errors, all occur in the several townships. Cut off this bugbear central power, the Auditor General's office—let all taxes be closed up in the several towns—let the township officers have no power to cancel deeds given, and how else would you settle disputed titles under your tax laws but by suits in ejectment. This much dreaded central power, therefore, I esteem as highly beneficial to the people. If a township is authorized to grant deeds, when there is no one whose peculiar office it is to examine and understand the whole law on this subject, we may also expect a much greater number of invalid titles.

But gentlemen say it will bring the whole matter nearer to the people; that if it is only brought nearer to the people, all is right. This cry has been heard on almost every question of doubtful policy. I have heard it oft repeated since I came into this Convention, and I have become heartily sick of it. The people do not desire any other form of government than that we now enjoy—a republican representative government. They do not wish to have their servants, in whom they have confidence, tamely and meanly to refer every thing back to them, but manfully and nobly to do the work appointed for them. They do not desire that every town should be made a little republic, imperium in imperio. Our government is a republic, not a pure democracy.

Mr. Chairman, there must be a central power, somewhere; and really there is nothing so awful about this office of Auditor General, which gentlemen seem to fear is about to subvert all good government. Where are those that cry out against the present system of collecting taxes? We have heard one solitary voice from the wilderness—a voice from Lapeer. Where are the petitions loading your tables? Where are the public meetings? Where the voice of the press, that index of public sentiment? I must say I have not heard any complaints in my own county; and I believe the people are perfectly satisfied with the workings of the present system. I would not be understood, sir, as saying that the present system is perfect. There might be some most beneficial improvements made in it, and there are certain principles that might be introduced here, that, I believe, would be perfectly safe and productive of great and lasting benefits to this system. I will not stop to detail them now, in full, but mention that a tax deed might be made prima facie evidence of all previous proceedings, and, after a few years, absolute evidence of title in the purchaser.

But, sir, gentlemen cry "oppression," and talk of vast and unnecessary expense. These things, in vague and indefinite terms, may seem monstrous to the imagination, and fall like a dark shadow on the popular mind. I say to them, give us the facts and figures—give us the statistics on which you base your demand for this great change. Even in a Legislature, gentlemen would be laughed to scorn to urge a financial change in such a manner;—how much more deservedly here.

If you close up all taxes in the towns, you must still suffer losses; for you cannot throw all responsibility of errors on the officers, or you would have none to serve you. If, as it must be under the proposed plan, all doubtful titles were to be settled by law suits, without any power to cancel, we, of the legal profession, would certainly have no cause to complain. How would it be in Lapeer? We should there see my friend [Mr. WHITE] getting rich by the profits of these contested suits, on the one side, while my other friend from Lapeer [Mr. HART] would be enjoying the other. We, poor lawyers, should, undoubtedly, all grow sleek and fat in this new, untrodden field; but the people would pay for it, and your tax laws, after all, would be less efficient.

All the charges, so much harped upon, come out of the non-residents—the delinquent tax payers; and I care not how freely they are bled. I would pile up additional charges, and make them suffer still more; for this land monopoly by non-residents is an incubus that sits heavily upon the energies of our people; it preys upon their vitals, and retards our onward course to prosperity, more than any other one cause. But, the change proposed will, in my opinion, be productive of no good, is of doubtful policy, even as a law; and certainly never ought to find a place in this instrument. Let us reject the amendment then, at once.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I have listened with great attention to the arguments for and against the present system, and I do not think that the proposed system would work equally and just. With reference to the cancelling of deeds, you have the uniform action of one officer; and I know that, from his great experience, a large amount may be saved, that would be spent in litigation in the State. I have a case where the proof was plain that there had been an error in the assessment and return. A deed had been given. The land claimed was worth fully $1,000 to me. I might have proved it in a court of justice, but I was saved this expense by exhibiting proper proof, backed by affidavit of the Auditor General. It might be placed in other hands, and wielded with discretion; but I have not learned how. It is a strong argument in favor of the present system—that the person who has the charge of this matter can, when possession is unlawfully obtained, at once cancel the deed, instead of the rightful owner being compelled to spend time and money, and being compelled, perhaps for years, to wait the slow movements of the law. Provision should be made for the correction of errors that occur, by some competent authority, if there should be vested in the townships the power to sell land for taxes and make title, as no remedy is provided by a return to the Auditor General.

I do not go so far as the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] who says that he is sick of the talk of bringing things nearer to the people. The nearer anything is brought to the sovereign people, in my opinion, the better; and I hope that of this principle I shall ever be the advocate. I acknowledge their right to know what we do, and to rule. If these errors can be avoided, I shall be in favor of the taxes being collected in the towns. If, upon mature consideration, legal advice is found necessary, and no provision shall be made for it in the towns, I shall be in favor of continuing the power in the hands of the Auditor General, as at present. I am not disposed to leave this matter so loose as to have it subject to change and fluctuation.

It has been said that all these errors occur in the incipient stages. What remedy would there be by removing it from the Auditor's office? The errors would still exist and be as fatal. The best argument in favor of the present system is that errors in title deeds can be arranged without having recourse to the gentlemen of the law, by which usually a great deal of money is spent to little purpose; while at present the matter can be harmoniously arranged.

I disagree entirely with the gentleman [Mr. ROBERTSON] when he says we should get as much as we can from the non-residents. As they are perfectly in our power, should we have no respect for their rights? Yet, the gentleman says he wishes he could take ten times as much, and bleed them still harder than they have been. I go for equal justice—for the principle that would charge no more to the citizen of New York than to the citizen of Michigan; and that we should not charge them thirty or forty per cent., when we charge our own citizens five or ten. This practice by former Legislatures has not only retarded the growth of our State, but has greatly injured our credit. This has brought ruin and disgrace upon the institutions of our State, and the sooner we can lay a broad platform—insert in the fundamental law of the State equal justice to all—the more respectable and the richer we shall become.

I am not of the number of those who wish to confine within our own borders our sympathy, but should be glad to have it extend to the whole citizens of the United States, and other countries. Then, indeed, we shall show by our acts, what is so much prated about in words, "equal rights—justice to all."

With these remarks, made for the purpose of elucidating the matter, for the purpose of having fully drawn out the relative advantages, I shall leave it and support that system that will yield the most advantages to the people, combined with the least expense.

Why will gentlemen in this Convention contend for the rights of the foreigner as soon as they land him, and yet demand that they have the right to rob from the citizens of a neighboring State? I would give all the privileges in our power to the poor oppressed foreigner, who has fled to our land for protection from tyranny and oppression, and allow him to participate in the affairs of our government as soon as prudence would dictate. And yet I cannot go with the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] that we have the right to take more from a non-resident, who happens to be citizen of a sister State, merely because he happens to own lands within our borders. I ask, from what are the residents of this State made up? Are they not from other States? And did they not purchase before they became residents? And shall we now say, as it has been too much the disposition of former Legislatures to say, oppress the non-residents? Does not the father, who may now reside in New York or New England, purchase lands here that his sons may become residents with us? Will you attempt to oppress these men, who, if you render equal justice to them, will be among our own citizens in a short time? or will you, while proclaiming Michigan as the asylum of the oppressed, by your acts of injustice, drive them from our borders? I think this will not be the case. The time has come when our acts should speak.

Mr. J. BARTOW—The advocates of the new system do not go into details, and probably there is a good reason for it; for the moment they attempt it they find themselves surrounded with difficulties. If they make the townships independent for this purpose, if they say that the tax rolls shall be closed in the towns, if, in short, they make six hundred Auditor Generals' offices, they will find themselves involved in difficulties, for there must be a reviewing power. The towns cannot be made the last resort. Where, then, shall the power be placed? Or where, I would ask, can the central power be better placed than where it is now? If you make the county treasurer the reviewing power, you give up the principle; then you make it a mere question of expediency. We have tested some questions to the uttermost, and this is one. We placed it in the hands of the county treasurer. Did it work well? No, sir; it was a complete failure, and the present system was obliged to be substituted; and I care not how much gentlemen may endeavor to seek popularity by advocating this measure, we must have a central reviewing power, if we wish to advocate the best interests of the State. I do not wish the details unnecessarily complicated; but I consider the present system beneficial in its operations, and one that is sanctioned by public opinion. It is equal and just; and so arranged as to guard the rights of the public—the residents and the non-residents equally as well; and this will ever be the case if the Auditor General does his duty. But the system proposed must be considered impracticable, even when viewed in the most favorable light.

If the advocates of the opposite system will show how they are going to accomplish this measure, with advantage to the State and equal justice to all, they can then with more propriety, urge this Convention to efface this institution.

Mr. CRARY—I fully expected, Mr. Chairman, that the old cry would be raised: "you give no details." We can give details, but we do not want to put them in the constitution. I think that the delegate from Ingham [Mr. BUSH] has given us a good speech upon the history of taxation, and the political history of the State for the last few years; but he did not answer the argument as to the propriety of sending the returned lands to the Auditor's office. I would ask the gentlemen from Genesee and Ingham, if there is a propriety in having the lands returned, and redemption allowed at the county treasurer's office, and likewise at the Auditor's office? My friend wants to buy a piece of land; how does he know that he has a good title? He goes to the county treasurer's office, and finds it is not redeemed; and yet it may be redeemed at the Auditor's office, and no trace of the redemption at the county treasurer's office is to be found. He is therefore uncertain about the title, and has to send to the Auditor General's office to learn its condition.

Mr. BUSH—They are compared once a month.

Mr. CRARY—I allude to the redemption, not the sale. The system is so complicated that mistakes must and will occur, and the Auditor General cannot remove the defects. There may be a good title in one township, a bad one in another; good in one county, in another worth nothing. There is a defect in the system—a defect that destroys all confidence in it by the people of this State.

Mr. BUSH—How will you reform it?

Mr. CRARY—I cannot go into detail, here; but, a system can be presented, simple, safe and effectual, for the purpose of collecting taxes and giving good titles. When a man wishes to remedy an evil, and points to the example of other States, he is met with the old remark, "our circumstances are not the same as theirs." A good Legislature will compare circumstances. If a certain measure operates well elsewhere, all other things being equal, it will operate well here. I fully admit, however, that when the circumstances of the two States are different—a system of education, of judiciary and other branches of government, which would work well in one State, might not in another. What is the argument here? That you are giving too much power to the people. Yet the people are better able to manage this than the elective franchise. They can manage dollars and cents. You give them the shadow but deny them the substance.

The gentleman from Ingham says that our situation is different from the New England States, and different from that of New York. The system of New York has always been expensive, and the great effort on our part should be to cheapen the mode of government. We have cut out whole codes of laws from Massachusetts and New York, and after we found they did not answer, we cut them out again. I have no doubt that this proposed amendment will hurt the land agents. I do not know but the gentleman from Lapeer may be a land agent; but I am not, never have been, and never hope to be.

Mr. WHITE had occasionally taken charge of lands, but was not a land agent; that was not his business.

Mr. CRARY—Six States have adopted this system, and five out of the six are old States; their cases would not be analogous. It was otherwise with the State of Maine; although it was an older State, it was similarly situated to Michigan. They had old lands and new; resident and non-resident lands. The State of Maine sells her lands through the medium of her township treasurers; the whole business is closed in the townships. The townships are made responsible for the result, and, therefore, it is always correct. Here, neither the township nor the State is responsible, when the title proves defective; but it is sent back and made a charge upon the town, with increased expense, and interest added.

[Here Mr. CRARY read the law of the State of Maine.]

The system works well. They sell all the lands at the time the tax is closed up. Non-residents are treated the same as residents. Many of the non-residents in our State would probably prefer that the land titles should be closed up in the townships, because it is cheaper, and will make a better title, if you make the townships or counties responsible. The new townships and counties will have to pay money to the State, and they can do it, if you make tax titles worth something—if you give good interest for the money until redeemed. Upon this principle all the lands will sell at the time the treasurer closes his warrant. It has been said that persons will not go to the different townships; they or their agents will go if they can make money. Make the title complete except the tax has been paid; give the person fifty per cent for the use of his money, and I will engage that all the lands of the State will be sold in the townships. By pursuing this plan, whatever may be its fate in this Convention, I do not doubt that the system will be a great saving of expense to this State, and will work admirably well.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I will detain the committee a few moments in reply to some of the remarks that have fallen from gentlemen. This discussion has taken a strange turn; much better adapted to a legislative body than to this Convention. This compels me to be more digressive than I otherwise should be.

The present system of taxation has, undoubtedly, defects; and it is impossible to conceive one which shall have none. As they are discovered, instead of abolishing the system, it would be wise to come and correct them. The last remark of the gentleman from Calhoun—although, by the by, it is a strong argument against the proposition—is correct: that if inserted in the fundamental law it cannot be changed, if found impracticable, without a change of the constitution itself.

It appears to me that we cannot judge, from the experience of the old States, how the system would operate in this State, because the condition of things is not the same. Even the State of Maine, to which allusion has been made, is not similarly situated. Its population is different, its people are wealthier, its non-resident lands are less numerous, and the system is one of long usage. I apprehend few of the members would adopt this system, because it makes the towns responsible for the proper discharge of the duties of their officers. Other of the old States have adopted the same system, and none of us would be justified in imposing such burthens upon our townships.

If you throw the sale of lands delinquent for taxes into the townships, and give to it immediate effect, you cannot find purchasers for them. The amount chargeable on lands advertised for the past year was about $80,000, and the State was compelled to bid in of these lands some $32,000 worth—nearly one-half of the whole amount.

If sold in the townships, the land would be measurably beyond the reach of non-resident purchasers, and the townships, or its inhabitants, would be compelled to purchase them, and where would so large an amount of money come from? In the new counties, where there is a large body of non-resident land, it would be impossible to carry out the principle.

Mr. CRARY would ask if this $80,000 was the original amount, or the sum total after the charges had been made upon it?

Mr. McCLELLAND supposed the gentleman from Calhoun knew all about it, and therefore did not require a reply.

Another objection to this system at this time is, that many purchasers buy from year to year in order to secure tax deeds enough to render their title indisputable, and it will preclude them hereafter. The demand for this description of land is increasing, and many will probably be purchased at the next sale with a view of pursuing this course; but if this change is made, such inducement will be destroyed, and all land, not heretofore sold, will fall to the State, and the amount will be very large. Besides it will be difficult to arrange the provisions of law adapting one system to the other, so as to save the State or the land already purchased by it, and to prevent a conflict between it and the township in regard to subsequent taxes.

The gentleman from Calhoun says that when a lot of land is redeemed, that fact is only known at the Auditor General's office, and the party interested is compelled to communicate with that office to ascertain it; and this is often attended with great delay and expense. Grant it; it can be easily remedied by requiring the Auditor General to give notice of said redemptions in his monthly returns to the treasurer of the county.

An important object to be attained is uniformity in the assessment and collection of taxes over the whole State, and this can be more readily accomplished by the present than the township system. The arguments of the gentlemen from Genesee and Macomb are conclusive upon this point.

You have now a most experienced officer to attend to all the duties pertaining to your tax system—a man of large experience, perfectly familiar with all the changes that have been made in it since the organization of your State government—who has devoted much time to it, and made it a study—and is he not far more competent to superintend its operation, and make it efficient and useful, than those who, from various causes, would be able to know little about it? He can with ease point out an error which you or I would entirely overlook, or labor for months before we should discover it. The office charges are about $2,500 per annum; which covers the whole expenses of the office, except about $400, which is drawn from the treasury; so that this constitutes no ground of objection.

In 1843, the Legislature enacted a general tax law, the main features of which have been preserved until the present time. It was then urged that the system was expensive and burthensome, and the same arguments were used as are now. The most prominent objection was, that it was unjust to the non-residents; but a day or two after, a memorial was presented from the non-residents and their agents, giving their reasons at length for the adoption of the system then proposed, and stating that, although the expenses incurred were great, yet they preferred having the privilege of paying their taxes at the office of the Auditor General, to being driven into every county and township in the State.

According to the present law the township receives the first moneys collected, the county succeeds to the next, and the State receives its portion last. There is nothing in this to which the townships or counties can object. Reverse the order and the people would not submit to it. It is true the State bids off the lands not purchased by private bidders, but this places in its hands the power of sustaining the government—a most important and necessary power. Take this away, and make the State subject to townships and counties for its support, as is proposed by the amendment, and great difficulties and embarrassments are to be apprehended. At this time my own county—and many other counties are in the same condition—is on the books of the treasury department largely indebted to the State; and all the indebted counties are considered, I presume, by the State officers, as rather refractory. Place the control of the question of this indebtedness in their own hands, and the machinery of your State government would soon be out of gear.

I have a different opinion of the validity of tax titles from that expressed here. I have more confidence in them than the gentlemen from Calhoun and Lapeer.

Mr. WILLIAMS would inquire if the gentleman had ever seen a tax title maintained?

Mr. McCLELLAND would answer the question by asking another: Has the gentleman from St. Joseph known any case to have been tried since the passage of the act of 1843, and under the principle then established?

Mr. WILLIAMS—I have been requested to pay extra upon lands sold for taxes, and when I refused, the purchaser gave up his claim as worthless.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Has he tested any of them in our courts?

Mr. WILLIAMS—I have not.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I have bestowed some attention upon the subject, and I undertake to say there are good tax titles in the State, that can be sustained in a court of justice. The requirements of the statute are simple and easily understood, and there is little difficulty in complying with them. I have more confidence in the competency and sagacity of our county and township officers, than gentlemen who have addressed the committee.

Mr. WHITE—Have I said any thing against them?

Mr. McCLELLAND—The gentleman said that tax titles were worthless. Why? Because the county and township officers have not discharged their duties faithfully. What other inference can be legitimately drawn from his remarks?

By the existing law the deed is made prima facie evidence of all the proceedings, from the valuation of the land by the assessors to the date of the deed, inclusive. Under this rule of evidence it is far more difficult to contest successfully a tax title, than formerly. The burthen of proof is upon the contestant of the tax title; whereas, in most of the States, it lies with the owner of the tax title; and in consequence of the strictness in the proof required by the judges, few cases have been sustained. But, under the rule established by the Legislature, I do think the legal profession will find more difficulty in overthrowing tax titles than is generally supposed. I am aware that the opinion expressed to day, adverse to the validity of tax titles, is honestly entertained by many; and I know that it has been the cause of much evil to the State, in preventing the purchase of tax lands; but, I believe our attorneys have not had occasion to examine thoroughly the question, nor have they given a well matured opinion upon it. At all events, where I knew the county and township officers to be equal to their duties, I would venture something on a title acquired since the adoption of the principle of 1843. If these titles are defective, what would they be without the supervisory powers of the Auditor General? He promptly points out the errors, and they are generally rectified by the officers, or by your remedial and curative laws.

It has been suggested that the taxes from non-residents are not collected as soon as those of residents, and that herein the residents are oppressed. This may be true to a certain extent; but it must be admitted that the non-resident has to pay roundly for the delay. The evil, however, could be easily remedied without any change of system, by shortening the time that elapses between the return of the delinquent taxes and the sale. I would also shorten the time of redemption, and fix upon a reasonable time when the Auditor General's deed should be conclusive, unless a payment of the tax, pursuant to law, could be proved to the satisfaction of the court or jury. In this way tax titles can be made perfectly secure, and your delinquent tax lands will not have to be bid in by the State, and there will be very little delay in the collection of non-resident taxes.

The gentleman from St. Joseph [Mr. WILLIAMS] says that tax titles are worthless, and so considered. That is not so in many parts of the State. Tax title lands have been sold for large advances, and confidence is being placed in these titles, and the purchasers of them are increasing. I prefer leaving the whole subject to the judgment of the Legislature. If defects worthy their attention are brought to their notice, they will be cured. If, in the trial of causes involving the tax laws, difficulties arise relative to the assessment and collection of taxes, which require the interposition of the Legislature, the best interests of the State will induce them to act promptly. Experience points out the defects of every system, and it requires years to mature and perfect it. There is nothing so injurious as constant change, especially in so important a feature of government.

The gentleman from Lapeer [Mr. WHITE] says the people will not bear with this system any longer. Under our new constitution the representatives will be near to the people, and they will have greater control over them than heretofore; and will not the gentleman trust them, and will they not be as trustworthy as we are? I have no fear they will prove recreant to the trust reposed in them. I would willingly entrust them with any ordinary power, but not with the distribution of money or lands and things directly pertaining thereto. We are legislating too much, and I hope the committee will come to the same conclusion I have—that this subject does not belong here, but is a proper matter for the consideration and action of the Legislature.

Mr. CORNELL—I differ from my colleague with respect to this matter, because I think under our present circumstances it is impracticable. It cannot be carried out in the new counties—they cannot avail themselves of the law. I am confident, from my experience, that such would be the case. We had a law some time ago, much like the one attempted to be made now, authorizing the counties to close the tax roll; it did not work well—it will not now.

The system might work well in the older counties—it might in my county; but it would not in the new counties, because they are in the same circumstances that we were when the first law was attempted to be introduced. Monroe and Jackson could not pay their tax, and a law had to be passed releasing them from their liability. They had nothing to pay with except their lands. Would the new counties be better off now, if they could not sell their lands? As it stands now, the State is pledged to give them credit for the lands that are not sold. Even if this proposition were proper, I do not think this is the proper place to insert it. We should in this Convention assert general principles, and leave the rest to the Legislature. I am opposed to the amendment of the original proposition. I think it is out of place.

Mr. KINGSLEY—The proposition before the committee appears plausible, and I fear a majority of members may be induced to vote for it. If the measure prevails, it makes a very essential change in our system of collecting taxes—a change, the effects of which should be well understood before we venture to make it.

I will notice some of the arguments urged in favor of the change. One gentleman says that non-residents and residents should be treated alike; and, therefore, the non-resident should have the privilege of paying his tax in the township where the land lies, the same as the resident has. He has that right. The tax roll is made out and put in the hands of the collector of the township, and remains there from the first of October to the first of February, four months. This the non-resident knows, or ought to know. Why does he not pay his tax when the resident is compelled to pay his? Because he does not wish to pay; he wants the tax returned unpaid to the Auditor's office, so that he can pay all his taxes in the State at one place; for he probably owns land in different parts of the State, and it saves him travel and expense to pay where the taxes are all sent.

One gentleman has observed that it was bad that non-residents did not pay their taxes in the townships when others did. It may be bad for them; but it is doubtful if it is bad for us. On the return of the taxes unpaid, they draw fifteen per cent. interest; and after the lands are sold they draw twenty-five per cent. interest. A great part of the expense of our government is defrayed by money arising from the sale of non-resident lands, and the interest on the taxes.

Those who are in favor of changing the present system of collecting taxes, and confining the whole operation to the townships, base their arguments on the ground that the change will benefit the non-resident. By non-residents, I do not mean those only who live out of the State, but those in the State who do not reside in the townships or counties where the land lies. It is they who have always resisted a change in the law now proposed. It was they who were anxious for, and were instrumental in procuring the passage of, the present law. And they desired it because all their taxes in different parts of the State could be paid at one place. It is expensive for them; but still they prefer the present system. I have just been informed that twenty-five hundred dollars a year is paid for receipts and little services rendered in the Auditor's office for those who pay taxes there. The principle object of the State is to have the system for collecting taxes such that the money can be raised on the sale of taxed lands. It is against the interest of the State to bid off taxed land at auction at any price. A system which gives all an equal chance to bid cannot be partial; nor can that system be oppressive which is the choice of those whose lands are sold under it.

The amount of taxes which were to be raised by the sale of lands in 1847, was more than one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. That year, and since then, there have not been purchasers enough for the lands offered for sale. Much of the land has been struck off to the State. Money has been sent from other States to purchase tax lands here, and yet there has not been sufficient to purchase the lands offered. If these lands are sold in the townships, less confidence will be had in the title; and, consequently, less money will be invested in the purchase of such lands. It is evident that the few persons who buy these land—speculators, if you please to call them so—cannot attend the sales in each organized township, amounting, it is said, to near six hundred. But, it is said, individuals in the townships will bid off the lands. They might do it in the old counties, but not in the new. There has not been and will not be money to be spared to do it. If they would buy the lands sold in the new counties, why do they not come here to the office and purchase them of the State?

Again, it is the practice under the present tax system, to correct as far as possible all errors in the assessments and returns; and even after a deed has been given upon a sale, there is power given to the Auditor General to cancel the deed, if an error be discovered in the previous proceedings.

The present system has been in operation some twelve years, and it has been from time to time improved, so that no State has a better system. It is now proposed to change this system, and have the whole business done by the township treasurer—an officer who is changed every year—who keeps no office, no books of record—whose only paper is his tax roll.

which he carries in his pocket. He is a sort of walking treasury—a perambulating office, through which it is proposed to pass all titles given on the sale of taxed lands. This change would compel you to go into each township to look for incumbrances on land in that township; an inconvenience hardly tolerable.

But, it is said that the present system is expensive—that the transferring, transcribing and advertising taxes costs much. Who pays this expense? The non-residents. The expense is not paid by the people at large. They have no reason to complain of the expense. It is paid by those whose lands are taxed and sold, and who prefer the present system to the one proposed. I hope no change will be made in the system.

The amendment of Mr. WHITE was lost. Mr. BUTTERFIELD's proposed section was not adopted.

Mr. BUSH moved to add a new section, as follows:

Sec. 15. Any tax deed given for land returned and sold as delinquent for taxes, shall be conclusive evidence of the legality of all the proceedings prior to and including the sale; and any suit in ejectment for the recovery of said land shall be commenced within five years from the date of said deed, and not thereafter, unless the original tax, upon which the deed was predicated, had been paid.

Mr. TIFFANY—The meaning is, if any person wants the use of another person's property without paying for it, he can have it.

Mr. BUSH—There is a change with regard to the rules of evidence.

Mr. WILLIAMS—But there is one class who will not know the rules of evidence—all that large class composed of minors, who succeed to land by inheritance; small landholders, who reside in distant States, who have trusted to dishonest agents, and ignorant or negligent men, whose all consists of a single eighty acre lot—all this class may fall into the clutches of the professional sharks scattered over your State, whose sole study is to obtain, without earning, other men's property. I fear this large class will hardly understand the rules of evidence. This kind of persons are the sufferers by an erroneous and cruel system of taxation. They suffer from its exactions; they feel its injustice; they are incensed by its cruelty. Rob such a victim under your present complicated, tedious and extortionate system of taxation, and you may ruin him. The least you do is to alienate him, discourage him, and perhaps drive him from your State.

It is an idle and ridiculous idea that the excessive costs and impositions of the present system fall on the large non-resident landholders. They generally pay on system, and pay economically. They hold their land agent to a strict accountability, and he fears to try any experiment on them. If their land is sold, the purchaser surrenders it without contest, knowing and fearing his antagonist. These titles have had, under the present system, so little of the public confidence, that they are rarely set up seriously against those who show the ability and determination to resist them. But it is far different with the young man; the inexperienced, friendless poor man, and perhaps a stranger and ignorant of the law. Not able to cope with legal men, and designing heartless men, they submit to be fleeced—perhaps shake the dust of your State from their feet in disgust, and seek some other State, where they can find more sympathy, and institutions tempered and administered with justice, and where the government does not descend from its high dignity to fill its coffers with petty pilferings. No sir, where one large non-resident landholder pays one dollar as tribute to the present system, the innocent, deserving, industrious poor man pays fifty.

Mr. TIFFANY thought that if the Convention wished to establish the principle that one man might take the property of another without paying for it, they had better establish this principle. It would be a temptation to every agent to become a villain—families might be swept of their all; and he considered the evils so manifold and great, that he hoped the Convention would not entertain the proposition for a moment.

The section offered by Mr. BUSH was lost.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following as a substitute for section 1:

Sec. 1. All specific taxes shall be applied in paying the interest upon the primary school, university and other educational funds, and of the balance of the State debt, in the order herein recited, until the first of January, eighteen hundred and —, at which time said specific taxes shall be added to, and forever thereafter constitute a part of, the proceeds of the primary school funds.

Mr. BRITAIN also offered the following as an addition to the article, viz:

Sec. 15. Every act making an appropriation not expressly provided for by this constitution, shall contain a provision for the necessary State tax to meet such appropriation, and a statement of the year or years in which said tax is to be levied; and said act shall, before it shall take effect, be submitted to the people at a general election, or at the annual township meetings, and be approved by a majority of all the votes given for and against it at said election or annual township meetings.

Sec. 16. All lands sold for the non-payment of taxes, even though sold by a county officer, shall be sold in the township in which they are situated.

Sec. 17. Every assessment roll upon which the resident taxes have been paid, and which has been returned by the collector, shall, with said return, be conclusive evidence of the legality of all taxes therein contained, and of every thing pertaining to said taxes, except as against errors contained in said roll, and receipts for payment of taxes returned as unpaid.

Sec. 18. The Legislature may provide by law as follows:

1st. That a deed given by any legally authorized person to a purchaser of real estate, sold for non-payment of taxes, shall be prima facie evidence of title to such real estate.

2d. That peaceable possession of real estate by any person whose title thereto shall be based upon a tax title thereof, for such time as the Legislature shall prescribe, not less than six nor more than ten years, shall be conclusive evidence of title thereto.

3d. That no person whose title to real estate shall be based upon a tax deed made after the first of January, eighteen hundred and fifty —, shall be ejected therefrom until he be fully paid for all improvements thereon, either made or purchased by him.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved that it be printed. Carried.

Mr. ALVORD moved that the gentleman from Berrien have leave to print whatever he chooses, and let the committee rise.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the same back to the Convention, and asked and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the Convention adjourned until Monday morning, at 8 o'clock.

MONDAY, (42d day,) July 29.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MERRILL.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. WARDEN: of Sarah McCamley and 43 other ladies of Brighton, Livingston county, praying the Convention to prohibit the sale of ardent spirits, except for medicinal or mechanical purposes, after the first day of January, 1854.

Referred to select committee upon the subject.

By the PRESIDENT: of the officers and other members of the Detroit City Guards, that the provision in article 10, section 4, of the present constitution, in relation to money paid "by persons as an exemption from military duty," may be rescinded, and for other encouragement to volunteer companies.

Laid upon the table.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. McCLELLAND submitted the following substitute for section 2, of the article entitled "Judicial Department."

"For the term of six years, and thereafter until the Legislature shall otherwise provide, the Judges of the several Circuit Courts shall be Judges of the Supreme Court, three of whom shall constitute a quorum, and a concurrence of a majority of judges present shall be necessary to a decision. The Legislature shall have power, if they should think expedient and necessary, to provide by law for the organization of a separate Supreme Court, with the jurisdiction and powers prescribed in this constitution, to consist of one Chief Justice and two Associate Justices, to be elected by the qualified electors of the State. The separate court, when so organized, shall not be changed or discontinued by the Legislature for six years after its organization. The judges thereof shall be so classified that but one of them shall go out of office at the same time; and their term of office shall be the same as is provided for the Judges of the Circuit Court."

Which, on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the article entitled "Legislative Department" was taken from the table.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention was resolved into a committee of the whole on the article entitled "Finance and Taxation," Mr. MASON in the chair.

The article was taken up for consideration, and the chairman of that committee being absent,

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. TIFFANY, the Convention was then resolved into a committee of the whole on the article entitled "Judicial Department," Mr. Cook in the chair.

Section 1 having been read,

Mr. BAGG moved to insert after "circuit courts," in line 1, the words "county courts;" which motion did not prevail.

Mr. SULLIVAN moved to insert after "circuit courts," the words "in county judges;" which motion was disagreed to.

Sec. 2. The supreme court shall consist of three Judges, two of whom shall form a quorum, and the concurrence of two shall be necessary to every decision. A Judge dissenting from a decision shall give his reason for such dissent in writing.

Mr. MASON moved to strike out "three" in the first line, and insert "four," and also "two" in lines one and three, and insert "three."

Mr. M. said the object of the amendment was to get a decision of three judges in concurrence. The people would have more confidence where the decision was so sustained.

Mr. GOODWIN said he concurred fully with the views suggested by the gentleman from St. Clair, [Mr. MASON.] He thought, for a court of last resort, four judges would be the best number that could be had. In a last decision, there are two objects to be attained. First, the particular case to be decided, and the question of law to be settled, not merely for that case, but for cases which may arise subsequently.

In a court of four judges, a majority would be three, a larger number proportionably than in any other number you can propose. A majority of three to one will probably settle a principle permanently. In case of an equal division, the decision of the court below would be sustained; but it would not settle the question in future cases.

There is another consideration which should be kept in mind in relation to a court of last resort—the responsibility of each individual in the decision which has to be made. If you have a large number, you fritter the responsibility of each away. A tribunal should not be so large but that each judge should feel the weight of individual responsibility; and yet a majority of that body should be able to settle the question of law in all future cases.

The only objection is the expense. Now, when we are organizing one of the separate and distinct departments of the government, the salary of one additional judge is but as a drop in the bucket. The expense, he [Mr. G.] hoped the Convention would not regard. Evils have existed which call loudly for their correction. If they would be corrected, the pay of one additional judge would not be of importance.

Mr. CRARY said the arguments were altogether in favor of striking out, so far as giving character to the court was concerned. The only question before the committee was the expense. You cannot get, in fact, so large and decisive a majority on any case on which they decide, as it must be—three to one. It is certain that a court consisting of four judges must be better than one consisting of three; the question of expense is the only one of consideration. He would state that such was the constitution of the courts of Great Britain. Four judges are appointed to each court; although additional judges have been put on the bench, only four are allowed to sit in banc on appeals from their decision.

Mr. BACKUS said—Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that no subject of greater importance can be brought before this Convention, than the organization of that independent arm of the government, the Judiciary; and whatever would procure the disposition of cases in a speedy manner, and such as would attain and maintain the confidence of the people, is, of all others, of the most importance. No other number for a court of last resort can be indicated in which a greater strength of opinion can be obtained than four.

It is of the greatest importance that in a court of final resort, the people should have confidence in their decisions. In a court of three, the judgment may be affirmed in the opinions of two. In a court of four it must stand three to one. If three do not concur, the decision of the court below is confirmed. The courts, both in England and America, have uniformly adopted that number, as giving a greater strength of opinion than any other number can do. As our population is increasing, the business of our courts is increasing. The business of municipal courts will have to be reviewed in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court being composed of four judges, you have three-fourths to alter the decision.

The object of courts is to have an end of litigation. It is to be presumed the people will put proper men there; but it is the nature of men to quarrel with decisions made against them; and it is proper that they should not change a decision without such a number as will give strength to their decision.

The only question is that of expense. I hope the people will not object to a correct principle on account of the paltry matter of the salary of a single judge. As it is of vast importance that the opinion of the Supreme Court should have weight in the community, and as the constitution will last a long time, I trust the amendment will prevail.

Mr. MASON's amendment was adopted.

Mr. BACKUS moved to insert after "decision," in second line: "the majority of the judges shall give their opinion in every case in writing, under their signatures."

Mr. B. said he would state the object of the amendment. Our past experience in the State had been this: our Supreme Court has consisted of five judges. How the practice had been, he was not prepared to say; but opinions have been delivered by a single judge, and other judges have remarked that it was not their decision—that they had never heard of it.

My object in this provision (said Mr. B.) is, that the judges shall see it and know it before it is decided, and that their responsibility shall be impressed upon the court. That in any question the reputation of the court shall not be called in question by disclaiming either the reasons for, or the grounds of, their decision. If they dissent, let them give their reasons; they are entitled to weight. I should wish to see the opinion of all the judges—both the majority and the minority—on concurring or dissenting.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following as a substitute for the section:

"The Supreme Court shall consist of four judges, a majority of whom shall form a quorum, and a majority shall be necessary to any decision. A judge dissenting from a decision shall give his reasons for such dissent in writing, under his own signature."

Mr. WHITEMORE said this alteration would allow two Supreme Court judges to decide a case when a majority of the court was sitting. He was opposed to the proposition.

Mr. BRITAIN said he had no anxiety to have the amendment adopted, unless it should be considered proper. He had offered it for the purpose of ascertaining whether we are to have a practicable or an impracticable court. If four judges be present, it requires three to make a decision. This appears to be well enough; but if only three are present, the question presents itself, shall it either require the unanimous opinion of the whole court, which, perhaps, it may be impossible to obtain, or permit one dissenting judge, in effect, to make a decision of the Supreme Court, with two out of three judges against it? It is desirable that a majority should give a decision, because then you can always get a decision. There may be reasons which would render it proper that it should be rejected, but I cannot see them. My opinion is, that a majority of the court should be able to make a decision.

Mr. BACKUS said he should regret to see that arrangement made, if he understood it correctly, because he thought it would be improper. The object to be sought is, to terminate litigation in the inferior courts; and a less number than a majority should not reverse the decision of an inferior court. It would be better in the case of such a contingency as the necessary absence of one of the judges, that the case should go over, than that two should reverse the decision of the inferior court. He should regret to see any less number than a majority of the whole court be able to reverse decisions made by inferior courts.

Mr. TIFFANY—As the section now stands, it requires three judges to make a decision. It seems to me that some amendment is necessary, because three judges may never agree; and a case should not be hung up until they should be brought to concur in opinion. In case they cannot concur, a judgment should be directed confirming the decision of the inferior court; and in the case of four judges, and only two agreeing, the judgment below should be confirmed.

The substitute was not adopted.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the word "final" was inserted before "decision," wherever it occurs in line 2.

Mr. McCLELLAND renewed his motion to strike out section 2, and insert the substitute he had offered this morning.

Mr. McC. said—Mr. Chairman, I approach the discussion of this question with diffidence, because it is one with which I do not claim to be as familiar as I should be to enlighten the committee. But, as we are called upon to change our old system, and adopt one entirely new to our people, I will submit some remarks in opposition to it, and in favor of the amendment which I have deemed it my duty to propose.

The article reported establishes a Supreme Court separate from and independent of the Circuit Courts. The amendment proposed blends the two, and continues the union for at least six years; giving to the Legislature at the expiration of that time the power of adopting the "independent Supreme Court system." Thus far the arguments of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] in favor of the latter, have not been answered; nor, in my opinion, can they be successfully. Neither the ingenuity of the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] nor the legal learning of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BACKUS,] has overthrown them.

Sir, it will be admitted that the judicial business of the State has rapidly diminished—that the amount is not so great now as formerly. During and subsequent to the great financial pressure that pervaded this Union a few years ago, and crushed to the earth the people of this State; and the system of banking which was unfortunately adopted here, the terrible effects of which will not soon be forgotten, litigation was much increased; the halls of justice were constantly filled with suitors, and it was morally impossible for the force on the bench to dispatch all the business promptly; yet, even then there was very little complaint. As public opinion becomes enlightened, the business habits of the people settled and fixed, and our laws stable, there will not be so much litigation in proportion to the business and population of the State. Hereafter we shall have less legislation, fewer changes in our general laws, and not so many important innovations as heretofore.

The older a State grows, and the better established its institutions and laws, the more judicial business decreases; such is the experience of all in most of the States. This ought to be the case here, and with the exception of commercial points, I have no doubt it will be so.

Within a few years past the practice and pleadings in our courts have been much simplified, and the progress of reform is still going on. On the law side, radical changes have been made, and the proceedings are perhaps as simple as in any other State of the Union. My own impression is, that the same course ought to be pursued with our chancery proceedings. They should be assimilated, as far as practicable, to the other, and the law and equity united to as great an extent as possible. There is no good reason why, between the same parties, law proceedings should be prosecuted to a final termination, and that not till then a resort should be had by the party having an equitable defence to the chancery side of the same court, when in very many cases the whole might, with almost equal convenience, and without the same delay, cost or expense, be prosecuted together, and the judge decide the whole matter in dispute at once, upon its true merits.

Many wholesome changes might be made, which would tend to lighten the burthens of litigation, deprive judicial proceedings of unnecessary technicalities, enlarge, instead of cramping, the minds of the legal profession, and secure to our citizens a decision of cases entirely upon their merits. The ends of justice are to be attained. The old systems of practice and pleadings have been too complex and intricate to accomplish this object. If such substantial reforms as are required were made, it would diminish vastly the business of our courts. Can it be done? I believe it can without difficulty. An erroneous idea pervades some sections of our State, and has taken hold of the minds of some of the members of this Convention, that these things have been prevented by sending lawyers into our legislative halls. It is a common remark that the "bad laws" were drafted or pressed through by them. This is a grave charge, and one that is too generally believed. I freely admit that there have been, here and elsewhere, members of the legal profession elevated to that and other offices, who come properly within the description of a distinguished Irish orator, "like drowned bodies, while ought of soundness remained they were left sunk at the bottom, but becoming buoyant with putrefaction, they rose as they rotted." Such men are to be avoided, no matter in what class or profession they are found, and it is unjust and unfair to judge of a whole body by the character and conduct of these unprincipled knaves. No State was ever injured by having in its Legislature a fair proportion of those who are worthy and able members of that profession. There are many in it who are good, honest and true, and would be ornaments to any profession or calling in any State. Send such to legislate for you, and my word for it, the people will not complain of their actions. They are not opposed to useful reform, and knowing the defects in the present system, would willingly aid in speedily and permanently curing them. But because a few unworthy members have crept into office and grossly abused the trust confided to them, do not denounce one of the highest and most honorable professions in the land.

The gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] says the duties of the circuit judge conflict with his duties as a judge of the Supreme Court, and vice versa; and that they interfere too much with each other. Such should not be the case. If the fact be so, it cannot be properly ascribed to the system itself, but to the judges. It may be that they have not properly arranged and systematized their circuits and courts. If the system is properly chargeable with the evils of which he has spoken, why has it not been discovered in those States where it has existed for many years, and given satisfaction to all who were interested in it? So far from objections being raised to it there, it is considered and respected as a most useful and admirable system. Having been tested for a long series of years, and answered well the purposes for which it was intended, it is strange that it should have operated so badly in this State, as the gentleman from Oakland charges.

Again, he would require the Supreme Court to be held twice annually in each circuit, and would, as he claims, in this way save great expense to lawyers and clients. This is not consistent with my views. The court should meet at two or three of the most eligible and prominent points in the State, where the judges could have the advantages all courts of dernier resort should possess. Of what consequence is it to the bar or the people to have it truly a traveling court, as the gentleman would have it—hearing causes argued where probably law libraries are very limited, and where, after the arguments were closed, they would from absolute necessity be compelled to adjourn to some place where they could have access to the authorities cited, and others which they might be disposed to examine. I would consult, to a reasonable extent, the convenience of the bar, but would it not be desirable for them to have the court held where they, themselves, would not have to rely on briefs prepared from scanty libraries, but could resort to large and more voluminous and valuable ones. The time will come when we shall not labor under this disadvantage, but it would be disingenious not to admit that it exists now. What occurs in this respect at the present time? The Supreme Court, (if I am not misinformed,) holds its sessions at different points in the State, but in the most important cases, the judges are constrained to postpone their decisions until they arrive in Detroit, where they can consult authorities pertaining to the principles involved and discussed. Therefore I conclude it would save time, trouble and expense, and give greater satisfaction to the bar and persons interested, to have the cases that are taken into the Supreme Court, argued and decided where such necessary facilities for the dispatch of business, and correct and prompt decisions exist.

Gentlemen contend that if the circuit judges discharge Supreme Court duties, it will require a force of at least ten judges at present, which must in a short time be increased to fifteen. In this I do not concur. I believe seven good, competent, industrious judges will perform all the necessary labors of the Circuit and Supreme Courts, and dispatch promptly, and to the satisfaction of the suitors and those interested, all the business of both courts. The business of the Circuit Courts has been facilitated by recent legislative enactments. The proceedings are expedited, and there is not so much machinery and delay as formerly. If the reforms introduced at the time the county court system was adopted had been applied exclusively to the old system, all the business might have been disposed of by the circuit judges. There never has been a fair trial of the merits of the system in this State. So long as it accomplishes its object in other States, I think gentlemen must attribute the evils they complain of to some other cause than the system itself. In New York and Massachusetts, and other States, it is not a mere experiment, but a system fully and fairly tried, and the profession is almost without exception warmly attached, and the people as much wedded to it. And yet the discovery has been made here that it is a very bad and a very unpopular system. What symptom of its unpopularity has been manifested? Certainly there are few indications of it exhibited here; and if you search the journals and records of our Legislatures, you will find as few there. I contend that it is necessary that the supreme judges discharge circuit duties to prepare them for the correct decision of cases in banc. There may be exceptions to the rule, but they do not show the rule itself to be incorrect. They ought to mingle and come in contact with the people; see causes tried in the circuit courts; become intimately acquainted with all the business relations of life, and be constantly acquiring a knowledge of the world, in order to make them competent to discharge such high duties. One of the provinces of this court is, to give construction to the statutes and acts passed by the Legislature. Often their decisions, in effect, make law for our citizens, which becomes the rule and guide of their action. I must not be misunderstood as saying that they usurp the powers conferred solely on the Legislature. My meaning must be obvious; but to make it more clear and explicit I will give an illustration: A law is passed by the Legislature, the members thereof intending that it should have a particular meaning, but expressing it in such ambiguous language as makes the sense obscure. The proper construction of it is doubted, and finally a case based upon it is taken to the Supreme Court for adjudication. It decides that the language used, according to legal, and often plain, common sense interpretation, conveys a different idea entirely from that which may have been intended. In 1840 a law was passed relative to costs and fees. The intention was to supersede by it the law upon the same subject, which was said to be very oppressive. This intention was publicly expressed by those who proposed it, and every one who voted for it so understood it. After the Legislature adjourned, the question whether it repealed the old law was submitted to some of the judges at the circuits, who decided that it was cumulative; and costs were afterwards taxed under both laws. The object of the Legislature was to diminish costs and fees, but by the manner in which the law was drafted, according to the construction of the court, they were augmented. In many of that class of cases the court must establish, for the good of society, a rule; and it is therefore of great importance they should have the necessary knowledge and information to be competent to do it.

The system proposed as a substitute for that under consideration, is similar in many respects to that of the United States. Nearly all familiar with the operations of that system bear testimony to its worth; and there are at the present day no advocates for its unqualified change. The slightest advance towards it creates alarm and distrust in the public mind. In 1848 an effort was made to relieve the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States for a short time from the necessity of attending any of the terms of the Circuit Court, in order that they might have more time to devote to the discharge of their duties as Judges of the Supreme Court. It was said the calendar was burthened with cases, and there was no other possible method of speedily disposing of them. It was looked upon by many with suspicion, and as an entering wedge to the final and complete separation of the Circuit from the Supreme Court. All who spoke to the question deprecated this, and admitted the importance of the judges discharging circuit duties. Those in favor of the temporary relief placed it wholly on the ground of the immediate and pressing necessity of the case. After a most spirited debate in the Senate, it was defeated. The sentiments of one of the Senators, and a distinguished jurist, [Mr. Badger,] are so applicable, and so forcibly and eloquently expressed, that I beg leave to read extracts to the committee from his speech. He said "it is absolutely essential that judges of every court of last resort should be judges constantly in the habit of trying causes in the court below." In the most emphatic terms he condemned this independent system of judges, "not seeing the rules of evidence practically applied to the cases before them—not seen by the people of the United States—not known and recognized by them—not touching them, as it were, in the administration of their high office—not felt and understood, and realized as part and parcel of this great popular government—but sitting here alone—becoming philosophical and speculating in their inquiries as to the law—unseen final arbiters of justice—issuing their decrees, as it were, from a secret chamber—moving invisibly amongst us, as far as the whole community is concerned—and losing, in fact, the ability to discharge their duties, as well as that responsive confidence of the people, which adds so essentially to the sanction of all the acts of the officers of the government." Now, sir, every man of experience, whose mind is not biased by interest or prejudice, must concur in the views of that distinguished Senator.

Mr. HANSCOM—He was John Tyler's Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. McCLELLAND—He was Secretary of the Navy—but I care not whether under Gen. Harrison, Mr. Tyler, or any other President—it could not detract from his ability as a lawyer. No one, whose opinion is worthy of note, will say that he is not one of the ablest lawyers in the Senate. But I rely not merely on his character as a jurist on this question, but on the intrinsic force and the truth of his remarks. His opinions were expressed before the whole Senate, and I believe no one attempted to controvert them on this point.

This was not the first time this subject was brought before Congress. The contest was commenced under the elder Adams. The two courts were separated, and the connection that had before existed was severed. But the independent system was of short duration. The popular feeling was against it; and by the influence of public opinion the old system was soon restored.

Mr. GOODWIN—Was that on account of the midnight judges?

Mr. McCLELLAND—Suppose it was; how does that effect the case, and why has the system been permitted to remain ever since undisturbed?

The question, it is true, was agitated under the administration of John Quincy Adams, in 1825, and another effort was made to separate the two courts. It was met with firmness; and after a severe struggle and most mature consideration, the scheme was signally defeated. Here, then, we have a model, the admiration of distinguished jurists, sanctioned by most of the ablest statesmen of our country, and relied upon by the people as one of their best and safest institutions—against which not a murmur is heard. Is it to be rejected by us?

In England it has always been considered necessary that judges of the king's bench, common pleas and exchequer, should discharge nisi prius duties. The duties and powers of our circuit judges are more comprehensive, yet the reason why the duties are discharged by both classes of judges is the same. The experience of England on a question of this kind should not be disregarded by us. The decisions of her courts are very able, and their authority generally binding in all our courts. The ability, learning and experience of their judges will not be questioned; and they are, with but few exceptions, schooled in the nisi prius courts.

In the State of New York, previous to the adoption of the constitution of 1821, the major part of the most important of the judicial business was done by one chancellor and five supreme judges holding Circuit Courts, and being revisors of the legislation of the State. They kept the docket clear, besides attending to their other duties. This system was changed in 1821, not because there was any complaint against the judges, as such, nor on account of any objection to the system, but on the ground that they meddled too much with the politics of the State. This created an excitement; the judges became politically unpopular, and the system was abolished to atone for the political sins of which the judges were charged to have been guilty. If the charge of log-rolling, which has been made here, be true, this may be the cause of the unpopularity of our system in the eyes of those now opposing it. I hope they will separate the judges from the system itself, and not abuse it because the judges do not satisfy them.

In Massachusetts a similar system has obtained for many years, and met the decided approbation of the bar and the people of that State. You hear not a whisper against it. Even there they do not consider it too democratic. Of the superiority of the system we can judge from the reports of the decisions made by the judges. I ask gentlemen on the other side where are there such uniformly good and standard decisions as those of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the State of New York previous to 1822, and the State of Massachusetts? You find them in nearly every law library, no matter how small, and they are almost invariably cited in all the courts of the country as good authority.

If you will recur to the debates of the Convention of the State of New York, in 1846, you will find a great unanimity of opinion among the jurists that were in it upon this subject. I do not remember that one of them dissented from the general expression that the judges of the court of last resort should discharge, or should have discharged, circuit duties. It is true the Convention adopted a compromise plan. But, even now, four of the judges are fresh from the circuits.

The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. BACKUS] inquires why the independent judges—supposing they are confined to their closets—become more technical and speculative than others? This is a strange question to be propounded by one of his experience. What do men who confine themselves to their books, and do not mingle with the people, know of the world? How can they obtain that knowledge which every man should possess to discharge his duties faithfully to his country and his fellow men? Take any professional man who confines himself to his closet and devotes all his time to study, what will he know of the world around him? This is the observation of every practical man; and I am amazed that a gentleman of his sagacity should have made such an inquiry.

It may with safety be urged that more talent and judicial capacity are required in the judges of the circuits than of the Supreme Court. There all the characteristics of a good judge are brought into requisition. In the Supreme Court cases are usually well argued. The lawyers take time to examine the principles of law, applicable to the case, and prepare briefs. After the cause is submitted, if any important principles are involved, the court takes its own time to decide and give its opinion. But in the Circuit Court, questions of great magnitude frequently arise in the trial of a cause, and the attorneys engaged cannot be prepared to elucidate them. The judge must decide promptly, and has very little time given for reflection or examination. There are comparatively few cases taken to the Supreme Court from the circuits. The Circuit Courts decide finally a very large majority of the cases tried, and hence the necessity of placing the best judges there. The people are more intimately connected with them, and more benefitted by them, if confidence is reposed in the courts over which they preside.

In the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, the judge of the Supreme Court, in whose circuit those States lie, seldom presides. The cases are tried before the district judge, and what is the consequence? Why, although he is considered an able man, the number of cases taken thence into the Supreme Court is double as many as those of the great State of New York. This is undoubtedly owing to the absence of the Supreme Court judge. A mere name sometimes has a charm. Every body has such a regard for the Supreme judicial tribunal of the United States, and of a State, that more respect is generally paid to one of its judges than to one of an inferior tribunal. His opinion may not be as sound as that of any other jurist or judge, but still it is the opinion of one of the judges of the court of last resort. From this we may with propriety argue that, by the independent system, more cases would be taken up than by the other, and we think this position will not be controverted. It must be admitted, and we might safely say the number will in all probability be doubled, perhaps quadrupled. Who will be benefitted by this increased resort to the Supreme Court? Certainly neither the suitor nor the people. I would not say any thing that could by possibility be tortured into any imputation upon the legal profession; but I may be permitted to say that, in my judgment, they alone would be benefitted by this system.

Under the system in New York which superseded that which existed previous to 1821, the cases accumulated so rapidly that the bar and the people finally determined to abolish it and adopt a different one—one that in some respects is similar to our own. If gentlemen will examine the speech of Mr. Hoffman, they will find this enormous increase of cases assigned as one of the most prominent causes for calling that convention.

It is a matter worthy our inquiry, how long this Supreme Court will probably be necessarily in session during the year. Mr. Hoffman stated in the New York Convention that the court of last resort there, should not be in session more than three months; and surely the legal business of this State must be small in comparison with the judicial business of that State. I have examined the reports of the Supreme Court of this State, and if we are to judge from them, they have decided annually about twenty-nine cases. Judging from the character of these cases, one would suppose they would not have consumed much time, examination or reflection.

In 1844, the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States were relieved from attending one term in every year of the Circuit Court. The time for the commencement of the sessions of the Supreme Court was also changed from the second Monday in January to the first Monday in December. Before, they sat about ninety days; now, about five months. Then, they decided about fifty cases; now, no more. And it was the opinion of Governor Ashley and Mr. Badger, publicly expressed in the Senate of the United States, that they should have decided one hundred and forty. The less men have to do, the less they will generally do.

But, how is the time of our Supreme Courts sometimes occupied? There is no limit established in this State to the arguments of counsel, and little restriction upon them. It is said that in the Supreme Court of the United States an attorney consumed a whole day in proving that the people were sovereign; and the next, that therefore they had a right to form their own constitution. Is such a waste of time to be permitted? And yet, if I am not misinformed, the time of some of our courts is as unprofitably employed. Is it uncommon for some of our lawyers to talk to our Supreme Court as if the judges were ignorant of the elementary principles of law? A gentle rebuke occasionally from the court might perhaps not be amiss; and an intimation that being elevated to that high station, should be considered proof that they knew something, might be of service to some of the profession. They should do business in a business like manner, and not let extreme courtesy interfere with the faithful discharge of their duties.

If the independent system be adopted, the time has not arrived when it can be carried into successful operation. The bar of this State is most respectable. In the profession, in the aggregate, there is much legal acumen, ability, practical knowledge and integrity, but it must be confessed there are few really distinguished lawyers in the State. If we look around us, we will find but a small number among us who we believe would make good supreme judges. There are many young men who are rapidly rising in the profession, and with practice and experience will be its ornaments. Train and school them in your circuits, and you may ere long have the material. A man may be a distinguished lawyer, and yet be entirely unfit for the bench. His disposition, temperament, turn of mind and habit of thought, may disqualify him. To be a good judge requires a combination of qualities rarely to be found.

If you establish your independent system, is there no danger that jealousies will be excited and grow up between the circuit and supreme judges. The Supreme Court reverses the opinions of the circuit judges, wounds their pride—they are dissatisfied and believe they are as competent judges as those of the Supreme Court; and this may often be the case. They mingle with the bar and the people, and if so disposed, can readily create a sympathy in their favor. This feeling would be increased by the aspirations of the circuit judges. Their ambition would be to supplant the others, and such being their aim, might they not adopt the means that would be at hand, and under ordinary circumstances how many of your independent judges would be re-elected?

The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. BACKUS] speaks of "judicial sympathy," which is a mere creature of his imagination. But he made a grave charge, and one that deserves notice. He said that the "log-rolling system" had sometimes been used in the Supreme Court. Now, I know the men who constitute that tribunal, and have had and still have too much respect for it to credit this assertion. The respect which each must have for his own character must preclude such an idea. I have been credibly informed that the judges of that court most scrupulously avoid taking part in cases decided by themselves upon their respective circuits.

How does the gentleman account for the many decisions of the circuit judges that have been overruled by the Supreme Court? I understand that at its recent session at Jackson, more were added to the list, and this shows clearly that occasionally at least the judges lose their "judicial sympathy" and "pride of opinion." In my judgment, if the judge making a decision which comes under the review of the Supreme Court, has any delicacy of feeling, or a correct idea of his duties, he will not participate in the decision of that court. But I place no confidence in such charges, and will dwell no longer upon them.

It is said there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with our judicial system existing among the people. As I observed before, it is not with the circuit system, or it has not come to my knowledge. But admit that it is so—can it not be accounted for? Suppose some of the members of the bar become dissatisfied with the opinions of the judges; they can easily produce excitement and discontent. The gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] says the fault is not with the judges; that they are arduous in their labors and discharge their duties faithfully. In this he is fair and magnanimous; but it does not coincide with the opinions of others who have addressed the committee; and from what they have said we would be induced to believe that many of the bar are dissatisfied with the judges themselves. If it were otherwise, there would be no difficulty in sustaining the judges and the system, because there is not much discontent among the people; and we may say what we please, the influence of the legal profession is felt and strongly felt everywhere. Let it manifest a favorable feeling towards the judges if they entertain it, and all will be well.

The article under consideration fixes the independent system and places it beyond the reach of legislative action. Adopt it and you will increase the expenses of the State without any corresponding benefit. The expense has little to do with the question, for our object should be to establish a good judiciary system, let the cost be what it may. But I would not throw away one in which I had confidence, for another more expensive and less useful. Make your circuit judge work, and there is no danger of the judicial business of the State being delayed or retarded. But take the other plan, and you will have an independent set of judges upon your supreme bench, which will soon be denominated the "sleepy court," having but little of their time occupied; and a set of circuit judges who will in a few short years look upon themselves and be looked upon as "inferior judges." After the expiration of the first term, and perhaps sooner, few men who are competent to discharge such duties can be induced to occupy their places. Adopt the amendment, and if one system, after a fair trial, does not answer, the other may be substituted for it. In the meantime, the suitors and the people will have the benefit of all the talent, learning and experience that will be in the Circuit and Supreme Courts.

Mr. HANSCOM said—Mr. President, I do not rise to advocate at this time the adoption of the report of the majority of the judiciary committee, of which I leave the honor to be a member. I may do so before this question shall come to a final vote. I stated the other day very briefly my reasons for favoring the system reported by that committee, as contradistinguished from the one now in existence—proposed, as it is now proposed, to enlarge it—in short, to diffuse and extend an acknowledged evil.

But, sir, I must proceed to meet and, as far as I can, answer the arguments of gentlemen who assume that the system we advocate will operate prejudicially to the interests of the people of the State.

First, the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] assumes that the judicial business of the State is on the decrease, and that it will continue to grow less for years to come. I say, sir, the fact is different; and I appeal to every member of the bar, and to every gentleman on this floor, who knows anything of the business in the courts of this State, to join me in the refutation of the statement. I concede that the years 1836, '37 and '38, and perhaps '39 and '40, were years prolific in furnishing business for our courts. The era of speculation passed away, and business has assumed its ordinary channels; and under this salutary influence we have had the opportunity of seeing the workings of the proposed system, under an ordinary state of affairs—such as will exist in all coming time, except when deranged by the wild and speculative mania incident to every business and commercial country. Now, sir, for the past six or eight years, it is matter of fact that litigation has been on the increase in our State; and who doubts but that the increase will continue so long as our commercial prosperity is unimpeded? The history of every civilized State and government, in ancient or modern times, most fully demonstrates the truth of this assumption. But, says the gentleman from Monroe, the practice is too intricate—too much special pleading. Now, why not try all cases, says he, on the merits? I ask him, why not? And this state of things complained of has existed or grown up under your present judicial system, and to remedy this glaring evil it is proposed to continue this very system. I have seldom listened to more far-fetched or extraordinary propositions. Unite equity and law—get rid of all technicalities, says the gentleman from Monroe. In this he has not even the merit of originality. Washtenaw's celebrated Senator, Allen, has forestalled him in his race for judicial reform. The history of that reformation is before us, and if my friend from Monroe desires a recurrence of the era of 1836 and '37, he must obtain it without my sanction.

But, says the gentleman, the people charge that laws are made by lawyers, and a great prejudice has been induced; great hostility exists against lawyers among the people. Sir, who has induced this feeling? The hedge lawyers, the quarelling demagogues, the ignorant and knavish, the vagabond and unprincipled members of that profession. There are, sir, such even in the profession—they are in all the professions—they degrade and disgrace all, from the highest to the lowest—all trades and vocations have their quota of just such materials. But I must own my surprise at finding the gentleman from Monroe pandering to this class of men; and for the sake of courting an evanescent and mushroom popularity with that class, so far forgetting himself as to thrust at the profession to which he belongs. I am an humble member of that profession, and of it I am proud. Its interests are common to those of all other classes of community—what depresses and injures the one, depresses and injures the other. Away, then, with these attempts to create hostility ty as between different classes, professions, trades or occupations in the community.

But, sir, let me proceed to another objection to our proposed system. It is this: the judges should mingle among the people in order to get public opinion, to hear public sentiment, so that they may know how to decide. Who, sir, can tolerate such monstrous propositions as these in an assembly of intelligent men? Why, sir, fairly stated, it amounts to this, and nothing more or less: that the opinions of an excited mob, the passions of the populace, are to constitute the rule of decisions in your courts of justice; and that, too, in your court of last resort. I will not say that it is the very concentrated elements of demagoguism; but I do say that such sentiments, emanating from any man on this floor, except the gentleman from Monroe—for whom we all entertain the highest respect—would have deserved to have been scouted out of the Convention without the courtesy of a hearing. What constitutes genuine freedom? The absolute supremacy of the laws. It is the sheet anchor of the citizens' rights, of the stability and perpetuity of the institutions under which we live. And yet it is gravely proposed that our judges of the court of last resort must forego and forget all these considerations, and decide as may be dictated by what they choose to call public opinion—follow, in the legal adjudications of your highest judicial tribunals, the fluctuations of what the gentleman calls public opinion!

I concede, sir, most cheerfully that the progressive spirit of the age—public opinion, once become universal and fixed, does have and should have an influence upon the decisions of courts; it induces progression and change in all the departments of government—executive, judicial, and legislative. Even now, among the grave charges urged against our existing system, none, perhaps, has gone farther to bring it into disrepute than the very one that is now proposed to be perpetuated and extended.

Another objection, and one quite inconsistent with the former, is also urged by the gentleman from Monroe. It is that we propose to compel the Supreme Court to hold terms in each of the judicial circuits. Our opponents think one or two of the principal points in the State, once in each year, would be an improvement. It would, no doubt, contribute much to the ease and quiet of the judges; but whether the bar and people of the State are to be as well commoded when compelled at great and ruinous expense to traverse the whole State to find a Supreme Court, I leave them to answer. One of the effects of their plan is certain to reduce the country bar to a sort of vassalage or dependent position upon that of one or two important points where this court is held. They contemplate a grand system of concentration; we propose to diffuse the administration of justice over the State.

But, says the gentleman, we cannot get good lawyers, without adopting their plan, to go upon the bench. This is a novel objection, and I presume no one knows how to answer it, for the simple reason that it rests upon neither fact, experience, reason nor argument. A reference to the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana would be a sufficient refutation, if any were needed. Again, the organization of the federal court is cited as evidence in favor of the circuit judges holding the Supreme Court. The points of difference are so many and great, the want of analogy so complete, that it can establish nothing. The judges of the Supreme Court of the United States are appointed, and that too for life; ours are elected by the people, and that too for short terms. They sit in banc at the seat of government only, and only once in each year; ours are to hold terms in each judicial district of the State, and more than once, if the public exigencies require it. But I will reserve any extended discussion of this branch of the subject to a future day.

Then comes a broad general allegation that by our system lawyers are to be benefited, and that it will induce an increase of litigation. This I regard as a species of ad captandum argument, designed to tickle the popular ear—rather for others than those upon this floor; but, if I mistake not, he misjudges the intelligence of the people of this State, who attempts by such means to advance either his own popularity, or aid the cause he advocates.

It is true that it might be with propriety admitted that the profession in the interior of the State would be injured, and by a necessary consequence, the people of those portions of the State, also. Their system benefits the bar at some one point, where this court of last resort is to be held, but it does so at the expense of all the rest. But, says the gentleman, the fault is, lawyers talk too long in court—the court has been too dull. I concede, for the sake of the argument, the truth of it; and yet he is attempting to perpetuate for all coming time, by constitutional provision, the very order of things under which these evils have grown up and been perpetuated. It is, to say the least, difficult to see the consistency of his reasoning.

One word more as to the impossibility of finding in our State competent men for Judges of the Supreme Court. If this be true, it should be seriously considered; but as we have the assertion of the gentleman only to sustain it, let us look a little farther at his argument. Earnestly does he, in the next phase of his speech, labor to convince us that a far higher order of talent is required for Judges of the Circuits than for the Supreme Court; and yet he anticipates no difficulty in procuring the men just fitted to perform those duties.

I leave the gentleman to his own explanations; having already detained the committee too long in answering so extraordinary an argument upon the grave subject of the judicial system as that made by him. I was unwilling, however, to let the occasion pass without some attempt at showing its transparencies and crudities.

Mr. BUSH said he had not been favored with a professional education, and was not prepared to discuss this question; but he had made up his mind on the subject. He believed the system proposed by the gentleman from Monroe would answer the wants of the country; and believing so, he should vote accordingly. The gentleman from Oakland has pointed to difficulties in the proposed arrangement. He says that the judges have not been able to do their duty on account of the multiplicity of business; that the system amounts to nothing. But, sir, if he would look back to the time when the whole business part of the community was prostrated, he would see what our difficulties grew out of—the difficulties of the whole commercial world—the evils that helped to fill up the calendars of the courts, and which they have not yet been able to wipe away. But they are passing, and the arrangement of the courts, as proposed, will entirely wipe them out.

The gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] takes exceptions to the statement of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] who says the Circuit Court should have as much talent as the Supreme Court. Sir, does not common sense sustain that opinion—that a court of the first resort should be able to decide with experience and according to law? It should be a competent court. Who would wish to have a case go to an incompetent court, and then have to appeal, after an expense of $200, to the Supreme Court? Place able men as judges in the Circuit Courts, and there will be very little business for the Supreme Court to do. He trusted the time would come when the people would be satisfied to have every thing done in the Circuit Court. Then is it not necessary that the best talent should be taken and placed in those courts? If we take an inferior class of men, and place them on the bench of the Circuit Court,—and we may be under the necessity of doing so, if we take them in the circuits,—the people will have no confidence in the courts, and cases will be taken up, and expenses incurred.

Mr. B. said he knew nothing about courts; he had never had any thing to do with them, and he hoped he never should; but the business that had arisen out of a commercial crash had diminished. We had a different state of things now. Believing that difficulties would arise, and that the expenses of the judiciary department would be materially increased by the establishment of the independent Supreme Court, he should go for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Monroe.

Mr. GOODWIN said he could not let the vote be taken on so important a question, without offering some remarks; and he would beg the indulgence of the committee while he did so.

In my view, sir, (said Mr. G.,) few more important topics can be presented to the consideration of the committee or the Convention. The people require that an adequate system shall be permanently established in the State. That there have been evils in the administration of justice in this State, all admit; and the importance of the subject must be conceded by all. There is none that more deeply affects individual rights, and the interests of the community in general; it comes home to every one; it affects every man's personal rights of every description. On the protection, the efficient protection of those rights, rests the confidence of the people in the government, and the institutions of government.

The gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] seems to think that the existing evils are of a temporary character; that they arose from causes which no longer exist. Such is the opinion expressed also by the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH.] They think the business will decrease, and a much less judiciary force will hereafter be necessary.

Is this the fact? It is true, sir, that during the financial convulsion which has been alluded to, the business of the courts increased largely; but the bankrupt law which was passed by Congress wiped out much of the business that was then in the courts. This law was passed in '41, it took effect in '42, and in '43 this was the result—from that time down to the present the particular business that arose from the cause alluded to has mostly ceased. But how was it still with our courts? Was it not a fact that the business was so increased that great delays existed? It was so much the case in some of the counties that in 1846 a remedy was proposed, and the Legislature established County Courts. There was then a separate Court of Chancery, and in four of the counties of the State a separate Criminal Court. It was then sought to relieve the judicial tribunals from the pressure upon them, and enable them to dispatch with facility the business before them.

It appears to me, then, (said Mr. G.) that the gentlemen from Monroe and Ingham are under a mistake in reference to the business of the courts being diminished. That growing out of controversies relating to property and individual rights, has, on the contrary, increased. Look, sir, at our increasing population and the growing business of the country.

Gentlemen refer to the courts of the United States, and the judiciary system of the federal government, as an example for that which they propose. But, sir, the circumstances are entirely different. Their business is small compared to that of the courts of the States. They do not administer merely a uniform law of the Union, but laws of the different States; and decide cases arising under them within their local jurisdictions, between citizens of the different States, as well as those arising under the constitution and statutes of the general government. It may, therefore, have been deemed important that the judges should go within the States and become acquainted with their local laws and practice. This is a circumstance that does not exist within the States themselves. The Supreme Court of the United States, in its appellate capacity, acts without the jurisdiction of any State, in the capitol of the Union, and the objection suggested may exist as to it when it cannot in reference to any State tribunal.

Let us look at the two different systems proposed. The one reported by the committee contemplates the establishment of a Supreme Court, the judges of which shall not exercise the functions of circuit judges—that a different set of men shall compose the Circuit Courts; that the Supreme Court shall be mainly a court of errors and appeals, and the Circuit Courts have general jurisdiction, civil and criminal, in law and equity. The other, that the same men shall perform the functions and exercise the powers of both. As to the number of judges, much need not be said respecting it—the same number will be required, whichever system is adopted. If one system is better than the other—if justice is better administered and in a more satisfactory manner, the amount of additional expense, if any, will be of little consequence.

It seems to me that gentlemen are misinformed in regard to the amount of the judicial business of the State. In 1846, as before remarked, the Court of Chancery and the Criminal Court were abolished, and the County Court system established. There were at that time four Judges of the Supreme and Circuit Courts. The Chancellor and the Judge of the Criminal Court added, made six. These courts being abolished, all the jurisdiction and powers possessed by them were vested in the Circuit Courts; but in consequence of the increase of business that was thrown upon them by this increase of their jurisdiction, the Legislature found it necessary at a subsequent session to increase the number of judges from four to five. Did not the business of these courts increase largely; was it not still increasing, and did we not find the amount of business employing the Circuit Court judge a considerable portion of his time? Such was the fact; and this committee this morning, on the proposition submitted by his colleague, [Mr. BAGG,] in regard to the establishment of County Courts, had decided against that plan. He took it, then, that County Courts were no longer to exist; their duties were to be transferred, and their burthens thrown upon the Circuit Courts.

It seemed to him that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for a Supreme Court, such as was proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] to transact the business, in view of the other changes contemplated in our judiciary system. What did the gentleman's plan contemplate? To multiply the number of judges in order to remedy the difficulty. The gentleman placed the number at seven. Would seven be a sufficient judicial force, after you had abolished the County Courts, and transferred all their business to the Circuit Courts? Would seven be sufficient, and could these judges at the same time discharge the duties of a court of final resort, and give causes in that court that cool and deliberate examination and accurate investigation which, in deciding on the rights of parties, was to be sought for and should ever be found in this Court? It appeared to him not. It appeared to him that the persons who were to exercise these functions must be more than men to perform them in the manner in which they ought to be performed. It was urged that the business of the Supreme Court could be diminished. He thought otherwise—that after the system was put in operation and should acquire the public confidence, the business would increase also; that it would be an advantage to the bench that the judges should have some time for reading and study; and that if for a term such should be the case, it would be all the better for them and the public interest. But it appeared to him that the condition of things in this State would not warrant such a conclusion, or such a system as is proposed. He did not know how it might be in the county of Monroe; but his experience told him that it would not be efficient and practicable in many other portions of the State.

If we adopt it, we would have one similar in effect to the one under which we have had all these difficulties and delays. We would have the difficulty adverted to by his colleague, [Mr. BACKUS,] There would be Circuit Courts sitting at different places in the State; the term of the Supreme Court would arrive, and the judges would have to leave an amount of business unfinished in order to transfer themselves to the court of final resort. Then, the decision of causes in that court would in turn be hastened by the necessity of the judges of that court to go on circuit. Thus you would have the one tribunal crowding upon the other, and the business of each successively retarded, or hasty and immature and ill considered decisions. He deemed it necessary for the dispatch of business that the courts should be separate; the Circuit Court judges attending to their prescribed duties—the Supreme Court hearing and deciding cases of appeal.

Again, it is urged that the public exigencies seemed to require that four terms in a year should be held in many of the counties. That ought to be effected by any system which may be established; but it will not if you take the supreme judges and require them to do the duties of circuit judges, as proposed by the gentleman from Monroe; and if attempted, the duties will be performed with still less care and deliberation, or will be attended with more of the delay which has been so much complained of.

If the business is done precipitately, it cannot be well done. Gentlemen seem to forget the rapidity with which our State is growing, and that the increase of its population and of our commerce add daily to the business of our judicial tribunals. By the division of duties, you will have the business done, and well done; while, by the other plan, you will have it left undone, or it will not be done in such a manner as to give satisfaction.

I come now to another argument, which seems to me a strong one, against the plan of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] It is that by increasing the number of judges, you will lessen the responsibility of each. By devolving a duty on a large body of individuals, you diminish that sense of responsibility which each should feel as to its performance. We are establishing a system, I trust, not merely for a year or two, or six years. When the gentleman would limit his proposed system to six years, on account of the changes that may occur, he seems to me to yield the entire question. We should now establish a system to be permanent, and prepare it accordingly. That is what the public exigencies, and I believe the public voice, require. When you multiply judges, and take away that sense of individual responsibility which they would otherwise feel, the natural effect is to render them less cautious, less careful in their judicial investigations. Judges are but men; and the same circumstances that operate on others operate on them, however able they may be, or however conscientious. With such a Supreme bench as reported by the committee, consisting of three or four men, under the responsibility which they must feel resting upon them, you will get better and more reliable decisions than you can get under the system which we now have, and which it is proposed by the gentleman from Monroe only to extend.

I come now to another proposition, on which the gentleman and myself are at variance. It seems to me that, upon the plan reported by the committee, of separate courts, you will have abler and better men in both, on account of the attention which each will devote to the particular sphere to which he is confined; the improvement of each in their respective spheres will be the greater. You will seek for both tribunals men the best qualified to be found in the State; men who are especially adapted to their particular duties. Such men, each attending to the appropriate duties of his sphere, will become better qualified for them than if their attention was divided by the system proposed—the existing system enlarged.

In the Supreme Court, when vacancies occur, you will resort, to supply them, to the Circuit Courts, and select men who have there given evidence of ability and qualifications for the Supreme tribunal.

The gentleman has remarked that you will have the better judges if they hold the courts at nisi prius, and you adopt that system. Under that system, where it has existed, there have been, no doubt, able judges. The term, however, as he uses it, is inappropriate. It is not applicable to the system he proposes. Under that system, the causes originated in the court in banc. All the proceedings were there had, except that when an issue of fact was made, that issue was tried by one of the judges holding a court of nisi prius, as it is termed, for that purpose. When the verdict was rendered, it was returned by the judge to the court in banc, where all further proceedings were had, and the final judgment given. Our Circuit Courts (the same system which the gentleman proposes) are courts of original jurisdiction, and all the proceedings in a cause are had in them, from the commencement to the final judgment.

Johnson's reports of the decisions of the courts of New York are referred to as of high character, and are said to be quoted with approbation. True, sir, they are able reports; and the men on the bench of the New York Supreme Court, during the period of those reports, were able men, and men of learning. They were giants in intellect; and had they filled places in a judicial tribunal under any system, their decisions would have been looked to with respect. But that, sir, was not the court of last resort. They had also their court of errors and appeals, and a court of final review; also a separate court of chancery. But what was the result, even at that early period of the history of that State? The business so accumulated that the convention of 1821, for the revision of their Constitution, provided for separate Circuit judges, to hold the courts of nisi prius andoyer and terminer, and the Supreme Court in banc, to be held by three different judges. They also retained the court of errors and appeals as a court of final review. So far, then, as regards the State of New York, the analogy does not hold good. The example is, in fact, against, rather than in favor of, the gentleman's proposed plan. Well, sir, under that system, what followed? Why, sir, they at first placed in the Supreme court, men who, though able men, had not experience, and not much confidence was placed in their decisions; but they had not been long there before they did acquire the confidence of the people, and their decisions were regarded with high respect. And I think it will be conceded that the later reports of the decisions of that tribunal are deservedly quoted with high approbation. Under that system, sir, from time to time, as vacancies occurred on the Supreme bench, judges were appointed to it from the Circuit Courts, who had in these evinced learning and ability, and became distinguished. I have now in my mind one who, from a Circuit judge, rose to the post of Chief Justice, and now occupies, and with distinguished ability, the eminent position of a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

But, sir, follow up the history of the jurisprudence of that State, and see what has more recently transpired. Under that system, even with the separate judges for the circuits, and their other judicial tribunals, business was found so to increase and load them down, that further changes were necessary; and in the late revision of the Constitution of that State, they have established what they call a Supreme Court, with thirty-two judges; but in fact, eight courts, in as many different circuits, with four judges each; also a separate court of appeals of eight judges, four elected by the people of the State at large, and four taken from those of the Supreme Court having the shortest time to serve—the terms of office of the latter being so arranged that eight go out of office every two years. The former, the court of appeals, is only a court of review; it has no original jurisdiction, and of course its judges do not hold circuits or nisi prius terms. It is in fact what it is proposed that our Supreme Court shall be by the report of the committee on the judicial department. And yet gentlemen urge upon us the example of the State of New York in favor of their system. If it is so important that judges of the court of final review should hold circuits, or nisi prius terms, why did not that State, with her experience as to both systems, preserve that feature? And why should we, while uniting all the jurisdictions—civil, criminal, law, and equity,—with our growing population and business, adopt a system which the people of that State long ago found inadequate, and which has been deemed insufficient for the purposes of justice here? Sir, under either system, a judge, endowed with intellect, who will honestly devote himself to the high duties of his office, examine his books, investigate causes and study the laws, will improve as time advances, and command the respect and confidence of the community amongst whom he has administered justice; and when he departs from the scenes of time, his memory will be dear to them, and they will drop the tear upon the green sod that covers his remains.

The idea has been thrown out that under the separate system you will have the greater candor and impartiality in the Supreme Court; that there will be no common feeling to suppress each other's decisions, and no disposition to overthrow them, from rivalry or jealousy. This has been commented on in the argument read by the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. Church,] of Mr. Bayard, of Delaware. But as to this, every man must judge for himself. It is not only essential that justice should be administered justly and impartially, but that the people should entertain the opinion that it is so.

There is another view in favor of the system reported by the committee on the judicial department. We propose to elect judges by the people. This, in my judgment, is right, if you provide that their terms shall expire successively at different periods, and make these of such duration that they shall not be looking forward to the close, and calculating on a re-election constantly, or all at the same period. This might disturb the due exercise of their functions. It is the sovereignty which elects the other two branches of the government; and why not the same sovereignty this? And in electing your court of last resort, should it be in districts or by the people of the whole State? Your circuit judges should be elected in the circuits. If the judge in the court of last resort is to settle the law which shall govern in future, is it not essentially important that the people of the whole State should have a voice in his election? And is this not right in principle? Obviously so. If you have a Supreme Court from the circuit benches, judges elected by the people of small divisions of the State will not only unite in passing upon causes arising in other circuits which have not participated in their election, but in finally settling the law in the whole State. A person may come from a quarter where there may be local prejudices. There may be cases in which, deciding honestly, he may have made enemies; hence he should be elected by the whole people. Thus he will be free from local influences, and private and personal partialities or animosities will have but little influence in his election. This is important, sir, and unless you adopt the separate system, you will elect in circuits. The people, as to their circuit judges, will require them to be elected. And the people of the whole State will have the opportunity of participating in the selection of but one of the court of last resort. Again, the people of the State, for this tribunal, should have the range of the whole State for selection, to avail themselves of the best talent for the station to be found within it. This reason has been with me a cogent one in bringing me to the conclusion at which I have arrived on this important topic.

I ask every man to hold up the two systems side by side, and ask himself which will be the most efficient, prompt, and satisfactory in its results. As to the experience of other States, I have a word to say. The systems that have been adopted in the Western States have been mainly in accordance with that reported by the committee on the judicial department.

At the request of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, Mr. GOODWIN gave way for a motion that the committee rise; which was carried.

The Convention then adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Mr. MOORE submitted the following additional sections to the article entitled "Judicial Department," which were referred to the committee of the whole.

Sec. —. There shall be elected in each of the counties of this State one county judge, who shall hold his office for four years, who shall hold the County Court and perform the duties of the office of judge of probate.

Sec. —. The County Court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases, civil and criminal, in law and equity, and appellate jurisdiction in such cases as the Legislature shall provide.

Sec. —. The county judge shall receive an annual salary, to be fixed by the board of supervisors, to be paid by the county.

Sec. —. The county judge of the county is authorized to hold the County Courts for any other county in the State.

On motion of Mr. BACKUS, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole and resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Judicial Department," Mr. Cook in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of Mr. McCLELLAND'S substitute for section 2.

Mr. GOODWIN resumed his argument in favor of a separate Supreme Court.

He was afraid he had occupied too much of the time of the committee already, in giving his reasons for preferring the report of the committee on the judicial department, but with their indulgence he would again advert to the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe. It is that the Circuit judges shall be the judges of the Supreme Court, four of whom to constitute a quorum. Though the number may not be fixed, he supposed the Circuit Courts would require seven judges, and he understood that number was contemplated for the business. The county courts to be abolished. Under the system proposed by the committee on the judicial department, was a Supreme Court with separate judges; and the County Court business to be transferred to the Circuit Courts, which should hold their terms in each county three times a year. Here are the two systems, side by side. We have 31 counties in the State, in which, by the present judiciary system, courts are to be held; and as more counties are to be organized, more must be added. There will be shortly four more in the lower peninsula, saying nothing of the counties on Lake Superior.

Now, sir, by the system reported by the judiciary committee, you have five Circuit judges, with an area of five counties to a circuit. Your terms held three times a year, will be fifteen terms to a circuit. In large counties it is known they frequently extend to a month or six weeks; in the new counties less time is required. Now, one object of the committee was, that the terms of the Supreme Court should be held so often that a case going into it by a writ of error, or by other means, might be decided promptly; that there shall be places in each circuit in which that court shall be held twice a year, so that cases may be heard promptly as they arise. Now, sir, the operation of the present system is that you have in effect, for final decisions of cases, only one term a year. At Kalamazoo, for instance, if an important case arises, it is held over till some subsequent term. So in Jackson, and so in Pontiac; and it is usually settled at the winter term in Detroit, which sits two months and upwards. It often happens there, that judges have to go on their circuits before the decision of the court is made. They may have conferred together on the decision to be given, but in some cases where arguments have not been heard, or reference had to authority, it has occurred that a court have had to go on their circuits; and where you have had a bench of five, but two were present when the opinion was delivered, and the cases decided.

Let your Circuit judges compose your Supreme Court, holding three terms a year of the Circuit Court in a county, considering all cases; then suppose them to hold four terms a year of the Supreme Court; is it not perfectly obvious that cases cannot either be well considered, or decided with that deliberation which they should receive in a court of final resort, and which, in a Circuit Court, should be had in order to give satisfaction and prevent an appeal to the Supreme Court.

As to the objection of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] in respect to the formation of the character of the judges by such a system—the advantage it is supposed will be derived from holding courts and participating in trials. I here stated and referred to facts to show that the selection of judges will be made from the circuit judges as the system progresses; but even if you turn aside from that, and make selections from the bar, you do it with reference to the superior qualifications of the persons selected, and the character they have acquired for ability, learning and integrity. I suppose you are not going to take new and untaught men for either, but will select for both men of the greatest ability, experience and practical skill—and to the court of last resort, you will select men that have had that very training which my friend from Monroe speaks of; and that they will be constantly learning and improving.

There is another view worthy of note. It is this: your judges, whether in the Circuit Court or Supreme Court, should not be the whole time in court. Aside from the consideration that human nature cannot endure incessant labor, (and perhaps there is no labor more severe than that of the judge constantly occupied in his duties,) and that there should be some respite, there should be some time for reading and study, from that required in particular cases. The science of law is progressive. Not only are the statutes to be read, which are obligatory on the States, but questions of constitutional law require your judges to be acquainted with the decisions of the United States Courts. And again, you have to consult the decisions of other States. Our law is the common law. Its principles have to be considered and applied, as new questions arise, and to new phases of society. Their application is from time to time required to the changing aspects of society in this progressive age. Our system of rail roads, for example, is giving rise to questions new and perplexing, and which require the principles of common law to be applied under new circumstances.

Now, sir, although the idea is thrown out that the place of a Supreme Judge would be a sinecure, it is entirely erroneous. I do think that he should have some opportunity for reading and study, and keeping up with the progress of the age, which, under the system of the gentleman from Monroe, would be nearly impossible.

In reference to the argument that it is necessary for a judge to go amongst the people, I refer again to the difference between the United States Courts and our own. Our judges are all the time among the people. They are to be elected by the people. If they hold two terms a year in a circuit, they are then among the people. But, sir, in reference to the particular administration of their duties, I do not see what particular light they can derive from the fact that they can see the people and the people can see them. They look to the members of the bar, that represent the suitors, to present the views and arguments which are supposed to bear on the decision. If your courts are placed where they are easily accessible to the bar, they are under the observation of those interested in the administration of justice, as well as the whole people.

Another idea is urged: that the laws of the Legislature are to be construed, and that the judges should go among the people in the circuits to obtain the aid of popular sentiment for this object.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him. My remark was that those judges, without mingling at all with the people, would become speculative and technical. The gentleman [Mr. BACKUS] asked why they would be more technical than others, if they were confined to their closets? I replied that they would generally become mere book worms, and they could not keep up with the progress of the age. Not that they should be governed by the people, or by popular impulse, passion or opinion, in their decisions. I would inquire of the gentleman, if judges had not kept pace with the progress of the age, and had not occasionally broken down precedents, but had confined themselves entirely to their closets and their books, what would have been our condition now?

Mr. GOODWIN—The application of the laws and the construction of statutes are neither of them to be determined or aided by popular sentiment and popular impulses, as has been in fact suggested. The interpretation of statutes is to be ascertained from the statutes themselves, and those rules of construction which reason and good sense have established; and the rules of the common law are to be determined by the investigation of its principles and reasons, in reports and other books of authority, and the exercise of sound judgment in their application to facts as they are presented, and circumstances as they arise in the progress of things. The judges are not to make the law, but to determine what it is, and apply it to the case presented. That object would be much better accomplished by the plan of the committee than the one presented by the gentleman from Monroe.

In the first place you select your judges from the best materials in the State, with reference to their public qualifications—then experience in the trial of cases, as I have before suggested. If the judge has had none of that experience, he goes into his position very lame; but when placed there on account of his knowledge of the law and its application, acquired as before mentioned, he becomes a better judge than if half or three-fourths of his time was given to the duties of his circuit.

The gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] said—"We are too early for the system; we cannot find material in the State to carry it out." We propose four judges for the Supreme bench, and five for the Circuits. I ask, sir, if you cannot find four men in the State competent to perform the duties of the Supreme Court, where can you find seven that will not only be able to do the duties of the court of final resort, but also those of the circuits? The argument overthrows itself, because it must require greater abilities to perform the double duty than it would to perform either singly.

Where is it more important that you should have absolute correctness, than in the court of last resort? The decisions made in Circuit Courts can be reviewed. I consider the assertion a reflection upon the jurisprudence, the bar, and the intelligence of the State.

In addition to that, let me take another view. Under the system proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, at least seven, and perhaps nine judges, will be required. Will you not, then, have some of a lower grade of talent and qualifications for the court of last resort? It would not be expected that the same four would hold the Supreme Court all the time. Then look at this fact with reference to dispatch of business and its correct administration.

As to what has been said in regard to the court of Massachusetts, it is difficult to draw analogies from those old States where they have men devoting themselves throughout their lives to the courts, sometimes to particular courts and particular branches of jurisprudence. They have, besides a Supreme Court, another court of general jurisdiction, a court of common pleas. If she had but one list of judges, and they had to hold courts in thirty-five counties, and do the whole business of the State, they would not find time for the exercise of that care and attention, and they would not be distinguished for those superior merits which have been attributed to them, and which I am not disposed to question.

Now, sir, let us see what is the experience of the age in these United States, so far as we can obtain it from constitutions more recently established? I answer, in all but two of the Western States, the system reported by the committee has been established.

Ohio and Wisconsin are the exceptions. Ohio is now holding a Convention and proposes a reform. Wisconsin has only decided to adopt her present system temporarily. You find the system in operation in the States of Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas—yes, and in the new golden State of California, now knocking for admission into the Union.

Florida has adopted, but temporarily, however, a system similar to that of Wisconsin.

In Indiana the system has been in operation from the formation of her State government, in 1816, until the present time; and she has ever had an able bench, and their reports are quoted with approbation in the older States of the Union.

Illinois, it is worthy of remark, adopted the system upon the organization of her government, as I have been informed; some time after changed it to the system proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, and recently, in her new constitution, just formed, has gone back to her first system. After having tried both, she gave the preference to the one similar to that reported by the judiciary committee.

Kentucky has had the system in operation from the organization of her State government, near the close of the last century, until the present time. In her new constitution, just adopted, after the experience of half a century, she continued the same system. And where will you find abler lawyers, and judges, and courts, than in Kentucky? Their land system, the offspring of that of Virginia, has given rise to a large amount of litigation.

In some of the older States, too, you find the same system. In Georgia it is the system. So, also, of North Carolina, of which Tennessee was a colony, and from which it was transferred to the latter State.

And, sir, wherever you find the other system prevailing, you find other courts with concurrent jurisdiction, doing a large portion of the business. Most all of them have County Courts or Courts of Common Pleas, and do not commit the whole business and jurisdiction to Circuit Courts so constituted.

Mr. G. here referred to several of them, and the tribunals composing their systems.

Now, sir, you may go on to establish the system of the gentleman, and in five years you will find it inefficient, if not impracticable, and you will have to come back to the county court system, or some other system better and more effective than that which he proposes. This, it seems to me, will be the necessary result of our growing commerce, increasing population, and the consequent multiplication of questions and cases for judicial decision.

As the system proposed is the same we have in existence, and has the approbation of many gentleman whom I respect, and its continuation has been proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, I have considered it at some length. I am afraid I may have been tedious, but my apology is that I believe it to be of vast importance to the State—to its character and prosperity. Whatever conclusion we shall arrive at, I hope we may adopt such a system as may be efficient and give satisfaction to the people.

Mr. HASCALL called for the reading of a paper presented by him on the 16th of July, from several members of the Kalamazoo Bar, stating their reasons in favor of the establishment of an independent Supreme Court, and requesting the Kalamazoo delegation to use their influence in favor of said system, if consistent with their views upon the subject.

[It was read.]

Mr. H. said—I do not agree in sentiment with those from whom the paper comes, and cannot, therefore, comply with the request therein contained. I feel it incumbent on me, under the circumstances, to state my reasons somewhat at length, why I shall be compelled to take a course adverse to that desired by the petitioners.

I beg the indulgence of the committee, while I state as briefly as possible the conclusions to which my reflections have brought me upon the particular question before us. To say, sir, that the subject under consideration is a most important one to the best interests of the people, is only to state a fact in which every member of this body will concur. The people of the State have their eyes upon us, and are looking with deep interest to the action we are about to take. They expect—nay, they demand, sir—that this body shall establish a judicial system which, while it protects the rights of the community with intelligence and efficiency, shall at the same time be simple, practical and economical. I propose, in the remarks I am about to offer, to give my reasons why the plan of an independent Supreme Court will not accomplish these objects; and why I shall protest most decidedly against its establishment.

And, first, I object to the establishment of an independent Supreme Court, from which the circuit judges shall be excluded, because I believe a court thus constituted would be in contravention of the theory and genius of our government. Sir, the institutions of this country are founded upon the doctrine of the sovereignty of the people, as well in their individual as in their aggregate capacity. Each man, as related to his fellows, is a sovereign. He has no superior. He regards no one by natural right as his ruler. For the purposes of government and mutual protection, however, these individual sovereigns agree to delegate to chosen agents the right to establish and institute certain rules of action, by which they agree to be governed. To a body of men designated the Legislature, chosen by the people with reference to their peculiar fitness to make laws for their observance, this trust is delegated. This body of chosen men are presumed to speak and embody the exact will of their constituents, the people at large. No other power in the government is thus authorized to bind sovereign and independent men. Indeed, it is a fundamental provision in our constitution that the Legislature shall be separate from and independent of the other co-ordinate powers of the State. And this law-making power is the highest trust which can be bestowed upon man. When regularly exercised, it controls, for weal or woe, the best interests of a whole commonwealth. How important, then, that this high privilege be exercised only by the chosen instruments of the people, and by them only in accordance with the wishes and expectations of those by whom they are constituted.

Now, sir, how is this will of the people to be ascertained but by a free and intelligent intercourse with them? How, but by mingling in their affairs and becoming familiar with their habits and modes of thought? I answer, it can be done in no other way. Familiar, habitual and constant intercourse is the only method by which men can become and remain imbued with the popular spirit, and become possessed of a knowledge of popular wants and requirements.

How, let me ask, is this independent, this isolated, this stationary court to become so acquainted with popular sentiment as to give a popular interpretation to the laws? Will it be likely to be imbued with the living spirit of the people? This is not pretended. Indeed, it is said that it ought to be removed from and placed beyond this influence. What, sir! are we to behold a tribunal in this country, raised high above the reach of the people; having no sympathies with them, and still passing irrevocably on their dearest rights? Are we to establish in our midst an insensible, iron-hearted, irresponsible oracle, to whose behests we all must bow and tamely submit? I ask gentlemen of this Convention—I ask you as American citizens—are you prepared to surrender your inalienable rights, your sovereign privileges, into the hands of a power thus removed from your resistance, thus elevated above and beyond you? I cannot believe you are prepared to take this wide extended step back into the realms of feudal despotism. Do we in reality believe in the supremacy of the popular will? Do we wish to see its spirit maintained, respected and obeyed? How, then, I ask, can we consent to the establishment of a power constituted with an expressed reference to its independence of popular feeling; and violating the fundamental principles of our government? Sir, such a tribunal is opposed wholly and absolutely to the whole theory of our republican institutions.

Again, sir, I object to the proposed court, for the reason that it will lose its practical character, and become abstract and metaphysical. In the affairs of this life, perfection is unattainable. The highest results of human reflection are but imperfect and uncertain, at best. The most that we short-sighted mortals can do, is to adapt our means to the circumstances around us, in such manner as to render them of the greatest practical value in the common concerns of life. To this end, a constant and familiar acquaintance with the business routine of the world is indispensable. When men become removed from the every day affairs of life, and cease to mingle and come in contact with the multitude, the mind involuntarily reverts to abstract principles and truths, and a standard of human conduct is set up, not modified by the conditions and influences of practical life, which is too rigid and metaphysical for erring humanity. With a court constituted as it is proposed to constitute the Supreme Court, this effect would be inevitable. The judges, entirely removed from the conflicts and the modifying circumstances which prevail in the trial of causes on the circuits, and being called upon to declare the arbitrary and abstract rule of right, would unavoidably commit the error which I have pointed out, and establish a system of ethics altogether too sublimated for the imperfect nature of man. This I look upon as among the most prominent evils which will result from the system. Every remove from practical life is attended with doubts and difficulties, and becomes a fruitful source of perplexity and injustice. The elevated moral precepts of the Saviour, though founded on the plainest truths, and sanctioned by divine authority, have as yet failed to restrain the natural passions of men, or to establish a uniform propriety of moral conduct. The standard is too high for the present nature of man; its impracticability in this, our rudimental mode of being, is acknowledged. Rules for the government of human action must conform to man's nature, and must be regulated by a profound and practical knowledge of his condition. No men, more than the judges of our courts, need this knowledge, and this can only be obtained by a continual contact with men and their relations.

And this brings me to the third objection to the proposed system, which is, that it excludes the Circuit judges from the bench of the Supreme Court. Of all the methods to strengthen and improve the mind of man, no one is so effectual as that which brings it into constant contact with other minds. It is then that its ability and acuteness is tested. It is then that its real merits are developed. It is like an ordeal by fire. If dross is presented, it is consumed; if pure metal, it is purified and improved. The judge upon the Circuit is in the midst of his fellow-men. Their eyes are upon him. His every action is scanned, his every judgment weighed. He is surrounded by learned and eagle-eyed attorneys, who are bending all their energies for the success of their cause. Their sophistries he must expose; their perversions of the law he must detect; the rights of parties he must watch and preserve. To him the springs of human action are constantly opened—the secret designs of men uncovered; whilst, in each particular case, the rules of law applicable are applied, and the judgment regulated by a view of all the accompanying circumstances. A judge thus trained and schooled—if he survive the judgment of the people—is becoming constantly more competent and more deeply imbued with the principles which should enter into the determination of differences between man and his fellow-man. His mind is being constantly invigorated with legal learning; his perceptions brightened by constant use; his understanding enlarged by constant reflection. He is, to all intents and purposes, a living, animate judge, thoroughly imbued with that wisdom which, in his particular sphere, maketh perfect. With these transcendent advantages, is it not desirable—nay, is it not imperatively demanded—that his voice should be heard in the tribunal of last resort?—that his experience and practical wisdom should be called in to establish the rule from which there is no appeal? That, having mingled with the multitude and breathed in their spirit, he should protect their interests, where they have not the power to interfere?

Let us inquire here, for a moment, what is proposed by the advocates of the independent court? Three judges are to be chosen from the State at large, before whom, sitting in banc, all appeals of law from the Circuit Courts are to be taken and finally settled. By the action of this Convention, a great amount of litigation will be prevented. If there are good judges on the circuits, but few cases will be appealed. What proportion of the time, then, think you, this immaculate and omniscient trio will sit? I will venture to say, at farthest, if the judges are to be as competent as their advocates promise, not a day over three months in the year. Heretofore, our five Circuit judges (and even four before the County Courts were established) have done all the business on the circuits, and all the Supreme Court business, and yet have had a little time to spare. Hence, I say, with the transcendent talents which are promised in the proposed system, they cannot possibly consume more than three months in the year. There will then be nine long months left, in which this favored few may luxuriate and grow fat and lazy; all, too, at the expense of the State. Human nature, unless urged by necessity or ambition, is prone to ease and indolence. If there are any men in this State who, drawing an ample salary from the treasury, will confine themselves to close application to books, and especially to legal study, when not pressed by actual exigency, so that they may be at all times ready on any question that may arise in the supreme court, those men belong to a class sui generis, of which no other State in this Union can boast. Such men, sir, are difficult to be found. They are like "angels visits, few and far between." I can think of no one in the whole range of my acquaintance; and yet, sir, I have seen some few of the intellectual giants of Michigan. In sober earnestness, then, I ask gentlemen, if there is not danger of paying too dear for the whistle? If it is not possible we may do ourselves and the State an irreparable injury? I cannot but so regard it, if the system proposed is to prevail. It seems to me that the State cannot wish to incur the expense of sustaining a court so little occupied; and when occupied, so much less competent to decide intelligently than the circuit judges.

But I will pass to another and, in my mind, an insurmountable objection. It is this: By the establishment of an independent Supreme Court, the character and influence of the Circuit judges will be degraded and lessened. Above all other considerations, it is important that the Circuit Courts be ably and judiciously constituted. They will be by far the most important courts in the State. Before them, all questions affecting the rights and interests of parties—questions connected with their lives, their property and their dearest relations—must first come. Often the decision of these courts must be conclusive, must be final, from the fact that one or both of the parties may be unable, on account of poverty, to carry the cause to a higher tribunal. What, then, is the effect? The rich man, who has a contest with the poor man, although he (the rich man) may be clearly in the wrong, can deprive the poor man of his rights, by requiring him to follow his cause to a court where he has not the pecuniary ability to go. The rich man is able to secure the best of counsel, to enlist in his behalf influential friends; while with the poor man, all these circumstances are reversed. He cannot procure able and faithful counsel, because he is too poor to pay. He cannot win to his cause influential friends, because he is too humble ever to be able to serve them. What, then, can he do, but see his dearest rights taken away by a tribunal high above his reach; by a court so exalted, and so expensive in its character, as to be only open to the rich? How necessary is it, then, to the poor man, that the Circuit Court, upon which he can alone depend, should be constituted of able and influential men, who can appreciate and protect his rights, and whose decision must be a final one to him. Sir, let us reflect. It should be our policy to prevent appeals to the court of last resort; to have causes justly and satisfactorily disposed of where they originate. How is this to be done? Only, sir, by elevating the character and influence of our Circuit Courts—by making them what they should be, the most competent tribunals in the State. This would do very much towards dispensing with the necessity of a court of last resort. At any rate, the interposition of that court would be rarely required; and when required, who more competent than the able judges, fresh from their duties on the circuit, to fulfill the duty? But, should the proposition objected to prevail, the direct effect would be to weaken the influence and degrade the character of the Circuit Courts.

The argument would be this: that, inasmuch as an able court of review has been established, the qualifications of the Circuit judges are not of very essential importance. If they make a bad decision, we have a competent court that will readily correct it. Thus the Circuit Courts, which should have at their head men of superior talent and of the highest qualifications, will be habitually regarded as inferior, and be made up of weak, if not incompetent, men. I ask gentlemen, would it not be a desideratum devoutly to be wished, if we could secure such wisdom and high attainments in our circuit judges, that their decisions would never be appealed from? I doubt not, all will answer yes. Should we not, then, strive at this time to bring about as nearly as possible so desirable a result? The answer must still be the same. Such being the case, I can never consent to any measure which will tend to bring these courts into disrepute. I had, by far, rather see the Supreme Court composed of inferior men, than the Circuit Courts. I repeat that it is before the latter that all our causes must first come. It is there I wish to see them all justly and finally disposed of. It matters not much what our tribunals of last resort may be, so that we have no occasion to use it. But, as this desirable result cannot be realized entirely, I say, let us have judges of the first respectability on our circuits; let what few cases may then be appealed from, be reviewed by them in banc. Under such an arrangement I will answer with my existence for the result.

I still further object to the system, because it will create an additional number of offices, and burden the State with increased expenses unnecessarily. It has been said that, unless the plan proposed prevail, four or five extra judges will be required to hold the circuits. This, beyond the addition of one or two, it seems to me, cannot be correct, unless the judges of Michigan are greatly degenerated, or are singularly incompetent. In 1820, New York embraced fifty-two counties, and contained an aggregate population of 1,372,812, and embraced within its borders the greatest commercial city in the Union; from which originated an infinity of litigation which filled its courts; and yet five judges accomplished all the labors both of the Circuit and Supreme Courts, and that, too, with a promptitude and ability which have made their administration famous as well in Europe as in this country. Now, I have before remarked that the action of this Convention will greatly reduce litigation in the future; our laws will be more simple, and our rights more clearly defined. All this will certainly be favorable to our courts.

Let us look, now, at the extent of our State and its present population, and compare the same with New York at the time referred to. We now number thirty-four counties, and have a population, as near as can be estimated, of 450,000; a little less than one-third that of New York in 1820. In 1845 the population of our State was 304,273. Can it be possible, then, that the judicial strength of our State is so effeminate, so weak, compared with that possessed by the New York judges, that it cannot perform the labor for less than one-third the number of people which was contained in that State in 1820? We have the same number of judges then in that State; we have less than one-third its population; our rail roads and traveling facilities are constantly increasing; and our judges can traverse their circuits with infinitely more ease and dispatch than the New York judges could; we have no great metropolis to compare with the city of New York; and yet, we are told, we shall require several additional judges to dispose of our business. This, at least, is not complimentary to the legal talent and capacities of our judicial functionaries. It is true that, at the time referred to in New York, in consequence of the rapid addition of new counties and the immense amount of business originating in its great commercial city, the labors of its courts had become very arduous, and business was accumulating upon the hands of the judges. But, notwithstanding all this, let us see what amount of extra force was called for, to render their courts entirely adequate to all demands. I quote the language of Mr. Buel, a distinguished lawyer, and delegate to the New York Convention of 1821, alluding to this very subject:

“For several years past,” said he, “it is true the five judges have not been always able to dispatch the business of the bench and of the circuits. This, I apprehend, has not been owing to the great increase of business, so much as to other causes. Counties have been multiplied, and many more circuits are requisite to be held than formerly. The connexion of the judges of the Supreme Court with the Legislature, as members of the council of revision, has occupied a large portion of the time. They are about to be released from this duty, and will, therefore, be able to devote two or three months more to their judicial duties. I think it not improbable that this alteration in our Constitution would of itself remedy the evil complained of. But certainly the addition of a single judge, as proposed by the Chief Justice, [Mr. SPENCER,] would amply provide for all the contingencies of the case, without disturbing our present system."

Chief Justice SPENCER, alluding to the same subject, on the same occasion, said:

"It had been his opinion and the opinion of his associates, that with the addition of one judge, the present court would be able to do all the business that would be required for many years."

Now, sir, in the face of all this, with what grace are we told that unless we establish an independent court, we shall have to make these extensive additions to our circuit force? Are our judges really so lazy and incompetent as to demand four or five additional associates in order to enable them to perform the duties of our courts? If so, let me inquire what kind of a Supreme Bench such judges would make, when not compelled to exercise their faculties by constant practice on the circuits? I predict, sir, that your judges would soon become so fat and indolent that it would be necessary for the bar to help them on the bench! This would be an independent Supreme Court, with a vengeance!

It may be well, in this connection, to allude to the argument we hear frequently urged, that by the adoption of the proposed system we shall give dignity and character to our decisions; as if connecting Circuit and Supreme Court duties in the same judges would make their decisions less respectable. What has experience said? I will only allude, in this place, to one instance, which, with intelligent men, will be quite sufficient to overthrow the unwarranted assumption we have heard made.

It is well known to legal gentlemen everywhere, that the decisions contained in Johnson's New York Reports, are the very highest authority; not only in the United States, but in Westminster Hall. They stand above those of any other State in this Union; yet they were made by judges performing the double duties of the Circuit and Supreme Courts. And here let me again quote the language of one of the learned judges most prominent in making these decisions. In speaking of the policy of thus uniting the duties of both courts in the same judges, Chief Justice SPENCER, in the convention of 1821, said:

"They (the judges) had never been desirous of being released from their circuit duties entirely, because they had considered it for the best that they should mingle with the people in the different counties of the State. It is rational to suppose that such a plan is best calculated to give satisfaction among the people; as a judge, coming from a remote part of the State, must be supposed to be a stranger to the parties who are called before him."

This example, it would seem, ought to be sufficient to render it unnecessary to pursue this unauthorized assumption farther. But, sir, I am about to object to the proposed system under another aspect, where I shall adduce still further examples to show how groundless and how contrary to facts is the assertion put forth by its advocates.

The objection is this: Wherever the independent system has been tried, it has sooner or later been abandoned. England, after sustaining the aula regis, an independent court, for several centuries, by successive modifications and improvements under able and upright judges, at last matured that almost perfect system from which our ancestors patterned, of connecting Circuit and Supreme Court duties in the same judges. It was under this system that that splendid collection of legal decisions was made, which are contained in the New York Reports by Johnson, before referred to. It was under a similar system that the decisions contained in the Massachusetts Reports, scarcely less celebrated, were made. Under a like arrangement the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States have performed their duties, and yet the reports of their decisions abound with judgments of transcendent ability and the most profound legal accumen. But, I will go no further for examples. Those produced, it seems to me, are decisive of the question, and show most conclusively that circuit duties, so far from being incompatible with Supreme Court duties, operate most favorably in giving strength and character to the final opinions of our judges. From 1822 to 1847, New York had an independent Supreme Court. I appeal to any competent legal gentleman whether the decisions of that court did not steadily degenerate after the first mentioned period, running down through Cowen's and Wendell's Reports, until they fell far below those of a former period under the other system, in point of legal ability and sound authority. The late Convention in revising the constitution of that State, restored the old plan, somewhat modified, which had been abandoned in the Convention of 1821, and again connected Circuit and Supreme Court duties. This is the commentary of New York on her experience, after a full trial of both systems.

Again, the system proposed is objectionable because it enables incompetent judges to shield their weakness under the industry and ability of their associates. Where no test—like the performance of Circuit Court duties, in the performance of which each man must be tried on his own peculiar merits—is applied, all that is necessary to shield the weak and indolent judge from disapprobation and contempt, is for him to maintain a prudent silence, appear dignified and look extremely wise. In this way his demerits will be concealed, and whatever honor may attach to the performance of the high duties connected with the supreme bench, if made respectable by the labors and high qualifications of his associates, will be equally shared by him. To this, as a possible and most probable result of the system, I do most decidedly object. I wish to see our judges subjected to the fiery ordeal of the circuit, before I shall be willing to rely implicitly on their capacity and integrity.

In conclusion, I object to the system, because it originated with a view to political ends, and not to the public good. It is a scheme by which politicians are managing to increase the number of high offices in the State, for the purpose of enjoying them themselves, or of placing troublesome men therein to remove them from the path of political preferment. It comes from the wrong quarter; it is advocated by the wrong men. The people do not want it, and if I can divine the future, its advocates will be called to an account for the course here pursued. I object to the whole system, because it proposes to engraft on our State government an institution subversive of the popular will—a high and august tribunal, upon which the people, at a great distance, are to gaze and shrink back with awe. Because it will render our law decisions less practical and less conformable to the condition of actual life. Because it will tend to degrade the character and destroy the respectability of the Circuit Courts. Because it will effectually exclude the poor man from its presence and protection, on account of its elevated and expensive character. Because it will give incompetent and indolent judges an opportunity to shield themselves from public criticism. Because it creates additional offices, and will cause increased expense; and, finally, because it has been repudiated wherever both systems have had a fair and impartial trial.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the reasons which have influenced me in the determination to which I have come; and whatever may be their effect on others, they must control the vote which I shall be called upon to give.

Mr. BACKUS said—Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great attention to the discussion that has been going on in relation to the article upon the judiciary, now under consideration, and especially that particular part of it which relates to the organization of a Supreme Court, the court of last resort in the State. It is a question that I deem the most important in the organization of our government. It respects an institution that stands between the people, as individuals, and the government; and between citizen and citizen, to mete out, maintain and enforce their relative rights, duties and obligations. In a government constituted like ours, it is the very sheet anchor of our existence. Let the fountains of justice be corrupted, or our citizens lose confidence in the honesty and integrity of this branch of our government, and all is gone.

The question now before the committee is, shall we have an independent Supreme Court, or, in other words, a Supreme Court separate from the Circuit Courts, composed of different men, who, in the review of a case from the circuit, can one and all act without preconceived notions, bias, sympathy, or pride of opinion; or shall we, as it has heretofore been under the old system in this State, leave our citizens to have their rights determined finally by a Supreme Court composed of the same men who have tried them at the circuit, where the fountains of justice are, or are liable to be, poisoned and polluted by preconceived notions, bias, sympathy and pride of opinion in the court of review, and the consequent lack of public confidence?

The range of discussion on this subject, as indicative of the views of gentlemen on this floor, and especially the discursive flight of the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. HASCALL,] in the speech read by him, represent what has no foundation in fact. They speak of an independent Supreme Court under the constitution we are now about forming, as some august tribunal, removed to an almost infinite distance from the people, and so august and high that the people cannot be permitted to look upon it—much less, enter its precincts. Is it so, sir? It is not so, and gentlemen well know it; and I will not so far stultify them as to suppose for a moment that they apprehend or imagine any such thing.

It will be composed of your citizens whose official existence will be created by the same constituency that creates your Circuit Courts; and the power given to it always under the control of your people, through the Legislature.

Is it, then, the fearful tribunal before which in terror the private citizen must bend the suppliant knee and tremble, and which is only known by some manifestation of its unseen power? No, sir; and gentlemen who argue thus, manifest either a lamentable ignorance of the subject, or a wanton design to pervert the truth. The whole system is emphatically of a popular character—it originates with and is amenable to the people. It derives its power from the same fountain source—the people—as your humblest justice of the peace, and like him is responsible for the trust confided.

But, it is said, create a separate Supreme Court and it will degrade your Circuit Courts. But why degrade them? If for any reason, it is because their decisions are subject to review. If so under the system proposed, and under which the State now suffers, they are degraded, for their decisions are subject to review. And all your inferior courts are degraded. If this be an evil, gentlemen can never find for it a remedy, until they melt all courts into one; or all courts have final and conclusive jurisdiction. If the fear is degradation, give to your circuit and justices' courts final and conclusive jurisdiction—abolish altogether your Supreme Court. Will gentlemen do this? I would far rather see it than the mockery of having the circuit judges review their own decisions. But this gentlemen do not propose; no, they must have a Supreme Court, which, if you believe them, degrades the circuit. The truth is, sir, the very idea of an appellate court, a court of review, is wholly opposed to the notion of the same or any of the individuals composing it, whose decisions are appealed from or are to be reviewed. It is in principle unsound. Hitherto this State has tried it and it has worked badly, and gentlemen now propose to perpetuate this objectionable feature, who oppose a separate Supreme Court. What, sir, would any man in his senses say to a proposition like this: that a jury who had once tried a cause by hearing the evidence, and given a verdict, were the most competent jury on the same facts before whom to re-try it? In what, sir, does the case of the jury differ from that of the court gentlemen propose, in which your appeals and writs of error are to be taken from the circuit to the same judges, sitting in the Supreme Court? It is a mere farce.

Gentlemen have talked of and referred to the nisi prius courts of England, and New York, under her former system, and intimated a similarity between them and the system they now propose. The fact is, sir, between them and the one now proposed there is not the slightest analogy. In the former, everything but taking the verdict, down to the issuing of the execution and closing the record, was and is done before a full bench of all the judges; while, under the system now proposed by gentlemen, everything is done at the circuit by a single judge, who forms a part of the Supreme Court, if an aggrieved litigant wishes to have his case reviewed. And not only this, but with him sit the other judges, who, like him, perform circuit duties, and who if human, have mutually a deep sympathy to have their respective decisions sustained. The probabilities of justice are far higher—indeed certain—under a visi prius system, compared with that gentlemen propose now to substitute for the one reported by the committee in the article under consideration.

The plan proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAN,] of taking four of your circuit judges, out of the seven, eight, or nine, to compose your Supreme Court, is far more objectionable than that of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] to place all your circuit judges on the Supreme Court. Bring in the entire family of circuit judges, or bring in none of them. With the whole of them the chances for justice among our people would be far superior, from the mere fact of number, to having but a part of them. The opinions of the many might not be as easily brought to bolster up the opinions and decision of the same men at the circuit, as that of the few.

Would the gentleman from Monroe select his four judges by a sort of ostracism, or how? Would he have them sit in judgment upon review upon their own decisions at the circuit? If they should not do circuit duties, would they not be elevated to the same suspicious height, and bear the same obnoxious character, in fact, that the gentleman from Kalamazoo so trembles at? By what rule, and in what manner would he select his four judges from the circuit judges for the duties of the Supreme Court? For their superior merits and attainments? By whom is this to be decided? By themselves? Or are they to be designated by a system of jack straws? Why all this circuitry? Why not let the people, who are to come under their power, directly themselves exercise this high trust of designating the persons that shall compose their court of last resort? Dare not gentlemen trust the people? It looks like it.

As I said before, the plan of the gentleman from Monroe is far more objectionable than that of the gentleman from Calhoun, who proposes to let into the Supreme Court the whole family of the circuit judges, to review together their own decisions. But would the gentleman from Monroe select four judges from the circuit judges for the Supreme Court, to review their own decision, and those of their associate circuit judges? If they are not to pass upon review their own decisions at the circuit, one-half of the decisions in the State will have to go over to some future term, to the great delay of justice, until you can bring into the Supreme Court the residue, or four others of the circuit judges, to pass upon the circuit decisions of those just left. It would be a most cumbersome system, fraught with evils interminable. I can only wonder that such a system should find an advocate, much more an author, in the usually clear-headed gentleman from Monroe.

The judicial system of the United States has been referred to as sustaining the system of a Supreme Court with its judges performing circuit duties. Between that and a system for our State there is no analogy of circumstances to which it can apply. The only argument that can be urged in favor of the federal system is the fact of the diversity of practice and rules of decision, created by local law, with which it becomes desirable that the judges of the Supreme Court should become acquainted. In our, or any single State, this principle has no application, for the rules of practice and decision are or should be uniform. In a recent conversation with one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, [Judge McLEAN,] from his long experience in such matters he most unequivocally expressed, as the result of his observation, that an independent Supreme Court was almost indispensable to a speedy and healthy administration of justice; and that, notwithstanding the reasons aforesaid for the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States doing circuit duties, the circuit duties of those judges would have to be dispensed with before the Supreme Court would become that tribunal which it might and ought to be as the court of last resort. The opinion of such a man, and his large experience, are, in my mind, and justly ought to be, entitled to much weight.

But, sir, the system of courts proposed, as a matter of fact, cannot dispose of the business of your State. You have, sir, in the State now a judicial force of thirty-six judges, consisting of thirty-one county judges and five judges of the Supreme Court, exercising original and appellate jurisdiction. It is now proposed to have all these duties performed by seven, eight or nine circuit judges. I again repeat they cannot do it. Our people will be thrown back into the experience of by-gone years, the calendars of your courts will be loaded with causes, and the rights of parties will be frittered away by the ruinous delays of your overloaded judicial system. Gentlemen propose to elevate your circuit judges by imposing upon them more duties than they can perform—by requiring them to do what they cannot well do.

I had far rather see your County Court system firmly established, with original jurisdiction, both in law and equity, with no intermediate court to the Supreme Court, where the decisions of the County Courts could be impartially reviewed.

Some gentlemen seem to intimate an apprehension that an independent Supreme Court would become technical, and in forms lose sight of right. For this supposition I have heard no reason, and none I am sure exists in the nature of things, and can only exist in a disordered fancy, which is capable of conceiving right stifled by form, when a learned and high minded bench rebukes ignorance. From the course of discussion by some gentlemen, one would infer they really supposed the friends of an independent Supreme Court opposed to judicial reform; for one, sir, I will freely say I will go as far as any one on this floor in a healthy reform to brush away all the cobwebs of antiquity that sustain useless forms and technicalities. But let me say, sir, that nowhere can this high and important duty be more or as safely placed for efficient results, as in the hands of a learned bench. And if proof, sir, were wanted of this, the past history of our own State in judicial reform, and its managers, is most triumphant proof, where, by the ignorance of the reformers, as every one has seen, and some have felt, every step of their progress has been to sink deeper and deeper parties and their rights in the mist of uncertainty.

But gentlemen still, as the only subterfuge, (and I consider it no better,) make pretence that an independent Supreme Court will degrade your Circuit Courts. My opinion is, and I think experience is, directly the reverse. It will add vigilance to your circuit judges. If you place men of a keen, legal perception in your Supreme Court, men able and learned, will it not necessarily make like men of your circuit judges, whose decisions are liable to such a scrutiny?

But, sir, on the other hand, if the judges of the Circuit Courts are to be brought together to review their own decisions, may not right be forgotten? It is human—in mere sympathy for each other's position in an attempt to reconcile their various and varying decisions on the circuits. Do you not risk much more with such a system, than with one where your court of review comes to a question wholly unaffected by its previous consideration?

But gentleman say this objection is or may be obviated by withdrawing from the bench, for the time being, a judge who may have decided a case at the Circuit, when that is under review? To this there are two objections: 1st, you lose the benefit of his intelligence and learning in finally settling the law; and, 2d, you do not withdraw the other judges from his influence, or from the consciousness that each of their decisions is in turn to pass under the review of their associate so withdrawn.

Gentlemen refer to New York, under her present system; but for what purpose in support of their proposed system, I cannot perceive; for in New York they really have an independent court of last resort. Do gentlemen propose, as there, here to engraft upon our system their Supreme and Circuit Courts, Courts of Common Pleas and of Oyer and Terminer? I think not; for, if I understand the wishes of our people and the sense of this Convention, it is to have but two courts in the State, of general jurisdiction, above those of Justices of the Peace—a Circuit and Supreme Court.

But, as an argument that the court they propose is capable of doing the business of the State, they again refer to New York, under her old constitution, when the Judges of the Supreme Court performed circuit duties; but they omit to state that the Senate was then the court of last resort; that the Chancery duties were performed by a Chancellor; and there was in full operation a Court of Common Pleas and other subordinate courts, which took off a large per cent. of the business; all of which, with the Chancery business inclusive, it is now proposed to impose upon the same judges who hold your court of last resort. Massachusetts has been alluded to, and other New England States; but for the argument of gentlemen, unfortunately all these States have their courts of Common Pleas, or county courts, or other inferior jurisdictions. But more than all this, need I enlarge to show to this Convention the wide distinction there exists between the circumstances, condition and necessities of those States, as compared with ours, as a most full answer to all their assumptions and comparisons?

But the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] says, however other things may be, an independent Supreme Court will make the judges of it book worms. He wants them with the people on the highways, I suppose, or at public houses, or musters, and not in their closets making themselves familiar with the laws they are to apply to the relations of society.

In these matters the gentlemen from Monroe and Kalamazoo seem to disagree; for the gentleman from Kalamazoo wants your judges to be learned, but refuses them the time to learn; while the gentleman from Monroe wants them constantly with the people, instead of at their books, least they should become book worms.

The best, and a most full answer to such arguments is, I think, the mere statement of the proposition before as intelligent a body as this. With all the certainty of cause and effect, point me to a judicial system where the rights of the citizen or subject are trampled upon, and I will, nearly in all cases, show you ignorant judges. In all the States south and west the principle of an independent Supreme Court is making progress. In all the States save two they have an organization similar to the one proposed in the article under consideration. Gentlemen have adverted to the judges of Westminster Hall, as occupying a position analogous to the judges of an independent Supreme Court under this Constitution, and also for showing the tendency of such courts to technicalities.

The force of this argument I cannot perceive, as there is no analogy in the constitution of the two tribunals. Were there any force in it, unfortunately for gentlemen the former spring from the mere will of the sovereign, while the latter come from the ballot boxes of the people. And I would further admonish gentlemen so prone to speak disparagingly of the English bench, that it has in modern times numbered among its most learned judges, the pioneers of the judicial reform that has redounded so much to the glory of English jurisprudence, in simplifying remedies by brushing away the cobwebs and crudities of antiquity.

The gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] again urges upon the Convention, as an argument against the independent Supreme Court, and in favor of the circuit system, that the judges should go upon the circuits and mix with the people, to enable them rightly to construe the statutes the Legislature may pass; otherwise they cannot so well get at the intention of the Legislature.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I said, after a law was passed by the Legislature, and they intended it to mean one thing, the courts might give it a construction to mean a very different thing.

Mr. BACKUS—The gentleman repeats in substance what I have stated, that any courts may give to a statute a construction different from what the Legislature intended; and I am yet to learn that it is the result of any particular system; but rather, I should think, if there existed a learned and intelligent judiciary, was the result of the ignorance of the Legislature, in using inapt terms to express their intention. Surely the gentleman will not contend that, however much the judges may mingle with the people, in the judicial construction of a legislative act, they are to pervert its terms to conform merely to any popular desire. This would create the worst of despotisms, destroy the identity of different departments of government, make your judges your Legislators, instead of your Representatives elected by the people for that purpose.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I will detain the committee a few moments, whilst I briefly reply to some of the remarks made by the opponents of my amendment. I desire the members, if they are disposed to take the trouble, to examine the arguments of these gentlemen, and they will find them so irrecencilably inconsistent with each other, that they will be considered entitled to little weight.

The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. BACKUS] disapproves of and scouts the idea of schooling judges in the circuits; and, in truth, any other place except the bar. He would have them know all the practical duties, and possess all the good qualities of a judge, as it were, by intuition. It is well known that a lawyer may be distinguished at the bar for his abilities, ingenuity, application, industry and integrity, and yet be incompetent to discharge the duties of a judge. It requires so many qualities that are so seldom found combined in one person, that it is rather a rare thing to find an unexceptionable judge. How many instances are there on record, of great lawyers failing to answer the expectations of those who were instrumental in elevating them to the bench, and were sanguine of their success. The gentleman will, on further reflection, see the fallacy and absurdity of his remark.

They have argued with apparent sincerity that there is no analogy between the system of the United States and the one proposed in my amendment. The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. GOODWIN] does admit that in some respects they are alike; but this is done so faintly that a listener would suppose that the gentleman did not clearly perceive the similitude. The argument, when analyzed reduces itself to this: that the only reason for keeping up the union of the supreme and circuit systems in the national judiciary, is that the judges may become intimately acquainted with the laws of the several States, and the local rules applicable to them. Now, sir, it is not necessary for me to show that the duties of the Supreme Court judges, when on the circuits, are very nearly of the same character as those of the judges of the Circuit Courts in those States where the system proposed by my amendment exists. A substantial difference has not been, and cannot be pointed out. Every one conversant with the structure and machinery of the Circuit Courts of the United States and the States, and their connection with the Supreme Court, knows that the analogy is close. Let us examine the argument of the gentleman from Wayne, who asserts with great earnestness that the main object of making the judges of the United States Supreme Court discharge circuit duties, is to make them familiar with the laws and local rules of the several States. The whole of the States are divided into nine circuits; to each of which one of the judges is assigned. With the "laws and local rules" of the States embraced in his particular circuit, the judge presiding over it may become familiar. Suppose an appeal is taken from one of his decisions in his circuit to the Supreme Court. Does any of the other judges know, from their discharging circuit duties, anything about the "laws and local rules" of the State where this decision was made, and which may be involved therein? Not at all. The other eight judges may be as ignorant of them as we are. They must depend, for their knowledge on the subject, upon their books, the ninth judge who decided the case, or the counsel who argue it. They do not interchange; but the same judge is almost invariably confined to the same circuit and the same State; so that it is manifest this argument has no force. It is not the reason why the union of the two courts is permitted to remain; and on examination I doubt whether it will be found advanced by any friend of the system in either house of Congress in any of the discussions had there, as among the most prominent in its favor. In the discussion to which I have already referred, the views of Mr. Badger appeared to be satisfactory to all, and the only argument urged for the temporary relief of the supreme judges from circuit duties, was that it was necessary to enable them to clear the Supreme Court calendar.

The gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] says the supreme judges hold their offices during good behavior, and ours for a term of years; and that this constitutes a great difference in the two systems. I cannot see how this shows the impropriety of our supreme judges performing circuit duties. I do not know how he applies the argument, and confess I cannot comprehend it.

Gentlemen harp much on the expression I used, that it was necessary for the judges to mingle and come in contact with the people, and have spoken of it in no very measured terms. Now, it so happens that nearly the very same language has been used, and certainly the same sentiment expressed by Senator Badger, Chief Justice Spencer, in 1821, and some of the most distinguished lawyers in the New York convention of 1846. I can have little objection to urge against the hypercritical remarks of gentlemen, so long as I have the names of such men to sustain me. I repeat what I before stated, that it is necessary for our judges to keep pace with the progress of the age. If judges had not done so, we should now be subjected to an iron rule to which no good citizen would willingly submit. It has been found absolutely necessary, in some instances, to subserve the good of the public to break down precedents, and override usages that had become venerable by age. This has been owing in a great measure to the legal profession, and I am gratified in being able to say that I believe it has made more progress and improvement than any of the other professions.

The strong probability is that either of the proposed systems would answer a good purpose, if there were good judges on the bench; and I must not be understood as maintaining that the independent system would, under no circumstances, work well. Neither will answer unless the right kind of judges are secured; and from the consideration I have been able to give the subject, I am confident the supreme and circuit systems united, is the best, and will be productive of the most good.

The gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] thinks some of my arguments were intended for the people rather than for the members of this convention. In this he is totally mistaken. The convention has met for the purpose of relieving the people of their burthens, and every one who suggests anything that, in my judgment, will produce that effect, shall have my hearty co-operation. I can assure the gentleman that I shall not be found consuming the time of this convention, either by speaking through it to the people or to the lobbies.

The gentleman has made some rather invidious remarks about a gentleman from Washtenaw, [Dr. DEXTON,] in connection with the remark I made about simplifying the practice and pleadings of our courts, and in relation to the County Court system. That gentleman needs no defence at my hands. All who are acquainted with him know that he is abundantly able to defend himself. As to my sympathizing with him, I will say to the gentleman, without expressing any opinion upon the views of Dr. DEXTON, that I do most sincerely sympathize with any man who attempts to eradicate any of the evils with which community is unfortunately afflicted. The gentleman alluded to was not alone; he was sustained by a majority of the people; and grant, for the sake of the argument, that his schemes were as wild and visionary as the gentleman from Oakland imagines, yet the effort to ameliorate the condition of the people is worthy of commendation.

Had the County Court system, which the gentleman has denounced to-day, been sustained by the bar, and its defects, when pointed out, been corrected, and some of the bar had not waged a merciless war upon it, it might have subserved a good purpose. It has existed in other States and worked well; and in many of the counties of this State it is popular with the people. In the county west of the one I in part represent here, the system operates remarkably well, because they have a judge who is more competent to discharge the duties of a Supreme judge than many who aspire to it; and I believe the people and bar of that county are satisfied with it. Still, I am not the advocate of that system, believing as I do that we can adopt a better one.

Exception has been taken to my position that the Circuit judges require more talent, experience and industry than the judges of the Supreme Court. I still maintain it, and conceive that nothing has been said to shake it. I would ask the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. GOODWIN] whether, when on the Circuit, he has not, from the necessity of the case, been compelled to decide many questions of great importance without elaborate argument, time for reflection, and an opportunity of referring to books. The most intricate and complex questions are often presented in the midst of a trial, and a decision required; and unless you have a competent judge on the bench, the number of appeals from his decisions will be largely increased. Such is not the case with the Supreme judges. The questions mooted are generally ably discussed, authorities quoted, full briefs made out and delivered to them, and they decide at their leisure. In fact, it is not usually as difficult for the judges of the Supreme Court to decide and give their opinions, as it is for counsel to prepare and argue the causes. I deem it, therefore, for the best interests of the people that the best judges should be placed on the circuits.

Gentlemen affirm that the County Court system was established because the judges of the Circuit and Supreme Courts could not dispose of the business of these courts. If so, why has the bar been so generally opposed to it? If the object was to expedite the business and clear the dockets, they certainly should have favored it. It would have been their interest to do so; and it is believed they can readily see and well know how to take care of what concerns themselves. But I have understood that the system was adopted as a part and parcel of the plan of reducing the costs, expenses and burthens of litigation. Within the last five or six years many useful reforms have been made in your judiciary proceedings which have facilitated business and diminished litigation. If these had been made without the institution of County Courts, the judges would have been able to dispatch business more rapidly, and might have cleared the calendars. The privilege given to the parties to have the case tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, is of itself a great improvement—saving much time and expense.

Mr. GOODWIN—Will it take less time to try a cause by the court than by a jury?

Mr. McCLELLAND—Undoubtedly.—Counsel will not introduce as much testimony—will not be as prolix in their arguments; nor will they endeavor (if they are wise) to excite to so great an extent its sympathies, or to mystify and refine, as they sometimes do before a jury. A moment's reflection will convince the gentleman that the difference is very great.

Gentlemen insist that seven judges cannot discharge all the duties that will be required of them. Then take the number they have in the article—nine. I do not look upon seven as a magic number. The grand object should be to have sufficient force to do promptly all the judicial business of the State. But if the seven or nine are insufficient, will gentlemen be kind enough to show me how their five circuit judges can accomplish the task? Give the election of the seven judges to the people, place competent men on the bench, and there will be no difficulty. If the people make good selections, we shall have no cause to regret our action here. If they do not, neither system will long retain its popularity. The election of the judges will make them more vigilant, active and industrious; and as the article extinguishes for a time all political aspirations, we may with confidence hope that hereafter our judiciary will sustain that character which should distinguish it.

In New York, they have, as far as practicable, adopted the proposed system—four judges of their court of appeals being yearly fresh from the circuits. Why is this? Because they have been schooled there, and are prepared to discharge the higher duties with ability. Hereafter these judges, who have discharged circuit duties, will be the most likely to succeed to the court of appeals, because of their knowledge and experience as judges.

By the independent system, the circuit judges will be looked upon as of an inferior grade, and will not be more respected than many of the county judges. The consequence must be an increase of the business of the Supreme Court, without any corresponding benefit. Look at the cases taken up from the County Courts, and compare the number and the amount of business now, to that of the Circuit Courts before the organization of the County Courts, and you will see how much the reputed inferiority of the latter courts has augmented the business of the Supreme Court. The gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. Goodwin,] and other judges, presided in the Circuit Court for Monroe county, and there were not half a dozen cases taken up to the Supreme Court from its establishment until 1846. If the County Court is continued in existence as long, one would not be much out of the way in predicting that there would be twenty times as many. Why this difference? Because the suitors and counsel place far more confidence in the decisions of the circuit than they do in the county judge.

The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. BACKUS] says he would rather go for a nisi prius system than for that proposed by me. I have no doubt of it, and will frankly explain the reason. In 1843, when I was a member of the House of Representatives of this State, an effort was made to induce the Legislature to adopt that system. By it the trial of facts would have been had in the proper county, but all questions of law would have been taken to the Supreme Court. As most of the Supreme Court cases are argued and disposed of in Detroit, the gentleman's place of residence, he would have enjoyed, probably, a lucrative practice at the expense of his brethren in the country. The latter would have been mere attorneys, a kind of tender to the profession in that city. The suitors would have been compelled to employ the attorney in the county to attend to the trial there, and counsel in the City of the Straits to look to it in the Supreme Court. From this brief statement, all can readily see why the gentleman is so favorable to this system. When understood by the Legislature, it was defeated; and I hope the independent system, when the discussion is through, will meet the same fate.

Gentlemen inquire how I can find material for the circuits and not for the independent Supreme Court? In reply, I would observe that we may have many at the bar who would make good judges, but they want experience. Place them upon the circuits, and they will be adding to their knowledge and experience daily, and will be better prepared to do themselves justice in the Supreme Court, than if they were from the beginning entirely confined to it. Train them in this as in every thing else. Do not indulge the hope that men taken from the bar, without any practical knowledge, will make good judges. It is a difficult position to sustain under any circumstances, and if you will select from the ablest and most worthy of the profession in the State, and give them ample opportunity to learn, you may soon have a bench of which all will be proud. There is, as I have already remarked, much talent and ability in the legal profession in this State; but no one will consider me as detracting from its character, when I say most of the profession want that experience which a Supreme judge should possess.

On motion the committee rose and obtained leave to sit again.

The Convention then adjourned.

TUESDAY, (43d day,) July 30.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

MOTIONS.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to go into committee of the whole on the article entitled "Judicial Department."

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the same was amended by inserting "Exemptions and the Rights of Married Women" in lieu of "Judicial Department."

The Convention refused to go into committee.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention was resolved into a committee of the whole upon the general order, Mr. HANSCOM in the chair.

The committee took up the article entitled "Exemptions and the rights of Married Women."

Mr. ROBERTSON inquired if it were necessary to take the minority report in preference to the majority.

The CHAIR said the article was taken up in the order of its number.

Section 1 was read, as follows:

Sec. 1. The personal property of every resident in this State shall be exempted, to the amount of not less than five hundred dollars, from sale on execution or other final process of any court of law or equity.

Mr. TIFFANY moved to strike out the words "less than five hundred dollars," and insert the words "more than three hundred dollars."

Mr. WOODMAN called for a division of the question.

Mr. TIFFANY—My object is to obtain the opinion of the committee as to whether or not the Legislature should be restricted in the amount which they exempt; whether they are to have unlimited power of exemption or not.

Mr. J. BARTOW—The section as it now stands does not give the Legislature unlimited power, or any at all. They are to carry out by legislative enactment this provision, and are compelled to pass a law making an exemption to the amount of $500. The amendment would give the Legislature a discretionary power up to the sum of $300. It would give them the power to strike out all exemptions. If we desire to do away with all exemptions, or fix the sum to be exempted, let it come up in the proper manner.

Mr. AMMON BROWN thought the gentleman was mistaken. The section said not less than $500. It seemed to him unlimited as it stood.

Mr. CORNDLL wished gentlemen to look at the section—"not less than $500." Why, the exemption might run up to $5,000.

Mr. GALE—If the Legislature saw fit to exempt $5,000, would it not be in accordance with the wishes of the people? Have the people complained of the present exemption law? The present exemption is much more liberal than it was heretofore. To be sure there were some who grumbled when the law was passed; but was there, as a general thing, such complaint and clamor against it as would authorize the repeal of that exemption? No such thing. If the Legislature desired to exempt $10,000, I will have no objection. Every man, when he trusts another, will know that these exemptions are in existence, and he will consequently be guarded in his dealings. This provision does not act retrospectively, it is entirely a prospective matter. If a repeal of a law placing the exemption at, say $700, or at $1,000, be demanded by the people, the Legislature being the direct representatives of the people, will vote in accordance with their wishes.

Mr. DESNOYERS suggested an amendment, which would make the section read in this wise: "Not less than $250, and not over $500," so as to place the exemption at the minimum and maximum.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I trust the motion to strike out will not prevail. It appears to me to be perfectly safe to trust the matter with the Legislature. We say, in effect, that if they see proper to exempt more than $500, they may do so; and as was justly remarked by the gentleman from Genesee, [Mr. GALE,] they will not do so unless public opinion demands it. I hope the article, as reported by the committee, will be adopted. I think public sentiment demands it.

Mr. FRALICK—Why not leave it in the hands of the Legislature, so that the people can get at this principle whenever they desire it. So that when they desire to have the exemption less than $500 they can have it so.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—The object of that restriction is a fair one. The principle of exemptions I take to be settled in this State, and in many of the other States. The object is that no hasty legislation may upset that principle—that the Legislature shall not exempt to any amount less than $500. The present exemption law exceeds that amount. The exemption is near $750. Any one, by footing up the different items exempted, will see at once that it is so. In the State of Wisconsin the law is more liberal. There, the articles exempted exceed that amount. The object in thus framing this article was to restrict the action of the Legislature, so that the principle may not be endangered. Public sentiment demands this provision. The principle has been sustained, triumphantly sustained in this State, and will be in all time to come. They might as well try to roll back the sun when he has ascended to the zenith, as to endeavor to repress or roll back this great principle of humanity. I may truly say we have the vox populi with us in our advocacy of this measure.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I was sorry, in the first place, that the motion was not to strike out the whole section. I hope a motion to strike out the whole will prevail. I consider the principle involved in this section as entirely wrong; and, although I am sorry, on every occasion, to differ with my reverend friend from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] yet I must say that the principle incorporated here appears to me to be altogether wrong.

The gentleman from Genesee [Mr. GALE] says "it is not intended to be retrospective in its effect." Well, sir, I conceive that from the day this constitution is adopted, if this provision be retained, it will go back to all debts heretofore contracted.

Mr. GALE here remarked that the Legislature might extend the exemption to $1,000.

Mr. ROBERTSON—In that view, even, the whole thing is wrong. If we adopt anything of exemption here, it should be limited to debts hereafter to be contracted. But the committee have not reported any such provision; it looks, in fact, as if they wished to take away the power of collecting debts contracted under existing laws. That has been the operation of exemption laws heretofore. They have worked backwards almost invariably. This section, in my judgment, is just tantamount to the Convention making a provision, or the Legislature passing an act, saying "hereafter there shall be no laws for the collection of debts." Now we propose to insert this article amongst other articles for adoption by the people; that not less than $500 shall be exempted from execution, and in the next section the report exempts a homestead of 40 acres. It is thus made obligatory for all time, until the constitution be amended, that this amount should be exempted. The gentleman says that the people demand this exemption. I must say that I have never seen anything in the public journals, which may be justly taken as the index of the popular sentiment, on the subject of exemptions, except in regard to the "homestead."

The people of this State are an honest people, and I am certain do not desire to shield themselves from their just liabilities behind any legislative or constitutional enactment. I think even that this homestead principle is wrong, for I know how it works in my own county and township. I think the gentleman from Calhoun, who is the father of exemptions, has done a great injury to the people of this State, by insisting in Legislature after Legislature upon this exemption. Is the poor man benefitted by that homestead exemption? I know that he is not: he goes to a store, obtains some articles, perhaps the necessaries of life, or something else, upon credit, and what does he do? Why, he is obliged to give a mortgage upon his corn or upon his cattle or land; and the hard creditor comes and closes up the mortgage, long before the collection of the debt could be had by process of law, and thus takes the bread out of the poor man's mouth. Let gentlemen say that hereafter it shall not be in the power of any man or woman to give away their property without the consent of the whole family. Let them say that, and it will come up to what is exemption in my mind.

I hope the section will be struck out, and indeed the whole of the article. I am willing to leave the whole subject to the Legislature; and I do believe that there are some gentlemen in this Convention who have some little confidence in the Legislature. That course I believe would be the more desirable in a pecuniary point of view; for it is to be supposed that they will take such steps as are adapted to the exigencies of the times. When such a state of things shall arise that the people shall have become so wealthy and prosperous as to justify it, these laws for collecting may be stricken from out the statute books. There has been, however, in my judgment, an unwholesome tone of opinion prevalent upon this subject. I know that the number of debtors in the State far exceed the number of creditors; and I know that the number of those who have not lost is not equal to those who have. The gentleman says "the vox populi is on his side," but I think that the vox populi in this instance is not the vox dei.

There are other countries in which there are no exemptions, and where men are not "ground down to the dust by the oppressions of heartless creditors." I came from a country where you could put a man into jail for debt; but yet they did not fill their jails with debtors. Creditors trusted to the honor of those indebted to them. In the "small debts court" in the city of Glasgow, I have seen but few suits brought, in comparison with the number of suits of the same character that are brought into our justices' courts. As I said, they confide in the honesty of debtors, and but seldom have recourse to legal remedies for the enforcement of their claims. I say this movement results from an unhealthy state of public sentiment. An exemption of this nature was not asked for by the people; they did not cry out for it from the beginning; it originated with men who wished to take ground upon it in order to manufacture a species of popularity. I am sorry to be obliged to differ with my old and reverend friend from Calhoun upon this subject; but I do so, believing that the people have not demanded an exemption to the extent proposed, and that their present requirements would not justify it in this constitution.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—The measure now under consideration is one of deep interest to the people of this State. The subject is one that comes home to every family. The gentleman from Macomb [Mr. ROBERTSON] accords to me more credit in this matter than I deserve. The question of personal exemptions was settled in 1842. True, I had the honor to introduce, in 1847, the homestead exemption bill, and to lend my aid in 1848 in accomplishing the object. And I am happy in the belief that the seal of public approbation has been set upon it. Since then, State after State has adopted the measure.

But, I must confess my utter astonishment at the views of the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] as well as at the views expressed by the majority of the committee, in their report. He and they both denounce the principle of exemptions. I have no doubt the gentleman will review the ground he has taken. He cannot fail to do it. Experience will teach him a useful lesson. He admits that the public sentiment is in favor of the measure; but thinks that the vox populi is not the voice of God. I apprehend the voice of the people in this case will be found to be the vox dei.

The Hebrew code provided that all debts should be cancelled every seventh year. At the close of that year all were free from debt. Besides, no creditor could even take the landed estate of the debtor, and sell it for payment. He might take the use of it for a time, but never the title; and on every fiftieth year, the year of jubilee, every one returned to his inheritance. This code provided for the man and the family. With this single exception in the history of the race, the legislation of the world has been for the incidents pertaining to human life, rather than for man himself. Humanity has been wronged, outraged, down trodden, and the whole care of legislation has been bestowed upon property and its representative—money. Man and the family have been disregarded and turned out as vagabonds, by due course of law. In Europe, one hundred and eighty millions of people have been subjected to the severest labor and toils, that twenty millions may live in ease and affluence. The many are mere hewers of wood and drawers of water to that few.

If any thing on the face of the earth needs civilizing, it is legislation. By means of special laws, special privileges, charters and grants, the few have drawn from the products of labor their subsistence and their riches. Through various agencies created by legislative enactment, that few gain to themselves the surplus productions of the globe, often times at half their value, and sell them out again at enormous profits. In this way vast masses of capital are accumulated in a few hands. By such means a large proportion of the circulating medium, the wealth and the riches of the world, have become theirs, and theirs too without their producing any thing: But this is not all. The very men who created the capital, and from whom it was wrested by means of special legislation, borrow back this very product of their own labor, and are forced to pay interest upon it. The aggregate capital of the United States cannot be less than $300,000,000. By means of various shifts and shavings, this capital gains to itself at least $30,000,000 of interest per annum. But whence comes this interest? From the productive labor of the masses, who themselves created the capital. Still they labor on to produce more capital on which to pay still more interest! Many sink under this indebtedness, brought about as above indicated, and fail to pay. The interest they are required to pay on their own labor eats out their substance. But this is not the end of the chapter. Here your stringent collection laws come in and complete the work. It is not enough that the few must have all the surplus products of labor; but if the laborer fails to pay interest on that very surplus capital which his own hands produce, and which was wrongfully taken from him, all that he hath remaining must be taken away. Because the people are, by the grace of God, free and independent, the officer is commanded by law to levy and distress—aye, sir, levy and distress!—to seize the goods and chattels, and if these failed to pay, the body was graciously provided for! Many are the men who once sung the peans of stringent collection laws, that have wailed when, by a just retribution, they themselves have felt their power pressing down upon them; and thousands are the children of such men who have shed bitter tears when they have felt the force of those laws which their fathers, in their prosperity, praised.

The spirit of aggregated capital is aggressive. It has no limit, no bounds. Controlling the legislation of the world, it has been resistless in its sway. It never tires, it never sleeps. Soulless, heartless, remorseless, conscienceless, it presses onward, regardless of the dying or the dead. It produces nothing, but watches with an eagle-eye all the products of labor. It taxes all classes. It watches the wheat grower, the wool grower, the cotton grower, the laborer, the spinner and the washer-woman, and is never satisfied except with the lion's portion. Robbing labor of its reward, it reduces to, and leaves the man and his family in, abject poverty; not satisfied, it takes his cot, and turns him, wife and children, out, according to the statute in such case made and provided.

From the time that Romulus is fabled to have been suckled by the wolf, to the present time, this double power has weighed down the energies of man and pressed out his life blood. The power of legislation and the power of aggregated capital, sometimes one, and sometimes the other, has been in the ascendant, and led the van in the work of oppression and robbery. As against the masses, they have always been hand-in-hand. But latterly a voice has come up from the living masses, sounding in tones of thunder o'er hill and mountain the doom of the double tyrant. They are awaking to a knowledge of their rights, and demanding that labor shall have its reward; that the laborer shall not be turned out penniless and houseless. Legislation is beginning to relax its iron grasp, and is already in the process of civilization. And what howling and gnawing of the tongue for pain, and gnashing of teeth, because of the change. The faces of the combined few are gathering blackness, because it is perceived that the day of equal rights must come, when men shall build houses and inhabit them; when they shall not build and another inhabit it; when they shall not plant and another eat. True, before that day shall fully come, there must be the battle of the warrior, with a confused noise, and garments rolled in blood; and with burnings and flames of fires. But the day will come. You might as well attempt to roll back the bright orb of day, when once in its majesty it has ascended the eastern sky, as to think of stopping the progress of events. The many are not always to be robbed or spoiled. The many are not always to be hewers of wood and drawers of water to the few—the shavers by law, and the millionaires.

Sir, man is above money. In all the exigencies of business, the changes of fortune and overturning in the affairs of life, it is right, it is just, that man, the family, should not bear the entire burden of misfortune, and money and capital, which are less than man, wholly escape. Napoleon once said that the horses should first be worn out, and the men spared. So I say, in this matter: let wealth bear the burden, and humanity be spared. The homestead should be free, inviolate. No man—no woman—no child—no family should be driven from home, because the hand of adversity presses hard upon them. The measure is so accordant with the real spirit of progress, so just in itself, so wisely expedient in all exigencies to which families are liable, so alleviating when ill fortune bears them down, and so consonant with the popular sentiment and the principles of true Christian morality, that no power on earth can prevent its universal adoption, and they shall sit every man under his vine and fig tree. It is the high duty of the State to throw around every homestead, every fireside, every hearth-stone, the shield of its protection—to stay the proud waves of wealth, and capital, and usury, from carrying desolation over the homes of suffering, crushed, bleeding humanity. No power, no sophistry can dissolve that obligation. The State is bound to protect, not to crush.

Free religion, free schools, free trade, and a free home, are the essential elements of liberty. The home must be inviolate, or liberty is but a name, and freedom a mockery. Our Saxon fathers understood this matter; hence, they made every man's house his castle. But after the Norman conquest, when wealth and title usurped the control, the rule was changed, and the home of the masses was desecrated by the grasp of power. Man, without a home, is an outcast. He has been robbed of his birthright by the strong arm of government, under the control of wealth. Many men and many families, women and children, have been stripped and turned out, because the people claimed to be, by the grace of God, free and independent. Such has been the blasphemy of legislation and legal adjudication. In the name of Heaven it has crushed the man and driven him out—taken his home, his cot. No matter for the wife and child—the hedge, it can shelter them till the law, in its merciful visitation, takes them up as vagabonds, and puts them in jail for the high crime of being just what the law made them; yes, sir, for being just what the law made them!

Such is the morality of your legislation—such is its humanity. Such kind of morality has existed for ages—it has been glorified on this floor. It has been intimated that stringent collection laws are evidence of a high state of civilization. Then the old Romans were a highly civilized people. Their laws allowed the debtor to be cut up and pieced out among his creditors, in proportion to his indebtedness to each. But if they preferred, they could inflict stripes, imprison or sell him and family into perpetual bondage.

Man has a natural right to a free use of air—it is an element essential to his existence. So of water—he cannot exist without it. The same is true of light—man would soon droop and die without it. But the right to these essential elements is no clearer, no more certain than the right of man to a place on this earth. This right is clearly inalienable. To deprive any man or any family of a home, and turn them out as vagabonds, under any pretence whatever, is downright tyranny. It is tyranny of the most odious character. The thing is not to be made right because it has been sanctified by the practice of ages. Age and the sanction of great names cannot turn a wrong into a right. No power can do it.

A man without a home;—what is he? Robbed of his birthright, he becomes an outcast, and made so by law. If society, if the State has a right to do this, it has also a right to put him out of the way. He with his family has no business here.

Macauley, in his History of England, tells that in the reign of Charles II. there were over one hundred thousand land proprietors. At the present time, though the population has increased four fold, the owners of the soil have decreased to about thirty thousand. The result is a vast amount of crime, pauperism, squalid misery, wretchedness, incessant toil and labor, starvation in the midst of plenty—even little children forced to work incessantly and under the lash sixteen hours per day. And yet there are gentlemen here who would put it in the power of capital to produce ultimately such a state of things! It is a crime against humanity and against its Author to manufacture vagabonds by law. And yet the legislation of the world has done it for ages. In the city of London alone, six thousand are yearly imprisoned for debts under fifty dollars.

It is said that stringent collection laws are evidence of a high state of morality, of civilization and public virtue. Go back a little and see. Half a dozen facts are worth a thousand assertions. What was the old Roman law? One of blood, as I have already indicated.

But it is time I should bring my remarks to a close. The measure I have advocated I believe to be demanded by public sentiment, by justice and right, and cannot fail to promote the highest good of the State. So believing, I shall vote for the article, and the people will sustain it.

Mr. WOODMAN.—When I called for a division of the question, I labored under the impression that the recognition of this principle would not meet with any opposition in this committee. Yet I find that there are gentlemen at this late period, when such astonishing progress is being made in all the arts and sciences throughout the world, ready to dispute the correctness of the principle here involved. I think the gentleman from Macomb says “that this principle is not in accordance with public opinion.” If I understand the people, as one who mingles intimately amongst them, I understand that there is a well founded opinion that the principle of exemptions is right, and that we should recognize it in the organic law we are here moulding.

The gentleman [Mr. ROBERTSON] says that he pays his debts, that he always means to do so, and that he is not in debt. He is entirely correct in laying down the principle that it is right for a man to pay his debts. But the gentleman is young in years, and has not had as many years of experience as has the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE.] He is an old friend of the principle, and we are happy to recognize in him the father of the homestead exemption.

The gentleman [Mr. ROBERTSON] finds fault with the language of the section: that property shall not be exempted to an amount less than $500. As was well said by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] if any man foot up the items now exempted, it would be found to exceed the amount here proposed to be exempted. And then, in this class are the personal property and the farming and domestic utensils, which will never be less in value than $500.

Is not this principle right, and has it not been thoroughly debated throughout this State, and other States? Gentlemen know that it has. I am surprised to see a man rise on this floor to contend, in effect, to reduce the little household property of a family to nine cups, six plates, seven chairs, a few spoons and one bed, (loud laughter,) in this age of the world? In this progressive age it indeed seems strange to see them advocating an exemption to the amount, perhaps, of a paltry $50. To that I am opposed. I am in favor of exempting for every citizen what is contemplated in this article. It is what is expected of this committee, if I know anything of the opinions of the people of Michigan, particularly of the citizens of Oakland county. I take it that the question has been settled that we shall have a homestead exemption of at least forty acres. You cannot find in my county a single man who is not in favor of that exemption. I have never heard a man express himself adversely to this exemption principle.

The gentleman tells us that he came from a country in which there are rigid collection laws. I am aware that there are such laws in that country. But I am astonished that a man coming from that country, and placing himself under the protection of our institutions, should ask us to model our laws in anywise to those of Scotland.

Mr. ROBERTSON (interposing)—I did not argue that, by any means. I desired to—

Mr. WOODMAN—That was the force of the gentleman's reasoning. He went on to say they had stringent collection laws in that country, and was surprised to see people here advocating this exemption. I think the conclusion I came to is the conclusion to which any man would come who had heard the gentleman's reasoning. I could come to no other.

He says also "that this principle is wrong." Now sir, I look around this hall, and I am of opinion that you cannot find ten men who will rise and say exemptions are wrong. I undertake to say further, that if there be ten men here of that opinion, if they had declared such to be their opinion before the election for delegates, they would never have had a seat in this hall. I am for passing stringent collection laws; that is, stringent to a certain extent. I understand, too, that this article will act prospectively, and not retrospectively. I appeal, now, to men of business on this floor, if they do not know when trusting a man that there is an exemption to the amount of $750? Which do they trust the more to, his honesty or his ability to pay? Surely, to the former. And do they not know that if this provision be adopted, the same rule of action will exist? Sir, I have come to no other conclusion. How has this principle operated? Well, as we all know. Do the people call for a repeal of the exemption laws? If they do, it has not come within my knowledge. Does it operate oppressively? No, sir, for the principle of exemption is progressing. I recollect, although I am a young man, seeing my father take and enclose men within the walls of a prison for debt. It is not so now. I recollect, too, when six knives and forks, one table, a chair and a bed, were all that were exempted. I regret, indeed, that the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. ROBERTSON] does not come up to the spirit of the age upon this question. The gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] who has had great experience in this matter, and who has devoted much attention to it, and to whom the people of Michigan are under lasting obligations for his efforts in the cause of exemption, quotes a collection law that was very stringent. Would the gentleman [Mr. ROBERTSON] desire to establish collection laws of such a character now?

Sir, I believe it is the intention of the committee to make the article as reported a portion of the organic law of the land; I believe it to be in accordance with the sentiments of the people; I know it is with those of the people I represent, and the reasons I have given are those which will govern me in my vote on this subject.

Mr. FRALICK—I had hoped that this matter would have been left entirely to the Legislature, where it properly belongs. I believe it is a question of expediency merely. I believe it is a question of such a character that there should not be an article put into the organic law of the land upon this subject. I believe in fact that it is a province which of right belongs to the Legislature. But, gentlemen who say they represent the wishes of the people, seem to be afraid to leave the question in the hands of the Legislature, elected by the people. They seem afraid to leave the Legislature the power to do as they see aright in this matter. But, the question immediately under discussion is this first section. What does it propose? That the property exempted shall not be less than $500. That is a retrospective as well as a prospective provision, as any one will undoubtedly infer from the language. I am most certainly unwilling to go for any such thing of the kind. I hope the section will not be adopted. But there are other questions connected with this subject on which I do not agree with gentlemen. I do not propose to go into this matter at length, but still I am not afraid to speak my sentiments, though I disagree with the two gentlemen last up. I was opposed to this principle, as embodied in this article heretofore, and they have not altered my mind; nor do I believe that my constituents are in favor of this measure, or ever have been. If I know their will, I think they are entirely opposed to it.

What is to be the practical result of this system? Gentlemen say it is to protect the poor classes. Does this do so? I think not. If a man have forty acres of land, improved to the extent which it might be by the operation of this provision, would you call him a poor man? I should say not. I do not think that a man so situated could be classed as a poor man, within the true meaning of the term. He is probably on the other hand a man well to do in the world. But the really poor man, the man who labors from day to day, is not protected by this provision. He cannot collect his daily wages upon which the support of himself and his family depends. No, sir, he cannot, for the right to do so is taken away from him. Yet, strange anomaly, the class least able to protect itself is the one which is left utterly unprotected by this article, and it is the one the most likely to be cheated by the class with which gentlemen have expressed so much sympathy. I say it will operate oppressively so far as the former class—the poorer class—the men who work for their daily bread, is concerned.

The poor man has no property except his wages, the compensation for his toil; but under this provision, he cannot assert his just rights; he cannot enforce his claim for the price of his labor against the rich man; he is effectually debarred from so doing. Again, the gentleman [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] says that he wants to protect men from being turned out of doors by their creditors. Have the present exemption laws operated as the gentleman desires? Have they protected the property of men, in the manner alluded to by gentlemen? Let them ask any country merchant in fair business, and they will find that the contrary is the fact. Go into the store of any country merchant, and you will find in his safe a pile of chattel mortgages, covering a man's forty acres, his oxen, his teams, and such like property, which, whenever he may see fit, no matter for what reason, he can go in and take possession of the mortgagor's property, by giving him six days' notice, without any process of law, whatever. The law gives him that power. And who that has seen the form of those mortgages does not know that the Legislature gives this power to mortgagees? The law does not reach the object which we intended it should bear upon. I really do think that the effect will be ten times more dangerous to those individuals—the mortgagors—under the new constitution, than it would be under the present.

This whole system, I say again, is wrong, because it does not protect the poor honest man; on the contrary, it injures him. And, notwithstanding that gentlemen said we would not rise here and express our sentiments in opposition to this article, I have had the temerity, if it can be called so, to get up here and state my views, because I entertain an honest conviction—

Mr. J. D. PIERCE (interposing)—How many people are there in your township who depend on their daily bread for their subsistence?

Mr. FRALICK—There is a large number in the villages of the township.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—And they have no homes?

Mr. FRALICK—Yes, they have some homes.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—Have they no pigs and cows?

Mr. FRALICK—Some of them have; but the difficulty is that this class does not get credit. So that when they endeavor to obtain the pay for their daily labor, their debtor may refuse to pay them, notwithstanding he has forty acres of land.

Now, I say this principle should be stamped with a different name—it should be called a premium for dishonesty. I state this with candor, honestly believing this provision to be that, and nothing else in its result. You may exempt every article belonging to a man, and, if he be honest, he will pay his debts to the last farthing. But there is another class which is dishonest. There are men who will take the protection of this provision and refuse to pay their debts. I do not care how many repudiate the sentiment; you cannot controvert the fact. It is in the nature of things that a man may have exempted some five or six thousand dollars' worth of property, yet refuse to pay the poor laboring man the price of his day's work, with which he desires to obtain a meal for his family. The man of property, it is held, will receive all the advantages of this exemption principle; and I do conceive that the provision here offered for our sanction will, in its operations, prove to be a forcible auxiliary to the extension of dishonesty. In its results it cannot fail of proving so.

The gentleman [Mr. D. PIERCE] has referred to the Jews, and to the years of jubilee. I hope we are not going to pattern after the Jews. They sold their Saviour for thirty pieces of silver. What is their condition now? If we want to refer to every thing low, cheating and dishonest, refer to the Jews. I trust the gentleman does not want to take them as a model. If we wish to remove this difficulty in the community, abolish by the organic law the collection of small debts; then all will understand it. If you desire to protect the small dealers, abolish entirely the collection of debts under $40 or $50. But, so long as the laws exist in their present position, I maintain that exemption laws are improper. I say, leave the entire matter in the hands of the people, that they may determine this question as their reason and sound common sense will suggest.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I wish to say a few words in reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat. The gentleman says he hopes and does not want to take the Jews as a pattern or model. I did not refer to them as an example. I simply referred to a system of laws, for the violation of which they became vagabonds. I did not refer to them in their present state, as an example—merely to their laws. The gentleman says also, that they sold their Savior for thirty pieces of silver. The gentleman [Mr. FRALICK] would sell every family in the State, according to his reasoning, for a less sum. (Laughter.)

The only argument he has brought, or could bring, is easily answered. He says an honest man will pay his debts. I have no reply to make to that, and have only one question to propose to him. I ask him, in the name of common sense, how can an honest man pay his debts if he cannot earn sufficient to liquidate them? Can the gentleman answer that? No sir; nor has the question been ever answered. If you take away a man's tools, he cannot work; and you deprive him of the price of his time, by which he supports his family. There are few families, sir, in this State, who have not a house, or a few pigs or cows to be protected. Are not their beds and tables, and chairs, and their little domestic utensils to be protected? Yet, the gentleman would bring us back to the days when they could be all turned out of their homes to lie in a ditch, and the next day be taken up as vagabonds and put in jail, though made so by the law! I think the gentleman's argument falls by its own weight. I am happy to say that there are but few in this State so poor as not to have something to be protected.

I never knew an instance in my county where a farmer refused to pay his field hands; in fact, a man who has the name of not paying his day laborers, never gets another. That is one of the results of this system—a man must pay his debts. I knew one exception, and after a few trials, he never would be trusted, although he possessed ample funds. He never can employ a man or obtain any thing in the way of goods, unless he pays as he goes along. Such is the beneficial result of the system.

Men must pay as they go along. It strikes at the bottom of the ruinous credit system, that has overwhelmed thousands of families in ruin. That is most fully and clearly shown in McCulloch's writings upon Credit and Banking. He gives reasons in the clearest manner, demonstrating that this principle would prevent the continuance of that kind of credit which has destroyed society and made tens of thousands of paupers to be supported by the community. Go to your State prison and see how many people there are there without a home—vagabonds made so by the law—by the statute in that case made and provided.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I hope the motion to strike out will not prevail. I hear gentlemen on this floor urging the propriety of leaving blanks for the Legislature to fill up. I suppose this Convention was elected for the purpose of stopping all holes, and not for leaving blanks. I think one of the principal objects in the article is, that a restriction should be fixed.

Mr. TIFFANY—I moved to strike out merely for the purpose that the Convention might fill up the blank hereafter.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I am willing to commit myself in regard to anything pertaining to this constitution. I hope, sir, that this committee will fix the principle of exemptions within certain bounds, so that the Legislature won't come in one year and cut off one-half of it, and in the next year make the exemption three-fold more. I'm for making a system that will last for some time. If it don't work well we can amend the constitution. I would prefer an exemption that would be fixed, and not fluctuating. It is but a short while ago that the amount exempted was but small, and then it increased by degrees, until now the law exempts thousands of dollars. It has, no doubt, done good; but it don't reach the spot to which I wish it to reach. I believe the second devil in this world is usury. I don't think he takes a person into destruction quite so quick as crime; but he takes a great many more there, and tortures them with diligence, and his power has an everlasting effect. I believe that usury is the most absolute principle existing under the laws of the civilized world; and I hope the Convention will place a mark upon it before it terminates its deliberations. I think "interest" or "usury" is more absolute than the power to imprison a man for debt, though that was very absolute too. Usury, sir, I think is one of the pernicious influences that destroys men, and finally brings them to misery and ruin. I hope the committee will fix the amount at a certain stated sum.

Mr. BACKUS moved to strike out the word "less," and in lieu to insert the word "more."

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out the words "not less than."

Mr. R. said—I hope this will suit the views of gentlemen here. This is definite, and will protect the poor man against the merciless exactions of the creditor. I do not propose, in arguing this amendment, to go back to the days of the old Roman law, for the principles of freedom were not as well understood then as now; nor to those other laws which seem to have excited the admiration of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE.] He has pored over the dusty tomes of the ancient Roman jurisprudence, until he has become quite enthusiastic against the collection of all debts. Now, I would ask, why not say that hereafter we shall have no collection of debts? That would be more in accordance with his ideas; for it would be a fearful thing, no doubt, if in these days of progress and civilization, we should establish the old Roman code, and leave the unfortunate debtor to be cut up and proportionately divided amongst his pitiless creditors! The gentleman seems apprehensive that we shall recur to those olden times. There is no danger of that.

The member from Oakland [Mr. WOODMAN] imagines, with his usual accuracy of perception, that I desire to establish the collection laws of Scotland here. I did not so express myself that such a deduction could be drawn from what I said. This I know: that inviolate honor in meeting liabilities prevails more in that country than in any other country with which I am acquainted. There, when a dealer trusted you with his goods, he did so not because he had stringent collection laws to enforce the payment of his debt, but by reason of his confiding in the integrity of the customer. I know what their laws are, for I have had experience of them in my family. My father became unsuccessful in business. But, did his creditors, though they had those stringent laws at their command, strip him of all he possessed? By no means. They allowed him to retain his stock, and enabled him to acquire the means to come with his family to this country; and thus was afforded a chance of paying off his debts, which he did to the last farthing. Why did they trust him? For the simple reason that they had confidence in his integrity; because they knew him to be an honest man, and one who would give the last stiver to pay them. I recollect a passage in the Scriptures which says "owe no man anything." The residue of the verse I do not now remember; but the wishes of gentlemen on this subject of exemption, do not appear to be much in consonance with the inculcation of Holy Writ. The Scriptures say "pay that which thou owest;" but gentlemen say in effect here, "you shall not pay your just debts." There is another passage which says, "give unto Cæsar that which belongs to Cæsar." Cæsar was a Roman—one of those merciless, blood-thirsty Romans that cut up their debtors. Yet, the meek and loving Jesus says, "give unto Cæsar that which belongs to Cæsar."

Again, the gentleman [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] says "a debt was wiped out in seven years, according to the Jewish law." Why, sir, in this State, we wipe out a debt in six years; that is our statute of limitations. We have absolutely more liberal laws upon that subject than had the Jews themselves, whom the gentleman has brought upon the tapis as affording a convincing authority in support of the correctness of his position. In truth, the gentleman has pored over the history of those transactions until he has become almost infatuated on this subject. Were he to say that all laws for the collection of debts are wrong, I would go with him. He should give them a blow—an old fashioned, two-handed blow, that will cut to the chine; and, so we together would ride into the affections of the people. (A voice—on the one-horse.) That would be a still more popular method of repudiating the obligation of a debt.

I think this amendment is more consistent than the proposition of my friend, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] because it specifies the amount to which the creditor can trust. For my own part, I shall say that I always do, and hope I shall always be enabled to pay my just debts. And I might further add, and I say it without any feeling of pride, that I do not owe any man. I do not want any exemption law. There are two classes of men in this country; the creditor and the debtor. I wish to protect them both; but the gentleman desires to protect the debtor only. Is it not because the latter class are the most numerous? I do not speak unadvisedly—I have had some experience in the working of this exemption principle. I have seen, in the course of my little experience, a man who perhaps was an honorable man, but who may have been in the habit of squandering his means at the tavern, eating off a table that was not paid for, off plates that were owed for, and even of meat which was cooked on a stove for which he owed. Relying upon the undue protection which the law afforded, he says to his creditor, "you cannot throw me into prison—you cannot take away these things, or force me to pay my debts—the exemption laws protect me."

But, there is one thing which might probably make this provision more acceptable. Make an exception, and say "except for labor done." The man who owns forty acres of land, and is possessed of thousands of dollars worth of property, may owe me for a days' work, as a mechanic or laborer; yet, I cannot compel him to pay me. I say then, let it be so amended that he shall be forced to do justice. Under the article as it now stands, a rich man may take my one-half bushel of potatoes and refuse to pay for them. Is it fair or just that such a person should be allowed to "chouse" me out of the fruits of my hard toil and sweat? It is manifestly unjust—the whole thing is wrong. But if we are to have this provision at all, I desire that it be made a little more definite and clear.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said—Mr. Chairman: I hope this section will be adopted as reported by the committee, notwithstanding the eloquent argument of my young friend from Macomb; and trust, upon sober reflection, he will yet give it his support. The gentleman tells us the exemption laws have defeated the object of their friends, and tended to oppress instead of relieving the poor honest man. He says, under the operation of these laws the poor man is obliged to mortgage his cattle or his last cow, in order to obtain credit; and thus, through the operation of these exemption laws, his means of support are wrested from him. That there are men, sir, who will evade all law, there is no doubt, in every community; hard-hearted shylocks, who sit like blood-suckers on the body politic, crying, give, give. Men whose hearts are steeled, and whose ears are deaf to the cry of the afflicted. But these are exceptions; a shame and disgrace to our race.

I had hoped, sir, this measure would meet with no opposition in this enlightened body, and in this age of progress and improvement. I look upon the stringent collection laws, as they heretofore existed, and as they still exist in some portions of the world, as the relicts of barbarism—the remnants of the old Roman code, which would sell a man into bondage—incarcerate him within the walls of a prison, and send his family to the poor-house, for his misfortunes. The delegate from Macomb tells us this principle is not in accordance with public opinion—that public sentiment does not demand this measure at our hands—that if it is the vox populi it is not the voice of God.

I know not what atmosphere the gentleman has lived in, sir, but so far as I have been able to learn, the vox populi is universally in favor of this measure; and in this instance, at least, the vox populi is the vox dei. So far as I have been able to read public opinion, this principle is universally approved by all men, except the class to which I have heretofore alluded. The gentleman from Macomb [Mr. ROBERTSON] tells us “he is not in debt—that he always pays his debts.” This is right; this is proper; and I trust the gentleman does not arrogate to himself any merit on this account. It is barely just—a duty every man is bound to perform; and a duty every honorable man who can do so will perform. Nor is it strange that my young friend, with his talents, his energy, and his profession, should have done so; it is what all would expect of him. But let me warn my young friend that even with him the day of adversity may come; for

“the battle is not to the strong nor the race to the swift.” Afflictive Providence may chill the current which now courses through his veins, and dim the lustre of those eyes which now beam so brightly; “riches take to themselves wings and fly away.” Experience has taught us that youth and talent, and energy, are not proof against the calamities incident to human nature. The proud, the talented and the honorable have sometimes been glad to avail themselves of similar beneficent provisions in our laws. The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. FRALICK] tells us the exemption laws protect the dishonest portion of community alone; that a man worth five or six thousand dollars may withhold from the poor honest laborer his daily wages, the means of subsistence; that every good business man, and he tells us there are many in this State, have large piles of chattel mortgages, nearly as many as they have customers. I ask the delegate from Wayne, will these shylocks, who multiply their chattel mortgages, be less exacting without these exemption laws? Will they not find means to evade any law, that interferes with their object? This gentleman [Mr. FRALICK] wishes to leave this subject with the Legislature. He thinks we ought not to incorporate it into the organic law; he says he has always been opposed to it, and has not altered his mind; and the great reason of his opposition is that it oppresses the poor laboring man. His sympathy gushes out and runs over for the poor laboring men. Verily, they must be much indebted to this gentleman.

The delegate from Macomb [Mr. ROBERTSON] tells us that in his native country [Scotland] few law suits are brought; that in this country there is a thousand times more litigation; he says there is an unhealthy state of public opinion on this subject; and if his previous statement is true, that public opinion is opposed to this measure, I agree with him that it is a perverted public sentiment. But the gentleman says if it is demanded by the people, the vox populi is not the voice of God; and to sustain his position, he refers us to the law. He says we read somewhere, “owe no man anything;” but has forgotten the context: “but to love one another.” I think the gentleman would hardly have brought this passage to his support had he recollected its connection. Love works no ill to his neighbor—does not wrest from the poor man his last cow, incarcerate him in prison, and cast his family penniless on the world.

But the gentleman makes further quotations from the bible, and admits its authority. He says we read elsewhere, "pay what thou owest." In this quotation he is equally unfortunate, for this sentiment is taken from a parable uttered by our Savior, to inculcate the spirit of the article we advocate, and to which the gentleman is so much opposed.

A certain king took account of his servants and found one who owed him ten thousand talents; but forasmuch as he had not wherewith to pay, his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made; for this was the law in those days of barbarism. But the servant knelt down and worshipped him, saying, "lord have patience with me and I will pay the all." Then the lord of that servant was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt. But the same servant went out and found one of his fellow servants which owed him an hundred pence; and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat, repeating the language the gentleman has quoted for his authority, "pay me that thou owest." And his fellow servant fell down at his feet, and besought him, saying, "have patience with me and I will pay thee all;" but he was inexorable, and cast him into prison until he should pay the debt.

And this is the language, and this is the example the gentleman wishes us to imitate. But let us examine this parable a little farther. When the king was informed of his conduct, he called him before him and remonstrated with him, saying, "O, thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me. Shouldst not thou also have compassion on thy fellow servant, even as I had pity on thee?" And his lord was wroth and delivered him to the tormentor till he should pay all that was due unto him. And our Savior adds, "So likewise shall my Heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses." Had the gentleman been more familiar with his bible, he would hardly have attempted to force this parable into a service so much at war with his doctrine.

We boast, Mr. Chairman, that we live in an age of progress, in a day of reform, and we hope soon to see these relics of the dark ages, these vestiges of barbarism, blotted from our statute books; we hope to see the time when man shall recognize in his fellow man a brother; when we shall practice upon the precept—"owe no man anything but to love one another;" when the cupidity of man shall not be aided and encouraged by oppressive laws.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, let us, gentlemen of the Convention, lend our aid to advance this object—let us be true to ourselves, true to our constituents, true to the cause of humanity—let us incorporate this provision in our constitution, and we shall do much to alleviate human misery and elevate our race.

Mr. BRITAIN was opposed to striking out, as proposed by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. ROBERTSON.] It would fix the amount so that it could not in any way be changed. The probability was that the motion was made for no other purpose than that of injuring the strength of the friends of the principle.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE (Mr. B. giving way) —I propose to add at the end of the section the following, so as to do away entirely with the idea that this provision is to be retrospective in its action: "issued for the collection of any debt contracted after the adoption of this constitution."

Mr. BRITAIN—I desired to make a few remarks in relation to this principle of exemption before the subject is disposed of, and I hope the committee will bear with me for the purpose.

In the beginning, allow me to premise by saying that I believe there is not a man in this Convention, nor in the State of Michigan, who will not be found, upon mature investigation, to be in favor of the principle of exemptions. Why, sir, without it no man would be permitted to use anything of value while he remained a debtor. The last articles of food and clothing might be taken by the creditor. Yes sir, even the prepared breakfast of the hungry family might be taken to fatten the swine of the creditor, and the person of the debtor might be manufactured into soap for his benefit. Sir, humanity shudders at the thought of such enormities! All men find themselves in favor of exemption, and the only difference existing between parties is as to the amount to be exempted.

Before entering upon the investigation of this difference of opinion, I beg permission to call the attention of the committee to an error into which persons are very likely to fall when legislating upon this or any other subject. They forget the imperfections of humanity, and forget every thing else except the particular thing upon which they are then engaged, and calculate upon the attainment of perfection in that particular thing. For instance, if we take a man who is engaged in loaning money at high rates of interest, and in buying notes at a discount, what kind of a collection law would he expect at your hands? Why, sir, without thinking of the necessities of the wife, the children or the neighbors of the debtor, he would, like the gentleman from Wayne, expect a law which would secure to him a perfect fulfillment of every contract made by him with his less sagacious neighbors, or a remedy which would be as fatal to their happiness as the inquisition of Spain. What would any other person, engaged in any active business, expect at your hands? Why, sir, he would expect a law which would secure the perfect accomplishment of all his undertakings under it.

Mr. Chairman, there is such a thing as friction in machinery, and the mechanic who does not make allowance for it is behind the age. Imperfection is also stamped upon everything which pertains to humanity; and this Convention, when thinking of this subject alone, must come to the conclusion that it is not possible to frame a law which shall, in all cases and under all circumstances, accomplish what its framers desired to accomplish.

Mr. Chairman, I now beg leave to go back to the principle of exemptions. I have already stated my opinion that every man was in favor of exemptions, and that the only real difference of opinion was in regard to the amount to be exempted. In ascertaining the specific amount which should be exempted, I think we should ascertain what interests are to be affected by it, and what the well being of those interests requires; and in this way, there will, I think, be very little difficulty in ascertaining the amount; for, in truth, there is but little difference between the real wants of the different members of society.

Now, sir, what are the great interests to be affected by exemptions, and what does the well being of those interests require? The great interests to be affected are undoubtedly three:—the debtor interest, the public interest, and the creditor interest; and I am equally confident that we shall find that the well being of each of these interests requires the same thing.

1st. What does the interest of the debtor require? It certainly must be manifest to every observing person that the interest of the debtor requires that he should have a sufficient amount exempted to sustain his own life and the lives of his family, to secure to him his books of profession, tools of trade, teams, and implements of occupation, and whatever is necessary to enable him to prosecute some industrial pursuit, until he can pay his just debts. These are undoubtedly what the debtor interests require.

2d. What does the public interest require? And I am here asked what the public has to do with this matter? Why, sir, if the public has nothing to do with this matter, who has any thing to do with it? Are the people not interested in keeping in every man's hands the ability to support himself and his family, and even to educate them, and thereby prevent them from becoming chargeable upon the public for support? Is not that so? And have not the public a right to say by their laws to every man, beforehand, "if you trust A., B. or C., you must trust him only for what he may be able to pay, over and above what is necessary for the support and education of his family?—and you shall not take from him his last farthing, turn him and his family out upon the world, a burden upon society for us to support?" If they have not a right to say that, I confess I do not know what they have a right to say; and I therefore repeat the question: What does the public interest require? It certainly requires just what the debtor interest requires. It requires a sufficient amount of the right kind of property to be exempted to enable the debtor to support himself and family, prevent them becoming chargeable upon the public for support, and to pursue some industrial calling until he can pay his just debts.

3d. What does the interest of the creditor require? When I speak of the interest of creditors, I mean the whole creditor interest, and not the interest of one creditor, who may collect his debts at the expense of all the other creditors. Does not the creditor interest require precisely what the interest of the debtor and the interest of the public require? Does not the interest of the creditor require that the debtor should have exempted a sufficient amount of property to enable him to support his family more cheaply than they can be supported for him, and to follow some industrial pursuit until he can pay all of his creditors? Why, sir, if it is not so, I must confess I have looked upon the creditor interest for the last twenty years to no purpose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the debtor interest, the public interest, and the creditor interest; if all of these great interests require that property enough should be exempted to support the family in the first place, and to enable every man to pursue some industrial calling in the second place, I should like to know what great public interest there is which will be prejudiced by such an exemption? Sir, I have not been able to find any.

Mr. Chairman, there is an active branch of public interest, the well being of which requires such an exemption as I am contending for—I mean public morals. Sir, every community holds each of its members responsible for the support of his own family, under all circumstances. Now, sir, how can a man support his family honestly when you permit the creditor to strip him of the means of supporting them. Sir, he cannot do it. The only way in which he can support them, if exemption be denied him, must be by a fraudulent concealment of his property; and so imperiously does public sentiment demand of him the support of his family as to compel him to commit this fraud upon the law, and to justify him for doing so. Now, sir, is it not manifest that your laws should be in conformity with public sentiment, and so framed that the citizen may perform all the duties required of him by public sentiment and public interest without violation of law? And how can you expect a conscientious respect from any portion of the community for a law which another portion of the same community not only violate with impunity, but even with approbation?

What do the opponents of this measure propose to do? Do they attempt to promote any one of these great interests? Have they attempted to show that any great general interest would be prejudiced by the passage of an exemption law? No, sir; they have carefully avoided all discussion of general principles, and have endeavored to defeat the article by making objections which merely refer to the details of the bill, and have nothing to do with the great principle involved.

Mr. Chairman, what is the object of the friends of this article? It is, sir, to protect and promote each of those great interests of which I have been speaking. In what manner do we propose to accomplish this desirable end? Why, sir, simply by leaving enough in the hands of the poor debtor to enable him to live honestly, until he can meet all his obligations, and thus, so far as relates to the necessities of life, placing him upon the same footing as the rich man.

This would of course promote the debtor interest, by enabling the debtor to live until he can pay his debts. It would protect the public interest by relieving the public from the support of the debtor's family. It would protect and even promote the creditor's interest, by preventing one creditor from destroying a debtor to the prejudice of all the other creditors. It would improve public morals by removing all necessity for theft, perjury and fraud, and enable you to punish every violation of law as an unnecessary crime; and it would, in my opinion, secure more happiness, more honesty, and a larger amount of property in the hands of the whole people for the support of life, than could be secured by any other measure.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before taking my seat, I wish to call the attention of this Convention to two things:

1st. The value of life, compared with that of property, in the estimation of the people.

2d. The value of life, compared with that of property, as shown by the legislation of the different nations of the world.

I know, sir, it will be said on first thought, that this is no comparison, and in truth I think there is none. If you have a shipwreck or a conflagration, and the loss of property and of life, do you stop to think over the mere loss of property? Or, even suppose some wealthy man becomes a sufferer, both pecuniarily and physically, what would you think of the neighbor who would condole with him about his losses, instead of sympathising with him in his sufferings? Would you not say he knows nothing of the claims of humanity? These are the sentiments I have heard advanced by the great body of the people from my earliest recollections; and they are proof to me of the very high estimate in which life is held by a great majority of the people, when compared with property.

But, sir, has this general sentiment of the people directed the legislation of this or any other age, and become engrafted upon the institutions of this or any other country? Has the legislation of this or any other country been for the people, and the property only as a necessary support of the people? Sir, it is not so. The legislation of the age and of the world has been for property, not for life; and life, as estimated by the civil institutions of the age, is not worth two-and-sixpence. It is in fact worth nothing in the eyes of the law, when compared with property. Capital and the companies of capitalists have filled your halls of legislation, and have given to the owner of property an individuality of possession which places property entirely above the claims of humanity.

Go with me into Ireland, where, a few years ago, thousands were dying from starvation, whilst the store-houses were loaded with provisions in the midst of that starving, dying population; yes, sir, even provisions which had been produced by the labor of that starving population, and ask what life was worth then compared with property. The price of subsistence was enhanced by its scarcity. The profits of the property-holder were increased by the distresses of the country, while under the protection of the strong arm of the law he saw his neighbors dying, one after another, for the want of a few shillings with which to purchase from him a portion of the food which their own sweat and toil had furnished him with.

The sympathies of our citizens were aroused throughout the length and breadth of the land, and our ships, laden with provisions, crossed the Atlantic to relieve the distresses of the destitute; but who ever heard the right of the famishing laborer to take without pay one shilling's worth of his landlord's provisions advocated? Or who ever heard questioned the right of the landlord to hold every shilling's worth of his property until paid for it? It was said, I believe with truth, that in some instances the arrival of our provision ships was hailed with indignation by the property holders, from a fear that the price of provisions would be cheapened thereby. Of how much value was life, compared with property, in that country?

Mr. Chairman, I have now reached what I consider to be a critical point in the argument, and I do not wish to be misunderstood. It is no part of my object in this investigation to weaken this individuality of possession. This would be looking to the wrong quarter for a remedy, and I would much sooner even strengthen it; but it is my object to show the propriety of permitting every individual to extend his individuality of possession over a sufficient quantity of the necessities of life to banish famine from his dwelling. Nor have I called this subject before the Convention merely to excite indignation against the property holder; but on the other hand, I am always willing to attribute things done to the best motives, and to make the best apology for poor, erring humanity of which I am capable. While some of the property holders sold their provisions from choice, for a high price, no doubt there were others who sympathized deeply with their suffering neighbors, and would have relieved them if they could have done it with safety to themselves. But as but a small portion of the people had been engaged in producing subsistence, there was not a sufficient quantity in the country for its inhabitants. Had they opened their doors to the starving multitude, they would soon have been starving themselves; and they were compelled, by the law of self-preservation, to see their neighbors subjected to all the horrors of starvation. But, Mr. Chairman, what does all this prove? and what ought we to learn from it? Why, sir, it proves at least two things.

1st. That there is no safety or security for life in any system which permits a large portion of the necessities of life to be monopolized by a few individuals.

2d. The estimate placed upon life by the great body of the public, when compared with property, forbids the taking of the necessities of life from an individual, under any pretence whatever.

As representatives of a part of the public, we ought to learn that it is an imperious duty, under the instruction of this public sentiment, to secure to every man's hands, beyond all possible contingency, the ability to support himself and family.

And we ought, also, as the representatives of a part of that public, to feel that it is our imperious duty, under the instruction of this public sentiment, to secure to every family, beyond every possible contingency, the ability to support themselves, by prohibiting the alienation of the homestead without the consent of the wife, and thus forever, so far as we are concerned, put an end to that system of monopoly in subsistence which makes the price of bread the price of life.

Mr. Chairman, I have, I think, shown the debtor interest, the public interest, and the creditor interest, all require the establishment of the exemption policy. I have confined myself to general principles, because no principle which is right in itself should be rejected because individuals differ about the operation of the details necessary to its establishment. It would be equally practicable to answer the numerous objections which gentlemen have so ingeniously urged against the necessary details for the purpose of drawing the attention of the committee from the real merits of the bill. I should delight to do it; but as that belongs to the Legislature, and not to this Convention, I will not.

Mr. Chairman, I am extremely grateful to the committee for the kindness with which they have listened to me during this discussion, and will no longer trespass upon their patience.

Mr. DANFORTH—I hope the friends of this article will let it come to a vote. There is not a member in this chamber who does not know that the whole matter lies in a nut shell. I hope that no farther time will be lost in the discussion of this article. Every man is familiar with this question of the exemption of property. I hope there is a large majority in this committee in favor of the principle. It would be difficult to collect a hundred men in this State who would go against it—in fact it is what the people demand at our hands. There is no necessity for further discussion upon this subject, for every one is well acquainted with all the bearings of the question.

The question was then taken upon Mr. ROBERTSON's motion to strike out, and was lost.

The amendment offered by Mr. J. D. PIERCE was agreed to.

Mr. TIFFANY, on leave, then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MASON moved to strike out the words "resident of," in the first line, and substitute in lieu the words "person in."

The motion was not sustained.

Mr. TIFFANY moved to strike out "resident," and insert instead the word "householder," which was not agreed to.

The second section was then read, as follows:

"The homestead of every family of not less than forty acres, which shall not be included in any city, village, or recorded town plat, or in lieu thereof, any lot in any city, village, or recorded town plat, shall not be subject to forced sale for any debt hereafter incurred; nor shall the owner of such homestead, if a married man, alienate the same by any deed of conveyance, without the consent of his wife, obtained in due form of law."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend by striking out the words "less" and "forty," in the first line, and substituting therefor the words "more" and "eighty."

Mr. R. said it seemed to him that eighty acres were enough for any man to have exempted. He made this motion because the people of his county instructed him to go for an exemption to that amount. He was in favor of a homestead exemption, but was for leaving personal exemptions to the control of the Legislature.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped that the motion would not prevail. This provision was in accordance with the law as it now stood. The section left it in the power of the Legislature, in whom he, as well as the gentlemen from Wayne and Macomb, [Messrs. FRALICK and ROBERTSON,] had some confidence, to increase the amount whenever the people might desire.

The motion was not sustained.

Mr. FRALICK moved to insert after the word "the," in the first line, the word "recorded." He would be glad to have this word inserted, so that every man could know what a homestead was. In his opinion it was right, and the interests of the community demanded, no matter what this homestead might be, that the public should know it as such—know that it was property covered by the provisions of this article.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE was sorry to be obliged to oppose this amendment. He trusted that the friends of the provision would not be deceived by the motion. If this word was inserted, the effect of the provision would then be that a family could be turned out of their homestead, if it were not "recorded."

Mr. COMSTOCK expressed himself as being opposed to the amendment.

The question on the adoption of the amendment was then put and lost.

Mr. COOK moved to amend by inserting after "plat," in third line, as follows: "or an amount of land equal in quantity to one lot in such village or city on which the dwelling house is situated."

The motion was not sustained.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to insert after "incurred," in third line, the words "except for the purchase money thereof."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I think there is no necessity for that. The man who sells the property will no doubt take care of his own interests by a mortgage upon the land.

Mr. ROBERTSON—What effect will the last provision have unless you insert, "except for the purchase money, &c.?" Cries of question—question.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. TIFFANY moved to insert after "plat," in 3d line, the words "to the value of one thousand dollars."

Which was disagreed to.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to strike out "forty," in line one, and insert "eighty."

But the committee refused to so amend.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 were then severally read as follows:

"Sec. 3. The homestead of any family upon the death of the owner thereof, shall likewise be exempt from the payment of his debts, contracted after the adoption of this constitution, in all cases where any minor children shall survive the death of such owner, for their benefit and support during minority.

"Sec. 4. Whenever the owner of any homestead shall decease, leaving a widow, but no children, the same shall also be exempt, and the rents and profits thereof shall accrue to her benefit during the time she shall remain a widow; provided she be not the owner of a homestead in her own right.

"Sec. 5. The real and personal estate of every female, acquired before marriage, and all property to which she may afterwards become entitled, by any gift, grant, inheritance or devise, shall be and remain the estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for the debts, obligations or engagements of her husband."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again; but the committee refused to rise.

The article entitled "Punishment of Crimes" was then taken up.

Mr. WOODMAN moved that the article be passed over for the present, which was not agreed to.

The article was then read, as follows:

"Sec. 1. The punishment of death is forever abolished in this State."

Mr. CRARY moved as a substitute for the article the following: "Human life shall be held inviolable."

The substitute was not sustained.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of the article entitled "Township Officers and Government;" which was read, as follows:

"Sec. 1. The duties of each organized township shall be performed by one supervisor, one township clerk, one school inspector, not exceeding four justices of the peace, and not exceeding four constables. The legislature shall provide for their election, and define their respective duties."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out "the duties of," in the first line, and insert "there shall be elected in;" but the committee refused to so amend.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to strike out "duties of," and insert "township government of," which did not prevail.

Mr. ALVORD moved to strike out "one school inspector," in second line; but the committee refused to strike out.

On motion of Mr. N. PIERCE, the following was added to second line: "and so many overseers of highways as there are highway districts."

On motion of Mr. HASCALL, the words "and terms of office," were added to the end of the section.

Mr. GALE moved to insert after "treasurer," the words "two highway commissioners, one poor master."

On motion of Mr. NEWBERRY, "two" was stricken out, and "one" inserted.

The amendment of Mr. GALE was then adopted as amended.

On motion of Mr. ALVORD, "and compensation" was inserted at the end of the section.

On motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, the committee rose, reported progress and asked leave to sit again on the article under consideration, and to be discharged from the consideration of articles entitled "Exemptions and the Rights of Married Women," and "Capital Punishment." The committee, then, through their chairman, reported back the article entitled "Exemptions and the Rights of Married Women," with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Convention was asked; and the article entitled "Capital Punishment" without amendment.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The PRESIDENT called the Convention to order.

A quorum of members being in attendance,

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the Convention was resolved into a committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. HANSCOM in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Township Officers and Government."

Mr. CHURCH offered the following as a substitute for the article:

ARTICLE —.

Townships and Township Officers.

"1. Each township, duly organized by law, shall be a body corporate and politic, with such rights, duties, powers, privileges and immunities, and such powers of local legislation, to be uniform throughout the State, as shall be prescribed by law. All suits and proceedings by or against any township shall be in the name thereof. And there shall be elected in each township three supervisors, who shall hold their offices for three years; two school inspectors, who shall hold their offices for two years; and annually, on the first Monday in April, a township clerk, township treasurer, and such number of constables and overseers of highways as may be provided by law. The supervisors and school inspectors, at their first election, shall be divided by lot into numbers, so that one supervisor and one school inspector shall be elected annually."

Mr. CRARY called for a division of the question, and moved that the first part of the foregoing, to and including the word "thereof," should stand as a new section of the article.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then turned upon adopting the residue of the proposition as a substitute for section 1; and the same being put, was lost.

On motion of Mr. BACKUS, the following was substituted for section 1:

Sec. 1. There shall be elected by the people annually, on the first Monday of April, in each organized township, one supervisor, one township clerk, one township treasurer, one school inspector, not exceeding four constables, and one overseer of highways for each highway district in such township, in whom, together with the justices of the peace, not to exceed four, shall be vested the township government, to be defined and limited in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe.

Mr. BUSH offered the following as a substitute for the article:

Sec. 1. All city, town and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose. All other officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed, as the legislature may direct.

Sec. 2. When the duration of any office is not provided by this Constitution, it may be declared by law; and if not so declared, such office shall be held during the pleasure of the authority making the appointment.

Sec. 3. The time of electing all officers named in the article shall be prescribed by law.

Sec. 4. The Legislature may declare the cases in which any office shall be deemed vacant, where no provision is made for that purpose in this Constitution.

The substitute was not adopted.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following, to come in as a separate section:

"The Legislature shall secure to the inhabitants of every United States surveyed township, having fifty inhabitants, a separate organization, provided the township left contain fifty inhabitants."

This (said Mr. B.) might be looked upon, at first sight, as an unimportant amendment. But, if gentlemen would recollect that we had a large amount of unsettled territory, they would see the necessity of encouraging the people of the townships with the certainty that when they had a certain number of inhabitants, they could organize a government for themselves.

The amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. WARDEN, the committee rose, reported the Article back with the amendments, asked the concurrence of the Convention therein, and to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

On motion, the article entitled "Township Officers and Government," with the amendments thereto, reported from the committee of the whole, was laid upon the table, and the committee discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The article entitled "Exemptions and the Rights of Married Women," was then taken up, and the question being upon concurring in the amendment made by the committee of the whole, the Convention concurred therein.

The article being then open to further amendment,

Mr. MASON moved to amend by striking out the words "resident of," in the 1st line of section 1, and inserting in lieu thereof, the words "person in."

I offered this (said Mr. M.) in committee of the whole, but it was rejected there. I hope, however, that the Convention, on reflection, will adopt this amendment. I trust that those who have expressed a warm friendship for foreigners coming into this State, will support the motion. I think gentlemen will see the justice of this proposition. Suppose a family emigrate from Canada, or from N. Y., to this State, with the expectation of living in the western part of Michigan, and on their way there, a creditor pursues them and attaches their household property—would the provision as it now stands in the section, exempt that property? It would not; for the owner of the property would not be a "resident" until he reached his home. A man is not a "resident" by merely crossing over the State line. He is not one until he has a fixed and established residence. Even if it were true, as had been intimated by some gentlemen, that the moment an emigrant passes the State line he is a resident, yet it would be a question open to litigation. Gentlemen will certainly admit that it is a question of some doubt. It is one of doubt in my mind. I can see no objection to the amendment, at any rate, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. HANSCOM—I regard the amendment as entirely unnecessary. In my opinion the term "resident," as used here, embraces every human being; and the moment a man sets his foot within the limits of the State, he becomes a resident. It strikes me that the other word which has been suggested in lieu of the word "resident," would lead to some confusion. The word which we now use in the section has a fixed, determined meaning, and is much better.

Mr. CRARY—I suppose the word "resident" is sufficient to cover all the ground which we desire to cover in this article. I believe Judge Story decided that when a man leaves one place of residence with the intention of going to another, the place to which he is going to take up his residence, is his home. Our object is to protect the people of our own State. If persons be going to Illinois, making Michigan a part of their route, they must take care of themselves. However I have no objection to strike out and insert as proposed.

Mr. MASON—There are many men who leave other places for the west without any fixed purpose as to their residence. Who does not know that thousands and thousands start from the east, or the old country, or Canada, with the intention of settling in the west, yet having but a vague idea as to where in the west they will take up their residence? Sir, a great many are driven from Canada by oppressive laws upon the very subject to which this article has a reference. That they may be at liberty, they are compelled to flee to this country. Well, unless they have some fixed locality determined upon, they are not residents, even according to the construction of the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY.] They must have some place in their mind's eye which they have decided to make their home. But how many are there as I before remarked, who entertain nothing but mere vague ideas in relation to their place of residence, who merely intend to "settle in the west?" I confess I do not see how such persons would come within the definition of the word "resident," as used in this section. It is in my opinion entirely too narrow ground to confine our protection to those only who live within our boundaries.

Mr. CORNELL—Does the gentleman intend to protect rogues?

Mr. MASON—I have said no such thing. I do not desire to protect any dishonest man. I say there are very many men, not rogues; honest men who have sacrificed all their property in Canada, and have been compelled to come over here in order to escape imprisonment for their debts. If the words which I propose to insert be not inserted in the constitution, I do think that their property here would be still open to seizure. I ask those who are so fond of advocating the claims of foreigners to come up and support this proposition.

Mr. BAGG—I think the gentleman need not be much troubled about those who come from Canada; for, on a former occasion, I heard him say that they would swear to any thing.

Mr. MASON—I was then talking about people who were drunk voting at elections; nor did I confine my observations to Canadians exclusively.

The question upon adopting the amendment, [Mr. MASON'S,] was then put and lost.

Mr. NEWBERRY moved to strike out the word "less," in the first line of second section, and insert in its stead the word "more."

The yeas and nays being ordered upon the adoption of the amendment, the same were had, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Axford, Backus, Ammon Brown, Burns, Carr, Choate, Church, Comstock, Cornell, Crouse, Dimond, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hathaway, Lee, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Mowry, Newberry, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Sutherland, Tiffany, Wait, White, —32.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Bagg, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Bush, Chandler, Conner, Cook, Crary, Danforth, Eastman, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Lovell, Marvin, Mosher, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, Whitemore, Williams, Woodman, President—40.

So the motion to so amend was not sustained.

Mr. FRALICK—I propose to add to the first section these words: "Provided, such personal property so exempt shall be designated and defined by law."

I think it is necessary, and right, and proper, that if we are to have an exemption, large or small, the property exempted should be defined by law. A man may have $5,000 worth of property, yet there is no way pointed out of ascertaining it. If we are to have an exemption of any kind, let it be defined. If a man shall have four horses, six cows and one hundred sheep, and all the other necessities of a farm, let them be all designated by law, so that all parties may be aware so much is exempted.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE (in his seat)—They are already specified.

The yeas and nays being ordered upon the proposition,

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped the motion to amend would not prevail. The Legislature will have the power to define, and prescribe by law what property shall be exempted. If they do not, it will render this article null and void. That must be seen at once. The Legislature will take care of the matter.

The question was then put and lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Axford, Backus, Ammon Brown, Carr, Church, Cornell, Crouse, Dimond, Eastman, Fraliek, Gibson, Graham, Hathaway, Lee, Moore, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Sutherland, Tiffany, Wait, White, Williams, President—28.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Bagg, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Bush, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Crary, Danforth, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hascall, Leach, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Mosher, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, Whittemore, Woodman—38.

Mr. BACKUS moved to strike out in section 1 the words "exempted to the amount of not less than five hundred dollars," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "exempt."

Mr. B. said he would state briefly his reasons for proposing to so amend. The proposition now before the Convention struck him as involving the whole of the consideration, whether this State was about to sanction or not to sanction the enforcement of debt by the operation of law; or, in other words, were we or were we not to have a system of credit. The will of the Convention to abandon the credit system had been well expressed here by the course they had taken. For his own part, he did not know but that it was the better way. They had withdrawn from the operation of an execution the personal property of every man to the amount of five hundred dollars, to be extended beyond that by legislative enactment.

He, for one, was in favor of providing against the enforcement of a debt by execution. What was the difference in principle between a man's owing a thousand dollars or five hundred—ought not the protection of the provision to extend to the one case as well as to the other; if we were to have the provision at all? Again, if a man got credit to the amount of four or five hundred or a thousand dollars, what was the security which his creditor had for the payment of the debt? The man's honor. Then the same reason that existed for trusting to a man's honor to this amount, equally applied to reposing confidence in his integrity for credit given him to the amount of two or three thousand dollars. If we placed a provision amended as he proposed in our constitution, there would be no proceedings at law, by the forced operation of our legal tribunals, for the enforcement of a debt. It would in fact save a great deal of labor and trouble. He, for one, would say, extend this exemption to the entire of our community—to the entire of our property. If we did not, a poor individual in straitened circumstances would be pounced upon by some 'Shylock,' as was remarked by the worthy delegate from Oakland, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURG,] in tones of thunder, "and the last dollar exacted from him." He would go with the gentleman in exempting them all, and say that no man should be held liable to the amount of one dollar; so that if any one gave credit, it would be upon the honor of the debtor only.

He made the proposition for other reasons; and he would be allowed to remark here that he would prefer to have the subject left to the discretion of the Legislature, to provide according to the exigencies of the times, rather than that this body should fix the minimum and leave the residue open. It was suggested here that if the legislature did not act upon the article by legislative enactment, there would be no exemption. He begged leave to differ from gentlemen in this respect. For on the very face of your fundamental law would be this provision: "The personal property of every resident of this State shall be exempt to the amount of not less than $500 from sale on execution," &c., &c. There was not a citizen in this State—let the legislature do what it might—the property of whom was not exempted to that amount from any process arising out of our courts of law or equity.

But, there was no limit to the exemption; and whatever controversy there might be, would arise under the execution laws. The officer came with his execution; but who was to decide what was exempted? Here, for instance, was a man with his household furniture, or with the various implements of agriculture; or perhaps he had a set of useless traps which to him made up a subsistence; was the creditor or the debtor to say which made up the $500 exemption? The execution is levied upon all the property except $500 worth. Suppose an individual had $500 worth of hardware, and the creditor was to decide as to what should be exempted. He might strip his debtor of every bed and piece of household furniture he possessed, and leave him homeless and almost houseless, with a set of hardware stoves. (Laughter.) In fact he would go farther than other gentlemen, and would say that no debts hereafter to be contracted should be predicated in any way upon the property of the debtor, or any property hereafter accruing to him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND—I would suggest to insert the word "real," after the word "personal."

Mr. BACKUS (in his seat.)—"Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." The second section has that in it already.

Mr. SUTHERLAND observed that the gentleman last up said he was willing to go as far as other gentlemen, in exempting property. He concurred with him in all he had stated. But he desired him to extend his generosity a little further, and let every person have exempted whatever little real property he might, from time to time, become possessed of.

Mr. BACKUS remarked that he would, in the second section.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (continued)—One of the principal reasons that he had for supporting this provision was, that it was a simple one, so that whatever exemption we would have, would be in simple and plain language. Our present exemption laws were attended with a great deal of litigation; but if this proposition [Mr. BACKUS] be carried, the matter was forever put at rest. There would be much litigation prevented; and for that reason, amongst others, he was in favor of the provision. He was for simplifying the laws. He was in favor of making them so plain that the wayfaring man (not a fool) could understand them. He desired that all should avail themselves of the benefit of this law; that there should be no more of the risk and hazard attendant upon the collection of debts, so that the debtor might spurn from his side the importunate creditor, and stand upon his own dignity. Then the State would no longer be cursed with that species of litigation which it had been proverbial for. Then men would adopt a different system in their commercial relations; and the intercourse between men and men assume a different character. People would not make such use of their time and ingenuity in cultivating a dishonest disposition as they would, if all occasion for it was put out of their reach. He desired to be understood as emphatically in favor of this proposition; and he wished it to be known that he supported the provision because it was so simple, and far-reaching in its consequences, and would have such an influence on society as to make all upon a level. It would enable the poor man, who had heretofore been a grovelling creature, not daring to lift his head, to raise his nose in scorn at his creditor, who could no longer prowl after him, seeking importunately for the satisfaction of his demands. That was one reason why he would vote for it.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I recollect hearing in the Legislature of this State in 1837, just such arguments as have been used here, against non-imprisonment. They said, "you cannot get a doctor to visit a poor sick man unless you put him in the prison; or the lawyer to come and do his business." Nor can you point out a single argument that was not against it—some in honesty, and some in irony. I have only to warn the friends of this measure against all such proffered friendship, for "Judas betrayed his Master with a kiss."

Mr. N. PIERCE—I am very much surprised at the remarks of the gentleman who sits very near me, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE.] He has opened the door to protect the debtor, and now because it is proposed to open it a little more, he thinks the measure is going to be betrayed.

It must be known by every gentleman that the law exempting property from execution, at first, covered but a very few articles. It has been increased from time to time, until it has reached its present amount. I recollect the time when the non-imprisonment question was brought up in the Legislature. It was said that it would be repealed—that it would not become the standard law of the State. There is not a man who tried to carry the repeal of it—there never was a petition for such a move. Since that time there has been a homestead exemption, and the gentleman who has charged other members with presenting their measures, brought up that bill, and stuck to it from day to day until he got it passed.

He [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] proposes to exempt $500 worth of all the property of every man in the State. That will cover the personal property of four-fifths of the men who keep house in this State. Then there will not be more than one-fifth that will not have $500 worth of property.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—Does that question come up in this article?

Mr. N. PIERCE—I do not care. I had an amendment drawn up, similar to the one offered. I am for leaving the article so that all the personal property in the State should be exempt. The laws have been such of late years, that I never have thought of suing a man. This is the proper place for repealing all the laws for the collection of debts. We have been told a great deal about our hard-hearted creditors, by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH.] Now, sir, since the formation of this State, there has not been any thing but a continual legislation to exempt the debtor's property. First, the bed is exempted; then comes his personal property; and now, because it is proposed to extend this exemption to all the property in the State, the gentleman [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] gets up and says he is betrayed. I have no doubt that complete exemption will become the law of the land in some years, if we should not establish it in our constitution. I think that every man in this body, on reflection, will believe as I do, that if it is not done to-day, it will be at a future time. Now, I am in favor of taking the gentleman's bill, and saying in addition to it, that all property shall be exempt. I do not want to have the sheriff bothering about to see what is exempted, and what is not.

I have lived under this government. I do not know that I have ever suffered any thing by this exemption system. I have never lost any thing by suing a man and paying costs, for the reason that I never sued any one. I hope this amendment will be adopted, for I am sincere in what I say.

Mr. FRALICK—As I remarked this morning, I am opposed to this article. I will go with gentlemen to abolish all laws for the collection of debts, if we are to have an exemption at all. It will place every one on a level, and it will do away with all invidious distinctions. And, further, the gentlemen who constitute what is termed the bar, will wander about the streets briefless.

There will be no courts; there will be no ambiguity in finding out what a man possesses; and there will be no difficulty about people having property over and above $500. The people will be left entirely to their honor and integrity, and they will not be put to those miserable shifts to defeat their creditors, to which they are now obliged to resort. Let us say that these collection laws shall be entirely abolished—we have, to a certain extent, in this article as it now stands.

The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] is afraid that we are about to betray him. I do not see how the gentleman can possibly oppose such a measure as this—such a fair and liberal proposition. Under the system proposed, all the great expense of sustaining courts for the collection of debts is avoided; the bar is done away with, and hundreds of thousands of dollars will be saved to the State. Who can say that it is not right? Put the creditor and the debtor on their honor, and let the business between them be done as it is in the great commercial cities of the country. There the question asked is, does the man pay his note when due? If the answer be in the affirmative, it is all right; if in the negative, his credit is bad, and he sinks in commercial opinion.

In truth, I want to go back to the days when confidence was put in a man's honesty—to the platform from which we were forced long ago by this unfortunate credit system, into our present system of dishonesty in business transactions. I think the proposition now before the Convention will effect that object, as well as many other important reforms, and it shall receive my hearty support.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I am glad to see the gentleman desirous of establishing honesty. He is ready to go back to those days of honesty when men could be imprisoned for debt. That is going back, truly. He is for going back to the good old days of honesty, when a man could be shut up in gaol for debt. So I understand him.

Mr. FRALICK (in his seat) denied the construction which the gentleman put upon his observations.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—This provision of the article leaves it open to the people to act upon it hereafter. The Legislature cannot reduce the exemption to a lower amount; but may increase it to whatever amount they may see fit. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. BUSH was in favor of the amendment. He understood it was to effect all personal property. The discussion on this day and yesterday satisfied him that it was the true policy. Yesterday gentlemen labored hard to convince the Convention that an independent Supreme Court was absolutely necessary. When the record, however, was consulted, it was found that on an average but twenty-nine cases were decided in that court in each year for the last four years. Taking the amount of the judges' salaries, which must be between $5,000 and $8,000, together with the lawyers' costs, it altogether, he believed, amounted to more than the money in litigation between the parties. If we adopted this proposition, we would be saved all that expense—the keeping up of that form of our government known as the judiciary, and in effect turn those gentlemen out to grass. [A VOICE: What gentlemen?] The professional gentlemen. They would have to turn and till the earth for their livelihood: it would be a glorious time. We might not go back so far as the days of the jubilee, adverted to by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] but we could adopt this principle in the fundamental law of the land, and much benefit would accrue from it. We could close the business relations now existing according to our present plan, for he was not in favor of a retrospective provision. This article, amended as proposed, could not do any one harm—the circumstances of the country would be adapted to the provisions of the constitution. It would save an immense amount of expenditure, as he had said, although the gentleman from Calhoun intimated that this amendment was brought forward by the enemies of the article. He never had been an enemy of exemptions. He would go to the fullest extent for exemption, no matter how far, so that it was prospective, and would not interfere with contracts existing under the present law.

He hoped the gentleman would not get up here and say that an endeavor was made to betray him with a kiss. Let the gentleman give his reasons and arguments to show him [Mr. B.] that his position in regard to this amendment was wrong. He always listened to him [Mr. PIERCE] with pleasure, and would be happy to listen to a detail of all the evils which his prolific imagination could summon up as being attendant on this plan. But he did not think that he should say we were desirous of betraying the cause of exemptions, without giving sound reasons.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I could give a million of reasons. There is one reason that will satisfy the friends of the article that this amendment is inexpedient, and it is a good reason. You never can advance further than public sentiment will warrant. The public sentiment will sustain this provision as it stands in the article—it will sanction it. Public opinion warrants it, and will carry it through, and sustain it. This single article will gain more votes for the instrument you are framing, than any other you can put into the constitution. But it may be a matter of doubt, if you adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BACKUS,] if we be not going farther than public opinion warrants. You are to adapt your laws and constitution to existing circumstances; and that reformer cannot be considered a wise man who goes beyond what public sentiment will sustain. If he go beyond it, he is powerless—he is lost. But so far as public sentiment is prepared to go, he may go, and no farther. I hope every friend of the measure will vote against this amendment.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I wish to compare the gentleman's sentiments with public opinion. Public sentiment has sustained, for the last four or five years, an exemption of property to the amount of $750. The gentleman proposes $500. Does he wish to be bid off 50 per cent. on public opinion? He has bound public opinion. I don't believe that public opinion did not sustain the exemption law. The article as it now stands protects about four-fifths of the property in the State.

Mr. CORNELL—You may say eight-tenths.

Mr. N. PIERCE—Well, I will say four-fifths. It seems to me that we should let the other one-fifth enjoy what we give to the four-fifths. I believe the representatives of the people in this Convention are prepared to do that.

The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. BACKUS,] has made his mark, and it is a very good one. There is one thing he did not refer to. It is this: we will, by this amendment, do away with all those books that are now used and filled up with writing for carrying on business. Book-keepers and clerks will be saved a great deal of trouble. I am for extending the benefits of this exemption to all.

Mr. LEACH—As I intend to vote for the amendment, I will here inform the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] that I am not one of those who desire to betray him with a kiss. If I believe any thing, I believe the principle embodied in the amendment to be a correct one. I have been for a long time in favor of repealing all laws for the collection of debts. I am decidedly in favor of it. I came here determined to vote for the most liberal exemption provision in regard to property.

The only reason that has been advanced against this amendment is, that public sentiment will not sustain it; that it is far in advance of public opinion. I have my doubts that it is. It may be so, however. But I can speak for my own neighborhood, and can say that a very large portion of the people are almost unanimously in favor of this proposition, and I believe it would be triumphantly sustained by the people of the State. I thought, at first, that the gentleman from Saginaw [Mr. SUTHERLAND] was in favor of the measure, but I find that he is one of those whom the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] is afraid would "betray him with a kiss."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped that the friends of this article would not connect it in any way with the question of repealing the laws relative to the collection of debts.

Mr. CRARY observed that he had heard of passing laws to kill lawyers. (Laughter.) Gentlemen seemed to suppose that all law business was concentrated in the mere collection of debts. Such was not the case. The whole property of the State had to pass through the hands of the legal profession—they had got a dabbling in it since 1836.

He remembered in 1842 or '43, when the exemption law was up, every one wanted to do ten times more than any of the friends of the measure desired. But they came too late—it was of no service—the measure was carried by only one vote. It was said "that public sentiment sanctioned it." That was true; but it was said at that time that public opinion would not sanction the exemption. He thought that the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] had stated the true grounds upon which the exemption should be placed. In regard to the amount, he would say leave it in an ascending scale, for we were told that the public sentiment was going for the abolition of the collection of debts. If we really were going in that direction, then leave this provision in our constitution in such a form that the Legislature might act in accordance with the requirements of the times. If the sum be too high, lower it; if too low, increase it; but at all events let this Convention, in determining this matter, act upon the basis of sound judgment and discretion. But, however, he thought we had gone far enough, for he did not approve of going into extremes.

Mr. WALKER expressed himself as being in favor of the article reported by the committee, because it was right in principle, and no doubt would prove correct in practice. The time would come when the liberal views of the gentlemen from Wayne and Ingham [Messrs. BACKUS and BUSH] would be adopted. But in his opinion the amendment could not be adopted at the present time with safety. This provision was what he believed the mass of the community demanded. The legislature—when the people required it—no doubt would carry out the intentions of the gentleman from Wayne. He hoped the article would be adopted in its integrity.

Mr. BACKUS concurred in the observations made by the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH.] He hoped that all the friends of the proposition would come up and carry it through, in spite of the resistance of his venerable friend from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE.]

Mr. HANSCOM was glad to hear the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BACKUS,] talk upon the exemption side of the question, knowing as every other member of the Convention did, that the gentleman came here entirely opposed to the establishment of any system of exemption, whatever. He was among that class of men who were willing to strip an unfortunate debtor of his last dollar. Even a few minutes ago the gentleman voted against a proposition to make the provision less restrictive than it was. But this adoption of the system which he proposed, supposing him to be serious, would involve him in the most down-right absurdity; and in a measure we would have to suppose him an idiot. What did the friends of exemption look for? Under what act had they lived since 1848? They lived under a system more extended than the one proposed in this article. Was there any danger of injustice being produced by the establishment of this exemption principle? He did not consider that there was. He well remembered when the present exemption law was passed, that one universal cry was set up by the bar of Wayne county: "you are going to take away our business from us." That was the argument made use of. But the Legislature thought that the good of the community, and the cause of humanity should override all personal considerations in the matter. He would say, take any man in this State and ask him what had been the effects of this system. Three classes he contended had been benefited by it—the State, the creditor and the debtor. No man doubted that fact. He had, in truth, yet to learn that instance in which the operation of the system had been other than beneficial to the parties interested.

The gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. FRALICK,] told us to-day, in committee, that this provision would in its effects, prove an extension of the facilities for the commission of crime—for roguery in part.

The statement was not correct in point of fact, for if we razed all the exemption laws on the statute books the rogue was still a rogue, and would laugh at all your attempts to collect your debts from him: there were but too many means for him to place his property beyond the reach of the creditor. If they desired to conceal $20,000 or more they could do so independent of your exemption laws. But there was a higher consideration in this question, and it had been overlooked by all except the gentlemen from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN.] The government was bound to protect itself—to leave in the hands of every man the means of prosecuting the labor by which he and his family were supported, thus forming a common stock of wealth.

He did not know that it would be proper to abolish all laws for the collection of debt at the present time. The period no doubt would arrive when such a measure would be passed; and men would carry on their business transactions upon a system of honor. But gentlemen intimated that this was going to diminish commercial credit. No such thing, because the honest well-meaning man would always obtain credit. This provision would force men to be honest by necessity. It furnished higher motives—it in fine induced men to be honest. He would call upon the friends of the measure to vote down this proposition, [Mr. BACKUS']; he knew that the object in view in presenting the amendment was to destroy the article. We wanted a system that would prove practicable—one that would be in consonance with public sentiment. In his judgment, the plan reported by the committee was eminently so. He thought that the man who endeavored to resist the will of the people would be overwhelmed by public sentiment. The voice of 1842 was again raised, and no man would have the hardihood to say, in defiance of public opinion, in the face of the people, that he would strip the unfortunate debtor of his last farthing, as he had heard some intimate to-day. He hoped the amendment would be voted down.

The question being upon striking out, as moved by the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BACKUS,] the same was then taken by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Axford, Backus, Burns, Bush, Carr, Church, Cornell, Crouse, Dimond, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Hart, Harvey, Leach, Lee, Marvin, Mason, Newberry, Orr, N. Pierce, E. S. Robinson, Sturgis, Sutherland, Town, Wait—27.

NAYS--Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Baggs, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Crary, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Lovell, McClelland, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, White, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman, President—45.

So the Convention refused to strike out.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to strike from the second line of section one, the word "five," and substitute "twelve."

Mr. ALVORD moved the previous question on the article, and the call being sustained, the main question was ordered to be now put on the amendment proposed by Mr. N. PIERCE.

A division having been called, the motion to strike out "five" was lost; and the main question being on ordering the article engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. ALVORD called the yeas and nays, and the same were ordered with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Baggs, H. Bartow, Britain, Bush, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Danforth, Eastman, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Leach, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, Mosher, Mowry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman, President—52.

So the article was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BAGGS, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, (44th day,) July 31.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. STOREY: of 19 citizens of the county of Jackson, on the subject of licences. Laid upon the table.

Also, of 33 citizens of Leoni, Jackson county, praying the insertion of a clause in the constitution prohibiting the employment of convicts in the State Prison in those branches of mechanical labor which interfere with mechanical trades in this State. Referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

MOTIONS.

Mr. McCLELLAND called up the article entitled "Legislative Department."

And the question being on ordering the same to a third reading,

Mr. CRARY moved the previous question, and the same being seconded, the question, shall the main question be now put? was decided in the affirmative.

The article was then ordered to a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Baggs, Barnard, H. Bartow, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Warden, Webster, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman, President—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Axford, Backus, J. Bartow, Bush, Carr, Hanscom, Hart, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, White,—12.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the article was then read a third time by its title, and the question being, shall the article now pass? it was decided in the affirmative.

The article was then, under the rule, referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the article entitled "Finance and Taxation," Mr. MASON in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of Mr. BRITAIN's substitute, offered on the 27th inst., for section 1, to which

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following as an amendment:

Insert in line 5, after "taxes," "except such portion of specific taxes from the upper peninsula as the Legislature may return to the counties and townships thereof."

Mr. B. said—Since the report of the committee, the Convention have adopted an amendment in the educational bill, by which they propose to raise two mills for educational purposes. If it is considered necessary to increase the educational fund, perhaps there can be no better way than the one proposed. The amendment proposes to strike out that part of the original section which applies specific taxes in payment of current expenses. It was thought proper that the current expenses should be paid by direct taxation, as that will keep the attention of the people directed to their current expenses, and prevent them from becoming unnecessarily extravagant.

Mr. J. BARTOW—When the article in the original bill was before us for our consideration, a change was made in the phraseology with reference to these taxes in the upper country; it was then conceded that it was due to that country to leave the question to be adjudicated upon by itself. By the adoption of this substitute, it will put that part of the question where it originally stood; thus annulling the previous action of the committee. I object to this, for the reason that it takes this from the general fund, and gives it to the school and University funds, where it does not so properly belong. Our school fund is destined to become one of the richest funds in the State, and it will doubtless bring about a free school system. So with the University fund; it is destined to be amply sufficient for the purposes of the University. What need, then, of applying these specific taxes, when the only fund that really needs it is the general fund, to lighten the burden of taxation. This tax is levied from a particular class, and it is not by law appropriated to any particular object; it should therefore be employed to lighten the general taxation—applied to the current expenses of the State.

I hope it will be stricken out; it has no business here. No fundamental law should say that we will take so much money from the general fund, and apply it to this purpose. I think that the section is radically wrong.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I wish to correct an erroneous impression; that is, that the interest of the primary school fund will keep up a free school system. There are 640 acres in each town; call that worth $4 per acre, and you have the gross amount, $2,560; the interest at seven per cent. is $179 to each township; and if there are but $179 to each township, schoolmasters must be cheap. If the gentleman from Genesee has based his statements upon the supposition that the primary school fund would support a free school system, he must see that his opinion is erroneous. Some school lands may sell for more than the sum I estimated, but $200 is the utmost that can be calculated upon in the average of the townships.

Mr. FRALICK—I am opposed to the section. I think that we should not specify how the funds are to be employed. I want them put in the treasury where they have been heretofore placed. I do not want thus to go into detail; it is not only unnecessary, but it is wrong. I have endeavored to leave the matter open in the educational bill, that the Legislature may increase the tax if necessary. I do not see the propriety of restricting the tax for the purposes of education. The gentleman from Macomb says that the primary school fund will not enable us to have free schools; and a tax of two mills may not be sufficient.

By estimating property at its cash value, a tax of two mills may bring us in $200,000; but, although that might bring it nearer, it might not be enough, if the people fully resolve upon a free school system. I want the specific taxes to go into the treasury. I want the interest of the primary school fund paid from year to year; the interest of the State debt paid yearly, which is provided for; a sinking fund for the payment of the principal of the State debt; the educational fund left so that the fund can be raised if the Legislature see fit—not limited as it is now. I propose to offer a substitute which will cover the whole section, to stand as section one:

"The Legislature shall provide for an annual tax, sufficient, with other sources of income, to defray the estimated expenses of the State, including the interest on the debt of the State for each year; and whenever the expenses of any year, including such interest, shall exceed the income and such tax, the Legislature shall provide for levying a tax the ensuing year, sufficient with other sources of income to pay the deficiency, as well as the estimated expenses of such ensuing year, including such interest."

Gentlemen (said Mr. F.) will perceive that if the revenue falls short, it must be made up the next year, by an additional taxation. I hope that instead of the original section, the substitute will be carried.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he differed entirely from the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. FRALICK.] He was opposed to excepting the specific taxes laid on the Companies of the upper peninsula. Indeed he was against giving the upper peninsula any separate organization. He, for one, would not consent to any imperium in imperio. When the Legislative department is under consideration, it should be embraced. When the Judicial department is matured, it should include the upper peninsula in its plan. It is a part and parcel of the State. For weal or wo, we are united under one State government, responsible to the same legislation and same courts. The whole government must be the same, and identified. All specific funds collected there should come into the common treasury, and their expenses should be honorably and equitably provided for. But as for giving them any distinct, though partial, political existence, he believed it quackery.

It is urged that the specific taxes collected in the upper peninsula should be applied there. He would not now consider whether this claim was founded in equity, and whether we ought not to concede—grant to them as much as $2,500, which is about the sum their taxes amount to the present year; but he was governed by this consideration. We work in the dark. The fund is now only about $2,500. But who can look into the future and tell to what sum it will amount at some future day. Who can tell what untold wealth may lie buried in iron and copper in the lands of the upper peninsula, or how many companies, or how much of aggregated capital may be put in requisition to bring it to light. The specific tax may amount to $100,000. He was unwilling to set a precedent which might absorb it all. The amount now conceded is small, but what is now a concession may be claimed as a right; and while no equitable claim existed for one quarter of the tax, the whole might be sacrificed.

If the specific taxes go entirely into the school fund, all the people of the upper peninsula have an interest, and their children, as well as ours, participate, and perhaps draw more than their proportionate share. The specific taxes on millions invested in our railroads and banks will be divided among them as well as among us. If it does appear that by reason of their singular and anomalous position, the upper counties are entitled to our sympathy and legislative aid, or relief from unfair imposition of taxes, can there be the least danger in trusting the Legislature? For himself, he should be ashamed of any want of justice or generosity. What has this Convention proved? Not only have members from every part of the State shown liberality, but extreme liberality. Whenever the upper peninsula has been named, advocates of her interests have leaped up from every part of the Hall. She has found defenders from every quarter of the State. If there is any one feeling pervading the State, it is that of pride in the possession of a territory abounding in the elements of boundless wealth, such as they believe the upper peninsula to be. We can adopt no possible policy here, or in the Legislature, which will not accord to that region more than numbers, wealth, or even glowing prospects, entitle it to.

With regard to this disposition of the specific taxes, to pay interest of the educational fund, so far from any injustice being done to bond-holders against the State, all he had to say was, that if any debt we owed should be regarded as more sacred than another, it was these educational funds; and why? They were a sacred trust for a sacred purpose. We were trustees; so created by the general government. Our creditors were posterity. Our duties, which no exigency should ever force us to neglect, to the c'est qui trust, to the general government. Besides, we might with propriety be called on to repay the principal of the whole fund, as well as the interest. The State puts in her treasury the whole gross receipts from these funds, and even the creditor of the State derives a positive benefit from this commission, because of the increased ability of the State to tax herself. For the present, perhaps, it might make little difference. We shall be obliged to pay the interest in some way on the school and university funds. The specific taxes will not be adequate to pay interest on these funds and the public debt. But the day may come when there will be a surplus on hand of these specific taxes; and it is the part of a wise policy to determine in this constitution to what purpose they shall be devoted. When the question of education was under discussion, it was argued on all hands, that the two mill tax which we have provided for, and the income of the school fund, would not be sufficient to secure a free school system. Should the day come, then, when we should be possessed of surplus means from this source, to what purpose could they more properly be applied than to swell the school fund? They will be the common property of us all, derived mostly from assessments on foreign capital. A distribution so beneficent as to reach every family in the State, must prove the most satisfactory. On the whole, he must differ from the gentlemen from Genesee, [Mr. BARTOW,] and Wayne, [Mr. FRALICK,] and must regard his duties to the general government, in protecting a sacred trust fund, as equal or superior to all other duties.

Mr. BUSH—The arguments of the gentleman from St. Joseph have convinced me that it is not proper to fix the matter definitely. Who knows the wealth buried in the upper peninsula? Can the gentleman from St. Joseph form the slightest idea? Can we place in this constitution, properly, specifications about the effect of which we are entirely ignorant?

Some allusion has been made to the sacred character of the educational fund. I admit that it is a trust fund, and one so sacred that we ought to pay it; and have we not done so? We have, and done so promptly; and there is no necessity for gentlemen showing so much feeling respecting a matter about which there can be no manner of question.

How can the counties in the upper peninsula carry on their organized government, except you give them what they need? It should be left to the Legislature; then it could gradually be changed, as the wealth of the territory is developed. I hope the first section will be stricken out, that the upper peninsula may be enabled to carry on their local governments; the balance might go to the educational fund.

Mr. HANSCOM—I know, as a fact, that the counties of Schoolcraft, Marquette, perhaps some others, contain very little agricultural land; that the property is chiefly owned by the mining companies, and every gentleman knows that by their charters the tax which they pay excludes them from paying for township and county purposes. Townships and counties which are important, are by these circumstances deprived of the means of sustaining themselves.

Let us, then, leave this to the action of the Legislature. We do not know what the magnitude of the fund may be, and there is no danger by leaving it open. It would be better than fixing definitely a sum about which we know very little, and that intended to last for the next fifteen years. The amount received may be enormous—it may reach half a million, taking the imagination of the gentleman as a basis. One thing is certain; we should not deprive any county of the means of carrying on its local government. We should leave to the Legislature the power to give them assistance as their necessities may require.

Mr. N. PIERCE—A few days since the free schools were so hot it almost burnt. Now it seems very different—free schools have few friends. I think, sir, it ought to be applied to this specific purpose. We then need not probably raise the two mills that we have placed in the educational bill. Although we do not know what the specific taxes may be, they will not meet the requirements of a free school.

The gentleman from Ingham [Mr. BUSH]

tells us that the State has always paid its school interest. It has, but it may not do so. It has not paid interest upon some other bonds; and I wish to provide for the payment of the interest forever.

I will go as far for one county as another—for Mackinac as the county of Monroe. They may have their share of these funds; they may take for their schools their proportion of the central rail road specific tax. I want my share of the specific tax of the mines.

Mr. CORNELL—I am as much in favor of free schools as the gentleman can be; but that is not the question.

Mr. N. PIERCE would refer the gentleman to the substitute for section 1.

Mr. CORNELL—It has been well said that there may be a great amount in the course of a few years arising from the specific taxes from the upper peninsula; if so, should we not leave some for the support of the local government? We might as well lay down the principle that the money received for the support of the State government should go into the school fund. Let us leave it to the Legislature; they may know something. The gentleman himself may be returned, and he can enlighten them. If his wisdom is not so much regarded here, it may be more prized there. If it is not needed for any other purpose, the Legislature can so apply it. I need not go farther, as the gentleman must be convinced of the impropriety of the course proposed by him.

Mr. BRITAIN proposed to strike out the words "in defraying the current expenses of the State."

Mr. B. said—I beg leave to say a word or two. The gentleman from St. Joseph remarked upon the effect that the substitute would have upon the upper peninsula. It at least extends justice to them. It will enable them to receive more money from us than they pay in the shape of specific taxes. It has been said they would have nothing left to pay town and county governments. We can put in a provision empowering the Legislature to return the specific taxes, if it is necessary.

One objection I should like to answer. It has been said that there was but a small quantity of arable land in that section of country. The delegate may be in error. I have had particular descriptions of the country from a person employed for years in the selection of mineral lands for different companies. He assured me that when he went back from the coast a short distance, even among the mountain ridges, he invariably found valleys of fertile land, timbered with basswood, maple, &c. If that kind of timber grows there, it is evidence of the fertility of the soil.

He represented that this would be found the garden for the mining companies, and I believe that it will be found so. The people who have gone there have only thought of the mining interests. They probably thought that the timbered part of the country was a mere impediment in their way. The report of the late lamented Dr. Houghton states that the counties are agricultural in their character, where they recede from the coast. We should be careful how we make distinctions between the upper and the lower peninsula in any one department of the government; for no community can exist together in unity where the legislation is different; the result must be a separation; and gentlemen must be convinced of the truth of this proposition. I have thus given my reasons. This provides a general disposition of this fund for the future, without the expense of further legislation. It does not legislate; it does not mix this up with other funds; and that is the way that I think all funds coming in our hands should be vested—for the good of the whole people of the State.

Mr. GOODWIN—I have an amendment that covers the whole ground, but makes it broader. If it is just in reference to the upper peninsula, it will be just in other cases where there is a large amount of property exempt from taxation, upon account of this specific tax. It is an amendment which I wish to bear upon the Central and Southern rail roads.

[Mr. G. read an amendment, which was not obtained.]

Mr. CRARY—I am opposed to the amendment of the delegate from Wayne, [Mr. GOODWIN,] and to the substitute of the member from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN.] I am opposed to the substitute, because, by reason of the past legislation of the State, it may do injustice to the upper peninsula. By reference to our session laws, it appears that mining companies have been chartered in the upper peninsula with such privileges that, while they are compelled to pay a specific State tax of one per cent on their personal property, the same property is not liable for county and township taxes. In the 21 charters granted in 1848 there is no liability to county and township taxes on their personal property. The real estate being alone liable to such tax. One of the companies chartered in 1849 is not liable to pay any county or township tax on its real or personal estate. These charters are a departure from the principle laid down by the Legislature of 1846, which exacted a certain per centage on the product of the mines. I think this was the correct principle; but having been departed from in a way that the counties and townships would be deprived of nearly all their means of maintaining their local administrations, we ought not to depart from a provision that will prevent future Legislatures from doing justice to the people whose interests are so much affected by the operations of these mining charters.

I will consider the amendment with the substitute, though not strictly in order. The amendment is intended to affect the specific tax on rail and plank roads. This tax should go for the benefit of all the people of the State. When we sold our rail roads, it was the understanding that the tax exacted of the companies on their capital invested, should go to the State, and constitute a fund for the payment of our indebtedness. These roads were State property at the time of sale, and subject to no local taxation. Though sold, they are in a measure public property still. There was no good reason why the city of Detroit should be allowed to collect a local revenue out of the capital of the Central rail road invested in cars and locomotives, or in steamboats. The car and locomotive station was at Detroit, but the cars and locomotives, though at Detroit long enough every day for taxation purposes, were, nevertheless, for the benefit of the whole road, and passed over the whole road. There was no reason why Detroit should tax them, which might not apply to every village and township through which the road passes.

I in part represent a county that has the central station on this road. At this station is always kept a large amount of the company property. The county would be largely benefitted by the tax on this property. But it was satisfied with the benefits to be derived from the operations of the road, and was willing the tax on the property should go to the State. This is my opinion of the views of those whom I in part represent, and they are views founded in justice and in good faith to every other portion of the State.

In order that this question may not be made the subject of future legislative log rolling, I have been in favor of placing the avails of these specific taxes above legislative control. Now is the time to set them apart, and in a way that they may benefit every individual in the State. Let them be appropriated to pay the interest due to the educational funds, and to pay our other State indebtedness. When this is paid, let them constitute a part of the educational interest fund. Do this in the constitution, and local interests will not hereafter prevail over the public good.

Mr. WILLIAMS regarded the last argument of the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] as specious and deceptive. He is now afraid of a legislative scramble, a grab, and he conveys an imputation of dishonest motives upon the Legislature. The other day he thought the Legislature immaculate in its integrity and wisdom. And by the way, the gentleman from Monroe the other day declared the people had been taught to regard the Legislature as corrupt on one subject, and the next day on another subject he would trust them with unbounded discretion. It seems the Legislature is black or white, honest or dishonest, corrupt or incorrupt, according to the emergencies of the occasion, or the argument.

But to return to the question. The gentleman was willing to grant to the upper peninsula a concession which he would not to the central counties, because the case was different; because the central counties derived great benefits from the location of the road.

Mr. CRARY would correct the gentleman from St. Joseph. When the sale was made, the agreement was that the proceeds were to go for the benefit of the whole State—that it should not merely be a local benefit.

Mr. WILLIAMS—The gentleman did say, in answer to the President, that the towns on the central rail road did derive from the investments among them advantages beyond any portion of the State. This was true.

It would not be just, however, to consent to the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. GOODWIN.] But still the case was no different, especially taken prospectively in regard to investment of capital in the upper peninsula. Does not that capital scatter peculiar local benefits. Does not the whole business of transportation live upon it? Does it not promote the fisheries and lumber trade, and cause every farmer and mechanic to thrive, and vivify every branch of industry.

Again, the gentleman argues that future Legislatures may impose one-half or one-quarter the present specific tax on mining companies. How does he know what the Legislature will do? How does he know that they will reduce the per centage of tax?

Mr. CRARY—They have done it.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Then it seems those who obtained the earlier charters are unfairly used. It is too much to assume that the policy will be changed. For himself, he might be enthusiastic, but he believed that the investment of capital in iron and copper mining, and all the subsidiary branches of business, would be enormous, and the specific taxes correspondingly large.

On the whole, he must regard both the arguments he had alluded to of the gentleman from Calhoun, as he said on rising, specious and deceptive.

Mr. McCLELLAND thought his remarks correct, that the Legislature might be trusted in some things but not in others. He would trust the gentleman from St. Joseph with any thing except politics, and in that matter he would be the last man that he would trust.

Mr. BAGG—We have got into one of our fits of benevolence. We have, once in a while, a fit of benevolence. We first made the supervisors equal to the Legislature, and in one instance made them superior to the Supreme Court; and upon all these things we have been legislating, and this morning we have got down to local legislation.

What do the people want of us? They look at our actions; they know that half we do is mere legislation, instead of asserting general principles. They send us word by letters and otherwise that it is time to finish our work and go home. I shall vote against every amendment, because the delegate from Berrien goes sufficiently in the extreme, without any additional amendments to carry it further into detail. He goes sufficiently into detail without any body else ramifying it in its various branches. If we go on in this manner, we shall not get home until the middle of winter.

We should report general principles and leave the rest to the Legislature, or better yet, the Supreme Court or the supervisors. Let us leave it where it belongs; not descend to this local legislation; local taxation; and don't let us descend to these little whirlpools of taxation.

Mr. BRITAIN withdrew his amendment.

Mr. GOODWIN—As the gentleman from Berrien has withdrawn his proposition, I do not think it necessary to discuss its merits.

The gentleman from Calhoun has not, by his reasoning, convinced me of the correctness of his proposition with regard to these railroads. I do not consider that the payment of a specific tax should exempt the corporations from paying the town or county tax. I do not see, sir, if the upper counties are to have returned to them for the support of their local government the money that we receive from them in the shape of a specific tax, why other portions of the State should be deprived of the power of taxing corporations for the support of their local government, in consideration of a specific tax; and not have a portion of that tax refunded to them for such purposes. Shall a corporation, adding property to property, within cities, towns and counties, increasing the amount yearly, be allowed to escape all local taxation because they pay a specific tax to the State; and cities, towns and counties, be entitled to no portion of that specific tax. I do not know what opinion gentlemen may entertain of the views which may have influenced the Legislature. One man may express opinions very widely differing from the sense of the majority. We can only know the intent and object of the Legislature through their acts. We cannot take, as a test, the opinions of an individual, or what he may propose. I think, whatever may be our opinion of the future action of the Legislature, we are called upon in this Convention to do what is right.

I will not extend my remarks at present. The other day I presented a resolution passed by the common council of the city of Detroit, requesting the action of the Convention in this matter, which is in charge of the committee of which the gentleman from Berrien is chairman. I shall forbear offering an amendment until the report of shall have come in. With reference to the arguments of my friend from Calhoun, I would now barely say that there is property in Detroit, Marshall and New Buffalo, in the shape of real estate, actually held by the Central rail road company, worth probably half a million; that in the city of Detroit the rail road runs for a considerable distance on the edge of the river, in the most commercial part of the city; that the company has there acquired the property on the border of the river, and made large improvements, increasing the value of its real estate, while it has diminished the relative value of other parts of the city, by drawing the business to its own premises and vicinity. I would ask, as a matter of right and justice, should this immense property be exempt from all local taxation because it pays a specific tax to the State, and no part of that tax is refunded to the cities, towns and counties for local purposes? I shall, however, forbear to urge arguments in its favor, at present, as I shall probably take the opportunity, when the report is presented, to give my views more at large.

Mr. BRITAIN—The resolution of the common council of the city of Detroit was considered by the committee, and the report was considered a sufficient answer. It was, upon further consultation, thought proper to report specially upon the subject of the resolution, and in a few days the committee will have a meeting. I beg leave to answer one remark. I would ask the gentleman from Wayne if the value of real estate is less now than it was at the time the Central rail road company bought the property?

Mr. GOODWIN said that property had become more valuable in general since that time, both in the city and through the country.

The question being upon the adoption of the substitute,

Mr. COOK asked for a division of the question, and section 1 was stricken out.

Mr. FRALICK offered the following as a substitute for the substitute of Mr. BRITAIN:

"The Legislature shall provide for an annual tax, sufficient, with other sources of income, to defray the estimated expenses of the State, including the interest on the debt of the State for each year; and whenever the expenses of any year, including such interest, shall exceed the income and such tax, the Legislature shall provide for levying a tax the ensuing year, sufficient, with other sources of income, to pay the deficiency, as well as the estimated expenses of such ensuing year, including such interest."

The substitute was not adopted.

Mr. CHURCH moved to add to Mr. BRITAIN's substitute the following:

"The foregoing provision shall not apply to specific taxes in the upper peninsula."

But the committee refused to so amend.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to insert after "taxes," in the first line, "not otherwise appropriated by this constitution;" which motion did not prevail.

Mr. BRITAIN'S substitute was then adopted.

Mr. BUSH moved to fill the blank with "80."

Mr. BRITAIN—It is usual to fill blanks at the third reading; there will then be a full opportunity. The Convention have proposed to raise a two mill tax for the support of education. The object of the amendment is to permit the specific tax to go into the educational fund, thereby saving the raising of the two mill tax, leaving it to be applied to the payment of the State debt. I move that the blank be filled with "55."

Mr. BUSH—I am in favor of making it apply only to the year 1880. I do not wish these specific taxes to be placed entirely out of the power of the Legislature, however much the best interests of the State may demand it.

The motion to fill the blank with "80" was lost.

Mr. CRARY understood that the object of the chairman was to give these specific taxes to the school fund, instead of the two mill tax. If so, he thought that 1852 was long enough to wait.

The question then recurring upon filling the blank with "55," it was lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS—This does not take the place of the two mill tax; it merely pays the interest in a different way. I move to fill it with "65," for, in all human probability, the debt will not be paid before that time.

Mr. CRARY said he supposed the interest annually due the school fund was about $17,000. The specific taxes in '52 would probably be $90,000, a sum greater than the two mill tax, while property is valued at its present rates, and with a prospect of its going up to $100,000. If property was assessed at its cash value, the two mill tax might reach two or three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WILLIAMS—That is not correct. We have salt lands granted for the purpose of supporting an agricultural school. Then take $10,000, the interest due upon the University fund, and if we pay the interest due upon all the primary school fund, I doubt whether the specific taxes will be more than sufficient to meet it.

Mr. N. PIERCE would inquire the reason why it should be put off? Whether the State owed to that fund $5,000 or $27,000, it had to be paid. He could see no reason for delaying it, and thought that 1852 was a suitable time.

Mr. BRITAIN said the amount of specific tax in 1849 was $22,550; the one mill tax was about $29,000; but the amount received was about $18,000, owing to a deficiency of collection. The specific tax for the year 1852 will be about $70,000; about equal, or a little more, than the two mill tax, which the Convention proposed a few days ago. If, instead of "52," "53" were inserted, he [Mr. B.] thought there was not much danger in relying upon the estimate of the gentleman from Calhoun. As the educational bill is still in the hands of the Convention, we can give to it all the consideration which it needs, after we have fixed the principles in this bill; and the Convention can still cut off all the taxes that they choose.

The difference between the tax authorized to be levied for the educational fund and the specific tax was so small that there was no difficulty in arranging it now, and afterwards arranging what amount was further necessary when the educational bill was brought before us.

Mr. GALE—I am opposed to filling the blank at all at present. The article on schools has progressed to a certain extent; and it will in my opinion be the best to leave this open until that is completed. It will come up first in order, and will soon be disposed of; then this blank can be filled up with more propriety than at the present time.

The blank was filled with "52."

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of the new sections offered by Mr. BRITAIN.

The question being upon the first, to stand as section 15, the same was not adopted.

Mr. BRITAIN withdrew his proposed section 16.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following as a substitute for the proposed section 17:

"The Legislature shall provide by law for making all assessment rolls which have been returned by collectors, conclusive evidence of the legality of all assessments correctly made, contained therein, and for the correction of repeated and erroneous assessments."

The substitute was not adopted.

Mr. BRITAIN then withdrew the remainder of his proposition made on the 27th.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the committee rose, reported the article with amendments, asked the concurrence of the Convention, and to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the same back with amendments in which the concurrence of the Convention was asked.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the article "Finance and Taxation," as amended in committee, was laid upon the table and ordered printed.

The article entitled "Elections" being before the Convention,

Mr. WHITEMORE hoped that it would be passed over, as an amendment, was thought by the committee, necessary.

Upon the article entitled "County Officers and County Government,"

Mr. R. ROBINSON moved the previous question, which was demanded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The article was then read a third time, and the question being, "shall the article pass?"

Mr. MASON asked the yeas and nays, and the same were taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvoid, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, H. Bartow, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Marvin, McClelland, Moore Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Webster, Williams, Woodman—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Bush, Crary, Dimond, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Mason, Warden, White, Whittemore, President—15.

So the article was passed, and referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

The article entitled "Of cities and Villages" was read a third time, passed, and under the rule referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

Mr. MASON moved to go into committee of the whole on the Judiciary article; but the Convention refused so to do.

The article entitled "Exemptions and the Rights of Married Women" was read a third time, when,

On motion of Mr. MASON, it was laid upon the table.

The article relative to "Capital Punishment" coming up as reported back yesterday by the committee of the whole,

Mr. BAGG moved to strike out the same; when,

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, it was laid upon the table.

Mr. MASON moved to go into committee of the whole on the article entitled "Judicial Department," which was not agreed to.

Mr. COOK called up the article entitled "Corporations," and the question being upon concurring in the amendments made to the same in committee of the whole,

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out the substitute for section two, reported by the committee, and insert in lieu of it, as follows:

"No banking law, or law for banking purposes, nor any act creating or renewing any association or corporation for banking purposes, shall ever be enacted by the Legislature."

Mr. BAGG—I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Oakland will prevail. I was about to make a motion that no bank charter authorized by the Legislature shall have any effect in this State. I am in favor of the motion, for the reason that I am opposed to all banks whatever, except banks of earth. This is a reality; while any bank of paper is only a chimera of the imagination—a deception—not a reality. There never was a bank, and there never will be one, without it is based upon a fraud. Whether it is based upon general laws or special laws, it is an evil; it creates unequal privileges, it enriches the few to the detriment of the many; and the constitution of our government declaring that all shall have equal rights, every bank that is created strikes consequently at the fundamental principles upon which our government is based.

What do they want? What do they ask when they come to the Legislature for a bank charter? They want to go in debt two and a half dollars for every dollar they have in the bank. If you grant them the privilege, contrary to justice and right, they get plates, make a pretty picture, get Gen. Jackson, a sheaf of wheat, or a flock of sheep on the hills. Then they issue their promises to pay, while many have not even the semblance of a real existence. They are like the will-o'-the-wisp; you can see their bills, but you can't find where the bank is located. How many times in the history of this State, have the commissioners tried to find where the banks were located, and, when found, what a bubble was it shown to be.

In order to have equal rights you should let the shoemaker promise to pay two and a half shoes for every shoe he has in his shop; so with every other mechanic. Gentlemen will see the absurdity of the whole thing, if it is brought into general practice. But some banks do what they call a legitimate business; they rear palaces, and have what is called a good foundation. Well, sir, let a farmer go to a bank who wants money for buying seed wheat, or any other contingency which may happen, however good his circumstances may be, can he get it? No, sir. Let him ask for $50 for sixty days. What will they say? Hard times—don't do any business—you can't have a dollar. But I believe, over the way, Mr. so and so, has money. He may let you have it. And then if the farmer goes, he will be asked twenty or thirty per cent.; and nine times out of ten the money is obtained from the bank.

While the farmer cannot get fifty dollars, one of these financial men, a merchant, or a swivel between the farmer and the bank, will get from two thousand to three thousand; and this is the sole privilege we have for granting bank charters. Banks, they say, were not made for farmers, they were made for financial men.

I did not suppose that this question would come up this morning; but it is sufficient for me to know that our government is based upon equal rights—banks upon fraud and corruption; and no man dare deny that they are unequal in their practices; a bundle of absurdities, of hypocrisy and incongruity, from their commencement to their death; and in justice to equal rights, let us have no banks.

I now appeal to the democratic party in this Convention—a party that for years past has said “no banks.” For the last two or three years, I admit, a change has come over some of us with regard to this matter; and I say let us close up this evil, and have no banks; because I firmly believe that banks are based upon principles as different to those of our government as light is to darkness, or Heaven is to hell. I shall vote for no banks whatever.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the foregoing by adding thereto, “nor shall any bank charter now in force extend beyond the first day of January, 1852.”

Mr. B. said—The city of Detroit has a monopoly of the banking interest of the whole State, and the fair inference is that they want it for all time to come; and this will account for the opposition of the gentleman from Wayne to all banks—he is opposed to all banks except Detroit banks.

Mr. HANSCOM—I do not want the amendment attached to mine. I wish the gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BAGG hoped the gentleman would withdraw it. He wanted to see how many democrats there were that would vote no banks. He hoped the gentleman would not hedge him in with his amendment; he hoped it would be voted down.

Mr. COOK hoped that the gentleman from Berrien would not withdraw it. If members are going against all banks, they must strike at home as well as abroad. If we are determined to say that we will have no banks; will not even submit the question to the people; strike them out of existence, so be it; but I do not want the gentleman's own constituents to have banks, and the rest of the community be deprived of the benefits or evils of the system. Give all the same level, if the people cannot be allowed to say whether they will or will not have banks upon safe ground. I hope that the gentleman will not withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BAGG wished to explain. He supposed the gentleman [Mr. Cook] wanted to palm off some new bank upon the community, and he wished to represent that there was a monopoly of banks at Detroit. So far (said Mr. B.) as we have been concerned, and especially with reference to the banks lately created, everybody knows that Wayne has instructed her delegates to vote “no bank” for the last ten years, the very course I have taken here; and if men from Wayne county have voted differently in the Legislature, they have voted against their instructions.

The gentleman should not reflect upon me or my constituents. We set here clothed with the majesty of the people, and we should do what is right. If we cannot obtain what we wish, we still have done our duty—what our constituents wish us to do.

Mr. EATON was opposed to banks. He would go for the amendment of the gentleman from Berrien; but as banks now in operation have charters for a certain length of time, it would amount to nothing.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I am glad the question has come up. If a majority are opposed to banking institutions, let the question be settled. If the question is so decided, let us nullify the charters now in existence, and not let one portion of the State have a monopoly of the circulating medium. We should further amend and say that we will not take the paper money of other States, but that we shall be confined to a pure metallic currency.

If it is so important to exclude banks from our State, we ought to exclude other paper money, for the reason that while we might have banks upon a safe footing, upon whose faith we might place confidence, yet we might have a worthless currency of another State, about which we knew nothing, and the farmer and the merchant might be cheated of their just dues.

Mr. BAGG moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked the yeas and nays on the amendment proposed by Mr. BRITAIN, and the same being ordered, the amendment prevailed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Axford, Barnard, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lovell, Marvin, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Sullivan, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, White, Williams—45.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Arzeno, Backus, Bagg, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Choate, Desnoyers, Fralick, Gibson, Hathaway, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Orr, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Warden, Whittemore, Woodman, President—28.

On motion of Mr. KINGSLEY, the proposition of Mr. HANSCom was further amended by adding: "and no bank paper of any other State shall be allowed to circulate in this State as currency."

Mr. SKINNER moved to adjourn; which was not agreed to.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend by adding after Legislature," in the first clause of the substitute, as follows: "unless it shall be submitted to the people, and then been first approved by a majority of the electors of the State voting thereon, in such manner as may be prescribed by the Legislature."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved a call of the Convention; but the call was not sustained.

The amendment proposed by Mr. McCLELLAND was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Bagg, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Chandler, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Harvey, Hathaway, Kingsley, Marvin, McClelland, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Town, White, Williams, Woodman, President—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Axford, Backus, Barnard, Bush, Carr, Comstock, Dimond, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Lovell, Mason, N. Pierce, Soule, Sturgis, Tiffany, VanValkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Webster, Whittemore—24.

Mr. CRARY moved further to amend Mr. HANSCom's proposition, by inserting after the word "renewing," as follows: "Or extended, with the privilege of making, issuing or putting in circulation any bill, check, ticket, certificate, promissory note, or other paper, or the paper of any bank to circulate as money."

And the amendment was agreed to.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The PRESIDENT called the Convention to order.

A quorum of members being in attendance,

Mr. MASON offered the following:

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be tendered to the Hon. H. T. BACKUS, for his able and eloquent eulogy upon the life and character of ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States; and that a committee of three be appointed to solicit a copy for publication.

Mr. HANSCom—This did not come before the Convention. I concur in the merit, eloquence, and all that sort of thing; but the Convention, as a Convention, did not attend.

Mr. MASON understood that a committee was appointed to wait upon Mr. BACKUS, and that it was understood that he was to give an eulogy before the Convention.

Resolution adopted.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Corporations."

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the substitute for section 2 was amended by inserting after "purposes," in the 1st line, the words "or amendment thereof."

The question recurring on the adoption of Mr. HANSCOM's proposition as amended,

Mr. CRARY said the question before us is whether this Convention shall say positively there shall be no banks, or whether it shall be left to the people, giving them an opportunity to vote "bank" or "no bank," or submit to them a law of the Legislature containing all the provisions of a banking law. These are the three propositions.

I am individually opposed to banking. I do not think that the business can be profitably carried on in this State. I mean a legitimate business; although some kind of transactions that we call banking can undoubtedly be made profitable. But as I have to vote for one of the three propositions, I shall take the latter course, and sustain the action of the committee who have had this matter under consideration.

Mr. HANSCOM—The Convention, if they choose, can vote down the amendments and vote upon my proposition, as it does not necessarily follow that the amendments properly belong to it.

Mr. MOORE—I think that the section, as introduced by the committee, is carefully constructed with regard to the interest of the public; and if made into a law will, I think, meet with general approbation. I am therefore in favor of the substitute of the committee. A great many are opposed to all banks, and we should all be so if they could not be placed upon a solid foundation. It is universally conceded that we cannot have a metallic currency sufficient for our wants. That is a fact about which there can be no question; and I contend that that being the case, we had better have a circulation of our own bills, guarded in the best manner that we can devise, than take the paper currency of other States, about which we know nothing. I think if we sustain the action of the committee it will be satisfactory.

Enquiry was made if it could be divided.

The CHAIR said that it must be taken as a whole.

Mr. BAGG enquired if a substitute would be in order.

The CHAIR said it would not be in order.

The yeas and nays being ordered, the substitute was rejected:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Bagg, Beardsley, Britain, Comstock, Eaton, Hanscom, Hathaway, N. Pierce, Wait, Webster, White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Burns, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman, President—60.

The question recurring upon the substitute of the committee,

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the reported substitute by adding thereto the following:

"Nor shall any bank have any legal existence in this State after the 1st day of January, 1855, except under a general banking law."

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAGG would inquire, if we passed such a law, if it would not be wholly null and void.

Mr. BRITAIN—I am informed that all the banks are under the power of the Legislature, except one. If the people of Michigan place this feature in the constitution, it will be respected. I do not think that one wicked or weak Legislature can compromise the rights of the people forever. No gentleman should hesitate to vote for it on that account. It is as competent for us to settle it as if we had not a bank in existence. The object is to secure them all under one system. It is to prevent those at present engaged in banking going against a general banking law, in defence of their special interests. If the members wish no banks, let them all come under the same rule.

Mr. J. BARTOW—Four out of five are under the control of the Legislature. One is not. Their rights being vested, we have no more business to interfere than the Legislature have. Therefore, we have no right to place this in the constitution.

Mr. ROBERTSON—The gentleman from Wayne asked the gentleman from Berrien as to the effect the present section would have upon the banks now in existence, if any general banking law should receive the approval of the people. The answer was, that it would make them interested in a general banking law. Now, I do not want four or five powerful corporations helping us to make a general banking law. I would rather be without their assistance. It is a question whether this Convention can interfere with vested rights.

The gentleman from Berrien, and the gentleman from Oakland both take the ground that we have a right to control a contract that we have entered into—that a sovereign power is not to be bound by a contract. I have heard a great deal said about the sacred nature of vested rights. When the State enters into a contract, by that contract it is bound.

Mr. BRITAIN—The gentleman from Macomb talks about the sanctity of vested rights in the country from which he came. Are there any vested rights in that country with which the Parliament of Great Britain cannot interfere?

Mr. ROBERTSON—The Parliament of Great Britain is imperial; it has the sovereign power to control all action. It can establish and destroy, and no court can say that its acts are unconstitutional. But in this country it is different. There are three distinct departments; the Executive, with a certain control over the Legislature; and there is the Supreme Court which has power over the Executive and the Legislature combined. There the Parliament is above all law; it is a different system. Here we have a power set above us for high purposes, and our decisions may be reversed in the high tribunal of the U. S. That court can declare whether we can control them or not. It is their province; so that any analogy between us and Great Britain does not exist in this respect. Shall we put a bribe upon the counters of these five existing banks, that they may go in favor of a general banking law, however wrong? It is said to be their money which is used in certain elections, and upon certain occasions. Shall we assert in this constitution that we will interfere with vested rights?

I say that it is an injury if we assert a principle that we cannot carry out; and that we have fallen from the high state to which the voice of the people of Michigan elected us, if we assert a principle that the highest tribunal will pronounce fallacious; and I assert that it is appealing to a wrong principle in the human breast, if this Convention interferes with those vested rights, or maintains that it can do so constitutionally; and as I see the Rev. Mr. PIERCE is ready to explain the whole matter, I will yield the floor.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I ask the gentleman from Berrien to withdraw the amendment to the section. I think that the Convention can do it, but I would prefer that the question would come up in the last section. The whole question can come up at that time.

Mr. BRITAIN thought that this was the proper place for an amendment to the section. There will be but little chance of carrying it if I withdraw it now.

Mr. B. then withdrew the proposition.

Mr. CRARY moved the previous question on the section; but the same was not ordered.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the original section of the article was amended by inserting in line 1, after "purposes," the words "or amendment thereof."

Mr. BAGG proposed the following for the substitute proposed by the committee to section 2:

"The Legislature shall have no power to pass any law creating banking privileges."

Mr. BAGG—I do not mean to be tedious, but I am willing to take the responsibility, without leaving it to the people. I know well that a large majority are with me upon this subject, and I do not want the influence of banks upon the people on any subject. I know the people are right upon this subject; I know the Legislature is right when it comes fresh from the people; and I will say, when a bank is made, you can at all such times infer fraud. The last batch of banks were made through fraud. The people instructed their representatives that they should not go for any bank. They made the instructions as strong as they could be written. Well, sir, we can uncover fraud, even in a court of justice. I am certain we can uncover it here. I propose to see how many there are willing to vote directly upon this proposition. It has been contended that we should have banks because other States have banks. That is a great argument. I consider that banks stand in the same relation to the financial world that ardent spirits do to the human system. Give them one drink, they feel well; another, he is rich; another, he has property to sell; another, the whole world is at his control. So with banks. Who does not remember the times of '36? Men who thought themselves rich, found themselves stripped of their all. They found out that banks would play long and short; and their operations caused more misery in this State than any thing else that has happened.

The people will sustain no more banks, and we shall want a safety clause like this in the constitution to make the people swallow it, we have made so many changes. I should like to see any one attempt to prove that a bank is reconcilable with a democratic government. Government is based upon equal rights. Banks are a monopoly—corruption and fraud. Not a single argument to sustain it. One diametrically opposed to the other; yet we are here voting amendments upon amendments, not daring to come to a direct vote upon this question. We ought to come to a direct vote. We ought to show our hands, so that the next Legislature may know clearly what we mean.

Mr. COOK—Has the gentleman uniformly sustained these views in this Convention?

Mr. BAGG—I may have voted for some picayune amendment, so as to make the whole thing odious. I want the vote to be bank or no bank; then you will see my vote. I suppose the gentleman wishes to put a little bank in some section. He said I wished to monopolize banks in Detroit. He knows that the democracy of Wayne have ever been opposed to banks, and I have ever stood in the democratic ranks. And shall we be taunted with the acts of a corrupt Legislature? I hope not. I say that it is wrong. I say that the last bank charter was carried against the wishes of three-fourths of the inhabitants of the Peninsula State. How it was done, I do not know. But we are here to make or unmake bank charters; and if we can unmake them let us do so, and sweep the miserable things out of existence.

But, forsooth, we must have banks because other States have banks. If other States are steeped in crime—if other States do wrong, must we do so? Is that the argument? Let Michigan do what is right. If there is a blot upon us let us wipe it out—let us say no banks. Other States are looking at us to see what the democracy are doing—to see if we will say no banks, as we have said no capital punishment.

The banks can convulse the whole length and breadth of this land; they can bow down the head of the widow and make the orphan children cry for bread; they have done it, and they will again for their own gain. I hope this question will be fully decided, and I call for the previous question.

Mr. WEBSTER moved the previous question.

Mr. BRITAIN had a small amendment he wished to make.

Mr. BAGG did not want any amendment at all. He wanted to see the yeas and nays upon that proposition alone.

The CHAIR said that he saw Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. BRITAIN rise at the same moment.

Mr. BAGG—I called for the previous question just before sitting down. I think I am right.

Mr. BUSH said there was not the slightest ground for an appeal. When the chair saw two or more gentleman rise, the rule was, that he might name which he chose.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I hope the gentleman will withdraw the appeal.

Mr. BAGG—I withdraw it.

Mr. BRITAIN then offered his amendment:

“Nor shall any bank charter now in existence extend beyond the first day of January, 1853.”

Mr. BAGG withdrew his proposition, and offered the following as a substitute for the same:

“No banking law, or law for banking purposes, nor any act creating, continuing, renewing or extending any association or corporation for banking purposes, shall ever be enacted by the legislature.”

The CHAIR said that the proposition was substantially the same as the one submitted by the gentleman from Oakland, which had been acted upon by the Convention, and therefore was out of order.

Mr. HANSCOM appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Upon the appeal, Mr. McCLELLAND moved the previous question, and the same being ordered, the main question was ordered to be now put, and the question being, "Shall the decision of the chair stand as the decision of the Convention?" it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved the previous question on the section, and the same was sustained, and the main question ordered to be now put; and the substitute reported by the committee of the whole for section two of the article, was concurred in by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Chandler, Choate, Church, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hart, Hathaway, Kingsley, Leach, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Whittemore, Woodman, President—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Backus, Barnard, J. Bartow, Bush, Carr, Comstock, Cook, Crary, Dimond, Eastman, Gardiner, Hanscom, Harvey, Hascall, Lee, Lovell, N. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, Storey, Sutherland, Tiffany, Warden, Webster, White, Williams—26.

The amendments made in committee to section three were concurred in.

The first amendment to section four being under consideration, on motion of Mr. COOK, the same was amended by striking out "paper credit," and inserting the word "bills." The remainder of the amendments made in committee of the whole to the article were severally concurred in, with the exception of those to section five, in which the Convention refused to concur.

The article being open to amendment, Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to strike from the sixth section, up to and inclusive of the word "indirectly," in the second line, and insert "the legislature shall pass no law directly or indirectly sanctioning." Which was disagreed to.

Mr. COMSTOCK moved to amend section three by inserting in line two, after the word "liable," the words "to the amount of their respective share or shares of stock in any such corporation or association."

Mr. COMSTOCK did not offer this to embarrass the passage of the article, but to make it as perfect as possible. It will be seen by gentlemen that there are many persons who possess a small capital; and if this be a privilege, why should we deny them a participation? As it stands at present, a small capitalist could not feel safe. Larger capitalists who have the control, might; and the effect would be to throw it entirely into their hands. I allude more particularly to the plank road charters. If made liable only to the amount of their stock, it would draw out capital from our own State into useful operation. A good many small towns have small capitalists who would use it, under charters that would not be oppressive, for the benefit of themselves and the public.

Mr. CORNELL did not consider the section worth much, any way; but it would be worse than nothing if that amendment was made.

The motion was lost.

On motion of Mr. COOK, section six was amended by inserting in the first line, after "law," the words "authorizing or."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to amend section 4 by striking therefrom in the third line, "in State stocks;" and in the third and fourth lines, the words "bearing interest, or stock of the United States."

Mr. J. D. P. said—I am unwilling by my vote to help establish the principle in this State of banking upon debt. The effect will be to give a double interest to all our State stocks, banking upon the indebtedness of the country; and that I consider no basis for banking. What will they sell for? If they will not sell, where is the protection to the bill holders. I am unwilling to see a principle of this kind established in the constitution. I therefore, upon this proposition, ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHURCH—The effect will be that they will offer anything.

Mr. McCLELLAND inquired if the gentleman from Calhoun wanted mortgages on lands for security. He supposed not, however.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—No sir. I leave the proper security to be given by those who want banks. I do not want the principle established, that banking in this State shall be based upon debt. By this plan, the holders of stock gain double interest for the money they have loaned.

Pending which,

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the article be committed to the committee on corporations, with instructions to amend the same as follows, viz:

Strike out section 2, and insert as follows:

"No banking law, or law for banking purposes, nor any act creating, renewing or continuing any association or corporation for banking purposes, shall ever be enacted by the Legislature."

Amend by adding a new section to stand as section 3, as follows:

"No law now in force in this State creating or authorizing any bank or banking institution, or incorporating any company or association for banking purposes in this State, shall extend to or have any force or effect after the first day of January, 1853; and no such institution now existing in this State shall issue any note or bill, to be circulated as money, after the first day of January, 1851."

Mr. COOK moved the previous question on the article, and the call being seconded by a majority of the members present, the main question was ordered to be now put.

The amendment proposed by Mr. J. D. PIERCE was then rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Bush, Church, Crary, Eaton, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hascall, Lovell, J. D. Pierce, Soule, Webster, White, Williams, Woodman—20.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, J. Bartow, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hathaway, Kingsley, Leach, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Mosher, Mowry, Orr, N.

Pierce, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Whittemore, President—47.

The main question being on ordering the article to a third reading, it was so ordered by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Chandler, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Hathaway, Kingsley, Leach, McClelland, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Orr, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Whittemore, President—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Bush, Crary, Eaton, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, Soule, Warden, Webster, White, Williams—26.

Mr. BAGG moved to take up the article entitled "Elections;" pending which,

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, (45th day,) August 1.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. MOORE: of Jacob French and 45 others of St. Joseph county, praying an article may be incorporated in the constitution prohibiting the Legislature from passing any laws authorizing the sale of ardent spirits as a beverage.

Referred to the select committee upon the subject.

Also, of John Hotchin and 46 others of St. Joseph county, that the Convention will insert an article in the constitution prohibiting the labor of convicts in the State prison from coming into competition with other mechanical labor.

REPORTS.

Mr. GARDINER, from the select committee on the traffic in ardent spirits, submitted the following:

Resolved, That at the next general election, and at the same time when the votes of the electors shall be taken for the adoption or rejection of the revised constitution, the additional amendment in the words following:

"All laws now in force licensing the traffic in ardent spirits or intoxicating drinks are hereby abolished, and the Legislature shall have no power to pass any laws licensing the traffic in ardent spirits or intoxicating drinks; but the Legislature shall have power to pass laws regulating or prohibiting the traffic in ardent spirits or intoxicating drinks."

Shall be separately submitted to the electors of the State for their adoption or rejection, in form following, to wit: A separate ballot may be given by every person having the right to vote for the revised constitution, to be deposited in a separate box. Upon the ballot given for the adoption of the said separate amendment shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "prohibiting license of the traffic in ardent spirits—yes." And upon all ballots given against the said separate amendment, in like manner, the words "Prohibiting license of traffic in ardent spirits—no." And on each ballot shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "Constitution—License," in such manner that such words shall appear on the outer side of each ballot when folded. If, at said election, a majority of all the votes given for or against the said separate amendment shall contain the words "Prohibiting license of the traffic in ardent spirits—yes," then the said separate amendment shall be a separate section in the article entitled "Legislative Department," in the constitution, in full force and effect.

Also at the same time, place and manner as aforesaid, the additional amendment in the words following:

"From and after the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-four, the traffic or vending of ardent spirits or intoxicating drinks, except for mechanical, medicinal or chemical purposes, shall be prohibited."

Shall be separately submitted to the electors of the State for their adoption or rejection, in form following, to wit: A separate ballot may be given by every person having the right to vote for the revised constitution, to be deposited in a separate box. Upon the ballots given for the adoption of the said separate amendment shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "Prohibiting the traffic in ardent spirits—yes;" and upon all ballots against the said separate amendment, in like manner, the words "Prohibiting the traffic in ardent spirits—no." And on such ballots shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "Constitution—traffic in ardent spirits," in such manner that such words shall appear on the outer side of such ballots when folded. If, at such election, a majority of all the votes given for or against the said separate amendment shall contain the words "Prohibiting the traffic in ardent spirits—yes," then the said separate amendment shall be a separate section in the article entitled "Miscellaneous Provisions," in the constitution, in full force and effect.

Which was laid upon the table and ordered printed.

On motion of Mr. GARDINER,

Resolved, That the Secretary be authorized to draw a certificate upon the State Treasurer in favor of Mr. Martin Mahon, for three dollars per day, for his services as reporter of this Convention, commencing on the 16th day of July last.

On motion of Mr. LEACH,

Resolved, That the committee on supplies be instructed to report to the Convention, as soon as practicable, the kind and quantity of stationery purchased for the use of the Convention, and the price paid for the same.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention was then resolved into a committee of the whole on the article entitled "Judicial Department," Mr. Cook in the chair.

The consideration of the substitute offered by Mr. McCLELLAND for section 2 being resumed,

Mr. WARDEN moved to amend the same as follows:

Strike out all between the words "supreme court," in 3d line, and "shall," in 4th line, and insert "four of whom shall constitute the supreme court, and a concurrence of three."

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend by striking out all after the word "courts," in the second line, and inserting as follows: "Shall constitute a Supreme Court, and four of said judges shall be a quorum able to transact business, and the concurrence of three of said quorum shall be necessary to a final decision. The Legislature shall have power, whenever they deem it expedient, to organize a separate Supreme Court, with the jurisdiction and powers prescribed in this constitution, to consist of one chief justice and three associate judges, to be elected by the qualified electors of this State. Said separate Supreme Court, when established, shall not be changed or discontinued by the Legislature for eight years after its organization. The judges thereof shall be so classified that but one of them shall go out of office at the same time, and their term of office shall be eight years."

Mr. C. said there was a difference between his proposition and the substitute, in one or two particulars. It provides for the object which the delegate from Livingston [Mr. WARDEN] wishes to attain—how many of the judges shall be a quorum, and how many shall be required to make a decision. It also gives to that court, whenever established, an existence of eight years, conforming with the number of judges—one going out of office annually.

Mr. McCLELLAND had no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH.] The amendment of the gentleman from Livingston [Mr. WARDEN] was in conformity with his own views; still there might be objections to it. It did not read exactly right. Many believed it would be better for four to constitute a quorum, and let the Legislature designate which four they shall be, or leave the judges to determine. Whatever system might be adopted, he wished it to be tested before it was liable to change by the action of the Legislature. He was opposed to the independent system, but if adopted, it ought to have a full trial. He did not want a system to be undergoing constant change.

Mr. BRITAIN—I wish to ask the gentleman from Livingston if the design is to permit less than four to hold a court.

Mr. WARDEN—My proposition is that four shall constitute a court, and the concurrence of three of the judges be required for a decision.

Mr. BRITAIN—That is, four shall constitute the court, but the legislature may provide that three shall constitute a quorum. If that is not the case it should be so provided. The bill provides that four shall constitute a court, and three a business quorum, and the concurrence of all the three to give a final decision. The difficulty is this: if three constitute a business quorum, and a case comes before them on appeal, it requires the concurrence of the whole three to reverse the decision of the court below. The decision of the court below may be affirmed by one dissenting judge, with a decision of two of the judges of the supreme court against it; and it goes out to the world as the decision of the Supreme Court, when, in fact, two-thirds of the Supreme Court were against it. Is that right? If the whole three do not concur, the decision of the court below is made the decision of the Supreme Court, though two of the judges may be in favor of its reversal. You should either require four judges to be present, or permit two out of three to make a final decision.

Mr. McCLELLAND did not see any force in the objection made by the gentleman from Berrien. The concurrence of three of the judges is required, whether the court consists of three or four judges. As the amendment of the gentleman from Kent was a little broader than that of the gentleman from Livingston, he would suggest to the gentleman from Livingston the propriety of withdrawing his proposition.

Mr. WARDEN agreed to withdraw his amendment, and the question being taken on Mr. CHURCH's substitute, it was adopted.

Mr. J. BARTOW—As it involves a question of great importance, and as the responsibility is thrown on the profession, it is necessary that they should express their views. I regret (said Mr. B.) that the discussion is thrown on the profession; others are more interested. They can live under any system; the worse the system, the better for them. As the responsibility is thrown on them, if the system which may be adopted should fail, they will have to assume the responsibility. Every man is interested; every domestic relation, all the rights of property, are involved; and here the discussion goes on among a few members of the bar only. Though I will not shrink from responsibility, if men whose interests are concerned sit here and vote, they must also be responsible. I shall endeavor to show the propriety of adopting the substitute, because I believe it is the best and safest plan, the only thing that is practicable, and, in accordance with the spirit of the age, the requirements and the business of the times.

It will be admitted by all that we are more likely to procure able men, men more likely to discharge the duties of the courts, by having the two systems united. The more you enlarge the duties of the office, the more you elevate its character. The greater the duties of the office, the more will carefulness be exercised in electing a person to perform those duties. You would not find a judge of the Supreme Court doing the business of a justice of the peace; nor a justice of the peace advanced to the Supreme Bench. As you increase the character of the office, so you increase the character of the man who officiates; and so will be increased the watchfulness of the people in electing them. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the system proposed in the substitute will be better than that reported by the committee.

Are we not to have business men? The business has to be done by some system, and the judicial business of the State must be performed. The question of economy ought not to come up, for one involves it as much as the other. If it does, it is in favor of the circuit system. But it would be like putting it up at contract if urged on the score of economy. We have got a certain thing to do—the judicial business of the State must be performed. The question is how it can be best done—by making one court inferior to the other, with men inferior to the other—or by making one set of men, who, uniting the functions of the two, perform the duties of both. Those who shall be brought into office by their own character and standing, are most likely to perform their duties. It appears to me that you cannot compare them, and have one favorable impression of the reported article.

Mr. HANSCOM—Would not the gentleman, under this system, make a distinction between the judges of the Supreme Court and the others.

Mr. J. BARTOW—Not at all. Four shall make a court, only for the time being. In any system it may be proper that some should be excluded—that the judge that tried the case shall be excluded. Although in the courts of law in England, the judge who tried the case has never been excluded. And in the States, in one of the best courts in the United States, they allow the judge who tried the case to have a voice in its final decision. When the practice was to do so, there was never any complaint. In all the courts in England, the judge trying the case has as much to say on revision as the others.

In New York, at the commencement, the judge had all to say about it; the others ascertaining from him the circumstances of the case. No complaint existed; but they finally excluded the person trying the case because they thought it had a speciousness of unfairness. Have not the judges to put their opinions on record and print them? How can profligacy and corruption follow under such a system? Can such a thing as personal favor to a brother judge influence their decisions? It is absurd. I think the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. Goodwin,] who was once on the supreme bench, ought to have told us it was not true. He told us of expressed public opinion, but he said not one word about this truth. He ought to have told us. The obligation rested on him to say whether it was true or not. If we are to get better judges, and get them cheaper, (I hate to refer to cheapness; any system is cheap that is good—any is dear that is bad,) if it is doing the judicial business of the State as it should be done, if, by the system we propose, it can best be done, let us adopt it. I am not prepared to say yet that I will not go for any other system; but I believe this is the best system.

We are not assembled here to support systems, but establish principles. Let us adopt that which is most likely to promote the good of the people. The system proposed by the gentleman from Monroe appears to me to contain all the elements of good, and I shall support it.

Mr. KINGSLEY said—The question now before the Convention is so important, that I am unwilling to give a silent vote upon it. I did not come here with any very strong prejudices for or against either system. No instructions on this point have been received by me, either from the bar or the people at large of the county which I in part represent.

The two systems are not so completely before us that we can judge easily of their comparative merits. They are merely shadowed forth. To judge understandingly, we should know the number of judges necessary to carry out each system, how all these judges are to be elected, whether by general ticket or in districts, what salaries the several judges are to receive, whether the Supreme Court judges, if an independent court is established, are to receive larger salaries than the circuit judges. These and some other of the details of these systems should be better known to enable us to judge well on the subject. Looking at the bill before us, reported by the committee on the judicial department, it will be seen that the number of the judges proposed for the Supreme Court is increased from three to four. The bill must be and will be so amended as to increase the number of judicial circuits and circuit judges from five to seven. A less number will not do the business under that system; and it is an indispensable part of our duty to see that the business is all done and done speedily. Any system that does not this will be condemned. In this system, then, not less than eleven judges will be required to do the business of the Supreme and Circuit Courts.

Under the system proposed by the amendment, eight judges will do the business of the Supreme Court and of the Circuit Courts. It will require that number to do it. This will be three less than will be required by the other system. I would have elected for these Circuit Court judges, who would also be Supreme Court judges, the best men in the State. They should be selected from the State at large, and voted for by all the electors in the State, or elected by the electors in each circuit. If elected by the circuits, the electors should select these judges from any part of the State; but when elected he should reside in the circuit for which he is elected. The people of each circuit will be ambitious to put the best man they can get upon the supreme bench. The judges should all be of one grade, should receive the same salaries, and be subject to perform the same duties.

We have had some petitions upon the subject of courts from attorneys and others; but when they are taken together they furnish us no reliable guide as to which system of courts should be established. Take for instance the petitions from Pontiac and from Jackson. The bar in each of those places are large and respectable, of nearly equal size; they must have thought upon this important subject, yet their opinions are exactly opposite one to the other. Look again at Kalamazoo. A part of the bar there have asked for an independent Supreme Court, and given reasons for their preference. The remainder of the bar, with many of the other citizens, have asked for the Circuit Court system, are opposed to the independent court, and have given equally good reasons for their preference. I endeavored to get the opinion of the bar at Ann Arbor, as they had sent no petitions here upon the subject. They were not very communicative, but seemed to think if we got up a system that worked well and gave satisfaction, it would be well enough. On the contrary, if we should get up a system that should fail, it would be a failure. This was not very definite, yet I inferred from what they did say, and did not say, that they favored the Circuit Court system rather than the independent Supreme Court, as they knew that my mind was that way, and they took no pains to convince me that I was wrong. From what we have gathered of public opinion, it would seem that the question before us is very evenly balanced, or the gentlemen of the bar in different parts of the State are operated upon by different motives.

Not being instructed by our constituents, or enlightened by their advice upon this subject, it is safe to be guided by the experience of others—to look to other States for precedents, and to follow the example of those who have had the most experience on the subject under our consideration. The main question in dispute is: shall we require the judges of the Supreme Court to try causes in the Circuit Courts? or which is the same thing, shall the judges who do the business in the circuits constitute the Supreme Court?

We are in the habit of looking to England for example, in many things; and the system of her courts, and manner of administering justice, will furnish us a good example now. She has no independent Supreme Court. Her most eminent judges of the common law courts have grown up to eminence on their circuits in the trials of issues of fact. No State or country has produced more able judges than England. No authorities in the law are superior, or equal to the English authorities, even in this country. The courts established by the United States furnish another example for those of us who prefer the Circuit Court system, called by some the nisi prius system, by way of distinction from the independent Supreme Court. It is not a nisi prius system, but it is a system which requires the judges of the supreme court to do service upon the circuits. It is that which gives it its distinctive character. That is the kind of court which we propose to establish by the amendment now proposed. We will now look, for example, to New England—to all the New England States—the father and mother of us all. Those States commenced with and have grown up under such a system as we now propose to establish here. It has never failed there. It has been efficient and satisfactory. Many distinguished judges have been reared up there under that system.

We will look to New York, and from that State draw an argument in favor of this system. Previous to the year eighteen hundred and twenty-one, the judges in that State held both courts.

The constitution of that State, made in 1821, changed the system, and established an independent Supreme Court, which existed for twenty-five years. In 1846 another convention was convened in that State to alter its constitution; and with the experience of the past, and a full knowledge of the workings of both systems, that convention established their Supreme Court nearly upon the principle on which it was formed previous to the year 1821—a court of the kind which we propose to establish. Here is an argument for the system stronger than can be drawn from the continued practice of any one State. It is the example of a great State which has tried both systems, and finally preferred that system which requires the judges to try causes in the circuits. Those who compare the reports of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, previous to 1821, with those made in the twenty-five years thereafter, can judge which system made the best judges. No reports in that State are in higher repute than Johnson's. It is said the court of appeals, the court of last resort in the State of New York, is constituted differently from the court here proposed. True it is; but we propose no court similar to that. Few causes go into that court there, and we dispense with it entirely, as it would make our whole system too expensive for the State.

To the above may be added, for example, the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Virginia, and I know not how many of the Southern States. On the other hand, it has been urged here that the States of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Tennessee, and some other States, have adopted the independent Supreme Court. Even California has been mentioned as worthy of our example in establishing our judicial system. But, whether it is safer to follow the example of these comparatively new States, or the example of those old States that have existed ever since we became, and before we were, a nation? The judicial systems in the new States are as yet but experiments, while those of the old States have the sanction of many years to recommend them. Who looks for legal authorities from the reports of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, or Texas, if he can find the authorities he wants in the reports of Massachusetts, Vermont, Connecticut and New York, or the English reports? Where we find the best reports, we must look for the best courts and judges. It is said that in the State of Indiana they have an independent Supreme Court, and that it is a good one, and that the reports are good. Grant this; there seems to be an exception in Indiana. It is the only green spot in the whole legal desert that we have been called upon to look over. It is said that Judge Blackford is a remarkably good judge. He has given authority to his reports. But more of this by-and-by.

I am strongly opposed to the system which establishes an independent Supreme Court, on the very ground urged by some gentlemen in its favor. When it is said on one side that the Supreme Court judges will soon become mere technical lawyers, (if not required to do Circuit Court business,) and decide according to the very letter of the books, without improving upon the past, the truth of the remark seems not to be denied. But it is said in answer, that under the proposed system, the Supreme Court judges will be frequently leaving the bench, and that their places will be filled with Circuit Court judges. It is said the Circuit Court judges will be ambitious so to distinguish themselves on their circuits, as that they may be called by the people to a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court. Here, then, it is proposed to start; with a radical, a most mischievous error in the system establishing an independent court. A premium is offered for those who shall be swiftest in the race of popularity. You say: true, you will soon become useless as judges of this court of the last resort, but we are rearing up in a practical school those who will be qualified to fill your places better than you can fill them. You say to the Circuit Court judges, we have placed you in this more humble position, but design you for a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court, if you can become a better judge than some that are there. Now, it is plain that the position in which the judges in the Supreme Court and Circuit Courts would be placed, in relation to each other, would beget jealousies and discords between them. It would doubtless happen that you would have among the circuit judges, men superior in legal learning and ability to some on the bench of the Supreme Court. These men will themselves feel and know that superiority—the people will see it; and you say here in advance that those men shall have the first vacant seats on the supreme bench. In this position of things, allowing human nature to be operated upon in the natural way, when a judge of the Circuit Court is seen growing into favor with the people, and gaining celebrity as a judge, the judges will lay their hands upon him to crush him. They will not look with favor upon the acts of those who are aspiring to their seats. I have understood from those who practiced law in the State of New York when the Supreme and Circuit Courts were distinct, that one of the great evils of the system was the disagreement and bad feeling that existed between the judges in the two grades of courts. And there they had not the same motives for jealousy and discordant feeling as under the system here proposed, as the rivalry could not exist there that would here.

It is said by some that the system which allows the judges of the Circuit Courts to constitute the Supreme Court is objectionable, because the judges of that court will be inclined to sustain the decisions of their associates, although erroneous; each judge knowing that his own decisions are to pass under the review of his associates. That each judge will look with favor upon the decisions of his associates from sympathy, hoping that the favor will be reciprocated. It has been said out of doors, if not on this floor, with a view to bear on this question, that a system of log-rolling is carried on among the judges of the Supreme Court to sustain in that court the decisions made in the circuits. I hope gentlemen here whom this charge will reach may answer to it. I do not believe it to be true. Nor do I believe in the policy which excludes from the bench, on the review of a decision, the judge who first made the decision. It is against the practice of most other States in like cases, and cannot be sustained by sound reasoning. A judge may decide wrong upon the circuit, without much argument, without time or books to investigate the question and in the hurry of business. The decision is no disgrace to him. It is an error which any good judge might have made. His decision is carried up for review. What does the law say to him? It says, you have done a wrong act, which is to be examined in a higher court, and you must not be heard or seen about, when that act is examined. Or the decision may have been entirely correct by the judge on the circuit, and yet carried up to the higher court by an attorney ignorant of the law, but the law says to him the same.

Who, it may be asked, is better able to judge of the correctness of a decision than the judge who made it? If he has committed an error in deciding a question of law, or if it is thought he has, he will investigate the question with more diligence than any other judge, and will be more anxious than any other one can be to correct the error. He would claim it as a privilege to be in a position where he could officially announce a decision which should correct his error. It is not uncommon for judges to do so. A judge making a decision on the circuit, claimed to be erroneous, will examine authorities closely, to know if it be so. He will reflect upon the disputed point. In his observation upon the bench, and in his examination of books, he will hold in his mind every principle that bears upon it, and would, if allowed, go upon the supreme bench far better qualified to decide rightly than any other member of the court.

The gentleman from Genesee [Mr. J. BARTOW,] was right in what he said upon that point; and I was sorry to see that he felt compelled reluctantly to admit that it might be wrong for a judge to participate in a review of his own decision. In the high courts of England, in the United States court, and in many of the best Supreme Courts in the States, judges are not excluded from the bench when their own decisions are being reviewed. In New Jersey and Pennsylvania it is otherwise; but the judge who made the decision in the court below is required to give to the Supreme Court his reasons in writing for making the decision appealed from.

Again, I have heard it urged against the present system of our courts, that the judges frequently reserve a question for the decision of the Supreme Court before they decide it in the Circuit Court; and therefore, when it is decided in the lower court, it is useless to take the cause to the Supreme Court, as it has already been decided there. Now this, so far from being an objection, is an argument in its favor. The attorney's generally consent to the judges reserving the question; and if the decision of the court in the last resort is had upon the question, without cost to any one, it is certainly an advantage. The object of the law and of the party is obtained by having a doubtful question thus quickly and without expense decided by the highest tribunal in the State.

This thought brings to my mind another objection to the independent Supreme Court. If we establish six or eight Circuit Courts in the State, the judges of which will have no connection with the Supreme Court, there will be many different decisions on the same questions; each Circuit judge deciding according to his own judgment of the law and the practice. They will put different constructions upon the constitution, the laws, and even the rules of court. They will manufacture a plenty of the raw material for the use of the Supreme Court. If the judges of the Circuit Courts constitute the Supreme Court, they should be, and would be frequently together, and compare notes; they would establish a uniform practice; there would be a greater uniformity in their decisions on like questions; in fact, a oneness in the system; a sameness in the tenor of the decisions in the different circuits, which would go far to make the decisions there final.

It is desirable that the courts having original jurisdiction should be the best we can obtain. It is in them that all the business first comes, and is mostly done. If the community have confidence in these courts, suits will end there. Nothing will tend more to give that confidence than placing the best judges on the circuits; those who are to compose the highest court. If the Circuit Courts are composed of second rate judges—if they are paid less salaries—if they are stamped in the commencement with the mark of inferiority—if all are told that there is a higher and more able court which will correct their errors, parties will be dissatisfied with many decisions, and far more causes will be carried up for review.

Let us view this subject in another light. If we do not adopt a judicial system which will give occasion for carrying up to the Supreme Court many more causes than are now carried there, the Supreme Court, if not required to hold Circuit Courts, will have very little to do. The gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] has said, that according to the reports, the Supreme Court decides about thirty causes in a year. I perceive by a report before us, that the Court, last year, was in session five days in Pontiac, four days in Jackson, and one day in Kalamazoo; making ten days in all. It does not appear how long they were in session at Detroit. The judges go there to hibernate. They are in session sometimes, and sometimes not. They may hold a court there two months, or call it three in all. In that time all the business that goes up from the Circuit and County Courts is done, and more might be done in that time if they had it to do. But they do all the business, and nothing more can be required. It is evident, then, that unless we establish a system, which will furnish more causes for that court than they have heretofore had, they will have very little to do. Those of us who would require the judges of the Supreme Court to try causes on the circuits believe it would make better judges of them. There is no better school for a judge than a court of justice, in which he is engaged in the trial of issues of fact before himself or a jury. Nor is a judge less competent for having much to do. Those have found the most time to investigate legal subjects, and have become the most celebrated as authors, who have been most engaged in the trial of causes. Some one has quaintly observed, that "those who have the most to do, find the most leisure to do something else;" and it might be added, that they generally do that something else better than those who have little or nothing to do.

It is the duty of a judge to define and administer the law; to lay down a correct rule of human action. To be able to do this, he must be acquainted with men as well as books; he must be acquainted not only with the springs of human actions, but with the actions themselves. A judge may know the law as it is laid down in the books, and he may be able to decide a question presented to him according to the books, and yet not be a good judge. He would remain stationary without the practice of trying causes on the circuit. He would not, from his experience and wisdom, be able, like Mansfield, Marshall, Parsons, and many others, to overrule the erroneous decisions of others, and maintain his own upon the unerring principles of justice.

Take, for instance, a physician, learned in his profession, one who has studied all the books on diseases and the practice of medicine from Esculapius down, let him have had an extensive practice in his art, then take him from his practice, shut him up among his books and require him to prescribe for the diseases of others without seeing them, and he would fail. You might carry to him the most minute description of the patient and the symptoms of his disease, and he could not prescribe for him skilfully. To do so, he must see his patient, feel his pulse, observe his countenance, watch his breathing; in fine, he must learn the nature of diseases by attending on the diseased; and a judge, to be distinguished as such, I repeat, must understand human nature, as well as books.

To return for a moment to what has been said of the example of other States, we will compare authorities. As an offset to Indiana, which stands as the best authority in favor of establishing an independent Supreme Court, I will name Old England and the United States; by the side of Illinois I will place Massachusetts. The rest of the New England States and New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Virginia may be passed off with the West and South-Western States, and the balance struck. It will be against the independent Supreme Court.

Another consideration worthy of notice is, that few States elect their judges by the people. We are to elect ours. If the people are to elect the judges, there is a propriety of placing them where they can be known by the people. Elect judges of an independent Supreme Court, as is proposed, and you remove them from the view of the people; the juries, the suitors, the witnesses, the attendants at the trials of causes, see them not. They will be known to the people only through the attorneys who practice in that court.

I have not said all I have thought on this subject. What I have said has occurred to me at this time. I am not over anxious about which system shall be adopted. We have tried the Circuit Court system. It failed to give satisfaction only because the business in court was not promptly done. If the business is done quickly, so that there shall be no complaint of the delays of court, there is no danger of a failure.

I have preferred the Circuit Court system here proposed, for several reasons. It will require a less number of judges to do the business; it will secure better judges on the circuits, or at least those in whom community will have more confidence, and it will bring the judges within view of the people who elect them. The system will be more economical, while it will be more efficient. Under it more causes will be decided finally and satisfactorily on the first trial. It is a system which we understand ourselves, and it has the sanction of other States having the most experience.

Mr. BAGG said—Mr. Chairman, I propose to make a few remarks upon the subject now under consideration. I am in favor of what is called the independent judiciary system—for the article now before us as reported by the committee. When this Convention was called, sir, from what I heard, and from my own knowledge upon the subject, no one subject called so loudly for reform as our judiciary system. There is a want of confidence, not only by the bar, but the people, in the present system. Sir, there is something in the doctrine of the three degrees in this matter. The doctrine of degress is to me inexplicable. I only know it exists. It not only runs through all nature, but through the whole system of our government; as well in the general government as in the State government. Your government is divided into the executive, legislative and judicial. Your Legislature is divided into supervisors, by your recent action, the House of Assembly and your Senate. One might take any and all other subjects, and show that they are thus divided, and perhaps to philosophically correspond with cause, effect, and end. Why, then, not make, while we are about it, a judicial system according to philosophical principles? You have now your justices of the peace. Then let us have the Circuit Court in the centre; and what is termed here the independent Supreme Court, or court of last resort, above. Then you have a general system, distinct in one sense, yet continuous in another. Let your circuit be an appellate court from your justices of the peace, and your independent court, by writs of error, or otherwise, from the circuit. You then have a simple system, which is a continuous line, with different degrees, one above the other, and all sufficient for judicial purposes of this State. Now, with the present system, sir, is there not sympathy on the one hand and prejudice among the judges on the other? Why, sir, what will common sense say upon this subject? Did any man ever look on and see two dogs fight but what he took sides almost instantly, and wished one particular one to whip, although he had never seen them before.

Does any man in this Convention believe that a circuit judge of this or any other State, after he has tried a case, has heard the testimony, the arguments pro and con, and given his decision, when that cause has been removed to the Supreme Court, but was inclined to support there his decision? Would it not be right so to do? Men see things differently. Their judgments on the same subject are different, and although they might make an erroneous judgment, yet in nine cases out of ten they will adhere to their first decision, right or wrong. Judges are but men; they are under the same influences as other men. To elucidate by comparison: when I came into this Convention I was wedded to no particular system; I held myself ready to be impressed with what was just, right and proper; I went into the committee room free and unbiassed; I was rather inclined, from what light I received upon the subject, to go for an independent court, and voted for the same. Now, I have a pride of opinion. How it comes I know not, except by that undefinable something, termed sympathy. Human nature is the same. All are governed by the same laws. Do we not all know that it is hard, after a committee have made a report on any subject to this Convention, to make an inroad into it? And what is this owing to but to the same principle? A pride of opinion, a judgment already formed, and a laudable adhesion thereto, from a consciousness of its justice. Precisely so, in my humble estimation, are the judges of the Circuit Courts liable to adhere to their prejudged decisions, made in the circuits, when called upon to revise them when sitting in banc in the court above. But, say the gentlemen across the way, the judge who tried the case below does not sit in judgment in banc above, on his own case. Suppose he does not. In cases almost equally balanced, with authorities of refutation on either side, cannot he log-roll with his fellows in the same condition? Would they not condescend, possibly, to act out nature, and act like other interested men for self, and say, you scratch my elbow this time, and I will scratch yours the next? We must preserve our reputation. I think I am right in that decision. Don't you, under the circumstances? Is this not human nature? Is it imaginary? I think not. Thus much from sympathy. Now, in regard to the opposite influence, prejudice. Should the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] prevail, we shall have to increase our judicial force to seven or eight circuit judges. Thus, then, we should have this squad or cohort of legal gentlemen, all vying with each other, to see which shall be uppermost; all running the race of popularity, each trying to outstrip the other in mounting the highest round in the ladder of legal ambition. Think you not that under these circumstances legal human nature will not out, and show herself like human nature under other circumstances? Will not many decisions be reversed through prejudice, competition for elevation and what not? Have there not cases under the present system transpired under these influences? It strikes me there is danger from both these causes, if the system of the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] prevail. System, did I say? He proposes no system. This amendment is but to upset the independent system proposed by the committee. Should this second section of the article be struck out, and the amendment substituted, we have got to go on and make details for him, and perfect his article. Why not show his whole hand at once, and let us know what he wants? Why not give us his system? Sir, I hope this amendment will not prevail. We can then go on, and instead of this half circuit and half supreme, half horse and half alligator, this mixed and mongrel court, form a simple, plain court of last resort, upon philosophic principles, to the end that justice and judgment shall be speedily obtained, unbiased, unawed and unaffected by either sympathy on the one hand, or prejudice on the other.

Mr. TIFFANY—As the responsibility seems to rest entirely on the profession, I hope that the petitions of the bar may be read, that the committee may know what the opinions of the bar are.

Mr. McCLELLAND—They have most of them been read, and besides, a great many bars have not sent in any petitions. The bar of my county (said Mr. McC.) are opposed to the independent system, though they did not send any remonstrance or petition, because they thought the Convention capable of deciding.

Mr. MASON—Would the gentleman be in favor of having the judges elected by general ticket, or in the districts.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I am in favor of having the judges elected by general ticket; but it is a matter of detail which the Convention can decide.

[The petition from the bar of Detroit was read.]

Mr. McCLELLAND would inquire how many names were attached to the petition, and how many members of the bar had signed it. He supposed there were eighty members of the bar in Detroit.

Mr. GOODWIN said there were more than that number in the city. He had been informed that the petition had been got up in haste, and that many who were in favor of it had not had an opportunity of signing it. He believed a large number of the bar of Detroit were in favor of the system recommended in the petition.

Mr. STOREY called for the reading of the petition of the bar of Jackson.

[Sundry petitions were read.]

Mr. WHIPPLE here addressed the Convention at length.

Mr. HANSCOM said—It seemed to him that the friends of the Circuit Court system ought to have perfected their plan. The committee might as well not have reported, as far as this system is concerned. It would require an extra remodelling of their report. It would tend to expedite business if the friends of the system would perfect it.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—It would so. If the committee adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Kent, or that of the gentleman from Monroe, it will be proper to recommit the subject.

Mr. CORNELL—Did the gentleman from Oakland oppose the principle of the Circuit Court system because its friends had not presented a bill?

Mr. HANSCOM said the friends of the Supreme Court have perfected their system—the opponents have not.

Mr. CORNELL considered this brought about by parliamentary chicanery. He would explain. The gentleman at the head of the committee on the judiciary reported the article, and at the same time introduced a resolution which was subsequently to be taken up, to the effect that if the Circuit Court should be preferred, the article was to be recommitted, with instructions to report another system. It was a resolution of instructions. With that he (Mr. C.) was satisfied. That resolution lay a long time on the table. An amendment was made to that resolution by the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND;] and soon after that the chairman of the committee withdrew his resolution. Another gentleman immediately arose, and referred the report to the committee of the whole. I considered that, at the time, as a sort of parliamentary chicanery, though I would not cast any reflections on the chairman of the committee. Under the circumstances, the system could not be perfected, and the object was to present only one. If I am wrong in my conclusions, I am open to conviction.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The very object of the amendment was to advise the gentleman from Oakland. The gentleman was for taking the question on the proposition in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY.] Then he could go on and perfect it. That was my object, if I have not done it. I was necessarily absent from the Convention, and did not know what was going on. When I returned I did not find anything presented.

The gentleman from Calhoun misunderstood me; but when I am in error I will confess it. The language of my amendment did, to his mind, convey an idea different from his proposition. That was, making the supreme judges discharge the duties of the Circuit Court, instead of making the circuit judges sit on the supreme bench. I did not see the difference at the time, as I now do. I offered it to prevent delay, and save the time of the Convention; and every delegate will bear me out that if you perfect one system, and then another, it will occupy two or three weeks time. If you adopt that amendment, and recommit the article back to the committee on the judiciary, I believe the chairman of that committee, with his knowledge and experience on the subject, will prepare the necessary details by to-morrow morning. Any gentleman of the profession who has had experience would do it in that time.

Mr. BAGG—Mr Chairman: I have listened with great attention and not a little interest to the speech just made by the gentleman from Berrien, the Chief Justice of this State; and am much obliged to him for the recitation of the experiences of not only the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, but his own experience in regard to the Supreme Court of this State. His effort is valuable to this body, chiefly in reflecting upon it, as it were, in a mirror, in a succinct manner, the history of the action of these courts. But, sir, does it touch the subject under consideration? The gentleman is very careful to conceal his system from the committee. Indeed, he seems, between the systems proposed by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] and the one proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] to stand the same relation to the two that the celebrated animal did to the two stacks of hay; so equally operated upon by attraction on either side that he stood still and starved to death. This judicial article has been delayed for absent gentlemen until this time; and yet, gentlemen do not now show their hands. Why not come out frankly, and tell us what they do want? We have had from the commencement a majority in this Convention for an independent system; but out of courtesy for certain gentlemen, we have condescended to wait until now; and from absence of the friends of the measure, and sickness of others, we are in a minority. I warn the opponents of the measure, however, we will yet pass it. We have got the strength and the will, and when our friends return we will yet do it. The gentleman, to be sure, delivered us a good eulogy or homily upon the various nisi prius and other circuit systems now in existence in other States, but did he touch the subject now under consideration? Not at all. His whole effort was, in my estimation, characterized by that principle that characterizes the optical delusion of the sailor when far at sea, and land appears at a distance; and on sailing days in the same direction no land appears. I allude to that celebrated sea phrase, "point no point."

The gentleman will not acknowledge that the judgment of the circuit judges, in sitting in banc in the Supreme Court, are effected or operated upon by sympathy; but on the contrary, he says there have been a great number of cases that have not been affirmed, and adverts with great emphasis to this, to show that there has been no undue concert on this account. In steering clear of Charybdis, does he not fall into Scylla? Does he not show conclusively that they are, and would be ever, more or less operated upon by prejudice and jealousy towards each other? Sir, we talk of and propose here in the organic law to make a judicial system. Can a system be made without order? Is not order Nature's first law? How can you establish a system in the mongrel manner proposed? You have your circuit judges first give judgment in one court house below, and then let them simply congregate in another house above, and review that made below. Is there anything like order or system here? Not at all. While the independent system proposes three courts, a Justice Court, the Circuit Court in the centre, and a Supreme Court above, your other systems are a Justice Court, and a Circuit and Supreme Court jumbled together, conglomerated and mixed up.

The people have repudiated the latter, and sent us here for the purpose of making a different one. Shall we disappoint them? Should this mongrel circuit system prevail, I trust the justices of the peace shall be permitted to sit in banc in the Circuit Court, in the same manner and with the same view that the circuit judges form the Supreme Court. Their decisions are carried by appeal and certiorari to the Circuit Court, in the same manner that the decisions of the circuit judges are carried to the Supreme. If one review their decisions in the one case, so should the other, and what is proper for the one is proper for the other. But I trust that the amendment will not prevail. Should it not, we will then go on and perfect the independent system, make a system of order which can be built upon with success. We want to make at best four big men in this State. Men who will attend to the law and give us justice. Men that God has done something for in the manifestation of their intellectual organs, as well as what they have done for themselves by their own exertions.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, the committee rose, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

The committee, through their chairman, reported progress and asked leave to sit again. Leave was granted.

When, on motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the President.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the judiciary article, Mr. Cook in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of the substitute offered by Mr. McCLELLAND, and amended by Mr. CHURCH.

The question being on striking out,

Mr HANSCOM said—Before the question is taken, I desire to say a few words upon this important subject, and particularly to refer to the remarks that have been made in relation to the petition that I had the honor some days since to present, and which has been to-day read. That petition embodies the opinions of a very large proportion of the citizens of the county of Oakland, and expresses, as I believe, the views of the great mass of the people of northern Michigan.

The gentleman from Berrien [Chief Justice WHIPPLE] has seen proper to assail the petitioners and the petition, and charges that some of the allegations contained in it are false in fact—disclaiming as I now understand him, any intention to charge the petitioners with wilfull or intentional misrepresentation. I am glad that he has seen fit to make the disclaimer, because, sir, that petition is signed by many gentlemen of the highest character and standing—men of the first order of intelligence and of undoubted probity and honor—men entirely incapable of misrepresenting upon any subject, and least of all, upon one of this grave magnitude and import. But, conceding them in error, which I certainly do not, and assuming as true what is alleged by the Chief Justice, (and I have certainly no wish or desire to contradict him,) that the present condition of business in the Circuit or Supreme Courts does not warrant the allegations in the petition—conceding, if you please, that there is no unfinished business now pending in the Circuits or in the Supreme Court, and what does it prove, as applied to the question under consideration? Exactly nothing. And for this most obvious reason: that, since 1846, we have had in every county of the State, a local judicial tribunal that has finally absorbed the whole business of the Circuits; so far, at least, as its original jurisdiction was concerned, except as applied to causes in equity. Consequently, the business of the Circuits for the past three years has been merely nominal; and as a necessary result, the judges have had ample time and most abundant leisure to clear the dockets of both the Circuit and Supreme Courts; and were there now pending any considerable amount of business undisposed of in either of those courts, it would furnish good ground for the removal of the judges from their offices, as contemplated by the provisions of the present constitution.

Take, as an illustration, the county of Oakland, where, prior to the organization of the County Courts, the Circuit was in session from three to five months in each year; a few days now suffice to dispose of the business in that court, and in lieu of it we now have an almost continuous term of the County Court from the beginning to the end of the year. Now, sir, it is proposed by all parties on this floor, and both systems of judiciary that we have mooted contemplate the annihilation of the County Courts. Your plan restores the old system, or rather continues it as it was before the creation of County Courts; and the simple abolition of County Courts constitutes the only real change that the opponents of a separate Supreme Court are proposing. It is but the continuation of the present system; a system that experience has most fully proven to be entirely inadequate to the exigencies of the State. We propose the adoption of a new, or at least a different, system--what gentlemen have been pleased to call an experiment, an untried experiment; and I, for one, most deeply regret that it has been so long an untried experiment in our State. Such, however, is not the fact: in most of the western and southern and south-western States, it has been tried, and that too with entire satisfaction to the people of those States. You have but to cross our southern border to find a system analogous to that we propose in existence. There it has existed unchanged since the admission of Indiana into the Union; and what citizen of that young but already gigantic State but can point with satisfaction and pride to the decisions of their Supreme Court, and that a separate tribunal composed of only three judges? Sir, no State in this Union has as yet, in the brief space of twenty years, been able to organize a judiciary system, and acquire for it and the adjudications under it, so proud an eminence as the State of Indiana. The reports of her Supreme Court are cited and held as high authority in the courts of every State of the Union; and even at a much earlier day than the present in her judicial history, we find Chancellor Kent paying the high tribute of his admiration to her system--to her judges and the able decisions formed in her books of law reports.

I have already, on a former occasion, stated briefly what in my judgment would constitute the advantages of our system, and have also on another occasion attempted a defence of it, against the objections urged by several gentlemen, particularly the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] from Genesee, [Mr. BARTOW,] and from Washtenaw, [Mr. KINGSLEY,] and am not now disposed to again tread over the same ground, although the same objections have again and again been repeated. I design to confine myself to answering a new set of objections urged by the chief justice, and to an examination of the existing system which it is proposed to enlarge and perpetuate; and while I regret to detain the Convention upon this subject, the high importance that I, in common with my immediate constituency, attach to our action upon it, must furnish my only apology. Its known and conceded consequences to the people of the State, coupled with the fact that our action is destined to have an enduring effect upon our destiny as a commonwealth, not only seem to justify, but require, at the hands of every friend of good order in society, a full and candid exposition. I shall not stop now to answer objections or deal with arguments that could only have been offered in a spirit of captiousness, or for the purpose of arousing popular prejudices against the legal profession, or against what gentlemen have sneeringly called an independent judiciary system, or to gloss over and cover up the manifold defects of the present cumbrous, expensive and inefficient system. I choose to leave that to others who have more taste for contrasting questions that have no real bearing upon the great question under consideration. I now ask the attention of gentlemen in all seriousness to a few plain questions: In what does the system proposed by our opponents differ from that existing at the organization of the present County Courts? Was not that system, when our population was far less than now, found entirely inadequate to the necessities and exigencies of the State? If the system has so signally failed in the early history of the State, after fifteen years of trial, how can we anticipate that it will now, and for fifteen or twenty years to come, answer our purposes, and that too with a trebled or quadrupled population and a corresponding increase of business? If causes have been found upon the calendar year after year, by reason of the inability of the judges to dispose of them, how do gentlemen expect to get prompt and rapid decisions in future, with the necessary and natural augmentation of business? Questions upon this subject might be multiplied to an almost indefinite extent, but it is useless.

These inquiries have been to some extent anticipated, and attempts made to palliate their force; and how, sir, has it been done? The Chief Justice tells us that it was want of judicial force that crushed the system and brought it into disrepute; and that the addition of three new circuits is to furnish a full remedy. Conceding the truth of the first proposition, it does not at all follow that the remedy will be found in the proposed increase of the number of judges. Why, sir, five judges could not do the business when our State was in infancy, and had but one-third or one-half of her present population or business, and the necessity for creating County Courts and other local tribunals to relieve the Circuits, was forced upon us; and now we are gravely told that after the abolition of our County Courts, eight judges are to be sufficient to carry on the system for the coming fifteen years; when, in the ordinary course of events, our population and business will have been increased ten-fold beyond what it was when crushed by its own weight. But another class of its advocates tell us that it was the fault of the judges; that they were inefficient or incompetent. Conceding this, does it follow but that under the same system, the same kind of men may again find their way upon the bench?

The Chief Justice and others, however, disclaim that such was the fact; and I cordially join in the disclaimer. It was the fault of the system, and one that must of necessity ever exist under it. On one side the circuits come in conflict with and jostle the Supreme Court. On the other the Supreme Court plays the same antics with the circuits. It has been so, and it will continue to be so as long as you continue to neglect the principle of an appropriate division of duties of labor and responsibility. Any and every plan combining such gross anomalies must partake in a greater or less degree of these characteristic evils. These are some of the mischiefs that our system proposes to remedy. To withdraw the circuit judges from all business except that incident to the discharge of their duties at the circuits, would leave no refuge for excuses for the non-performance of those duties promptly and efficiently. We take from them the power to say to-day, "my duties require me to meet with the Supreme Court in some distant part of the State, and the business of the circuit must go undone until a more convenient season." We would also take from the judges of the Supreme Court the power to tell us that the duties of the circuits required their attention, and the Supreme Court must be dissolved, and for the time being, vanish into thin air, leaving important causes undisposed of; and I ask gentlemen if the attainment of this result is not most desirable. Would it not tend to promote dispatch, regularity and order, in what has hitherto been confused, irregular, and uncertain? To all, this result would seem almost a necessary and natural consequence of a separation of the courts; and I believe that with your proposed eight judges, twice the amount of judicial labor can be accomplished, and that in a more satisfactory manner, by having three of those judges disconnected with the circuits and sitting only in banc for the final adjudication of causes.

The Chief Justice, in his elaborate and able argument, has fallen into some serious errors, which deserve notice. He has seen fit to reiterate many arguments which have been already triumphantly answered by other gentlemen who have addressed the Convention; and I would not now advert to them, but for the new vamping he has given them, and the fact that many members are in their seats who were absent when this subject was formerly under discussion. The President of the Convention [Mr. GOODWIN] and another gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BACKUS,] had, as I supposed, completely vindicated our proposed system from all the objections, whether specious or real, that had been urged against it with even a tolerable show of plausibility. Again they are brought forward, decked in a new guise by the Chief Justice. He tells us we propose to withdraw the Supreme Court from the people; and to follow him in his fanciful imaginings, one would be led to believe we sought to create a species of judicial Juggernaut, shrouded in mystery and gloom—its dark recesses never to be visited by the light of day—all of fact must have been forgotten, and the imagination highly wrought upon, to have built such a superstructure upon such a foundation as is furnished by this judicial article.

Let me for one moment call his attention to the facts. By the terms of this article we propose five judicial circuits for the present, in the lower peninsula. We require the judges of the Supreme Court to hold two terms of that court in each circuit in each year; thus making it necessary for three judges to traverse the State from one extremity to the other, and bring the administration of the laws as near the people as practicable. Then comes the gentleman from Washtenaw, the land of judicial simplification and reform, [Mr. KINGSLEY,] and tells us that the people never attend the Supreme Court—they care nothing about it. Well, does the gentleman regard this as an evil? If so, how does he propose to remedy it? I know of no way except we incorporate some compulsory provision by which men shall be compelled to attend upon the sittings of our courts, whether they desire it or not. Is this what the gentleman wants? This is among a class of objections to our plan that I am frank to say must be regarded as unanswerable. They are so completely baseless, pointless and unmeaning, that human intellect cannot controvert or answer them. But how does the Chief Justice, and the other gentlemen who embrace his views, propose to remedy the exclusiveness, and get rid of the aristocratic features of the Supreme Court? By the article they have reported as the basis of their action, two or three terms only are to be held in each year, at some one or two important points only, in the State. And that is the way that this tribunal is to be democratized, and its mysterious workings opened to the public gaze. But I have no patience to enlarge upon this branch of the subject. It savors too much of absurdity to need exposition, though gravely urged by gentlemen of high standing and acknowledged abilities. We heard from the Chief Justice, and I heard it with astonishment and regret, that the Supreme Court was comparatively of little importance—a matter of secondary consideration. Such statements, coming from the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] and others who gave their concurrence, I regarded as the speculations of the politician rather than the opinions of the lawyer or jurist; and little dreamed that the Chief Justice of our own or any other State of this Union, would be found standing sponsor to doctrines so entirely opposed to every principle of propriety or reason.

It involves an entire perversion of every rule upon which the affairs of mankind have been conducted since the organization of society. What, sir! are we to be told that the highest judicial tribunal in the land—that tribunal that gives constructions to our laws—that may annul the acts of the legislative department of the government—that may override the executive and legislative departments combined—that gives a final construction to the very constitution under which they hold their offices, and your laws are framed—that has in its keeping the dearest and most sacred rights of every citizen—that has a superintending control over all the other judicial tribunals and governmental departments of the State, is matter of little consequence; that it is of no great importance who are the men who compose this court, and wield this great yet necessary and salutary power?

Sir, I had supposed the fact to be otherwise, and been taught to regard the court of last resort, both under the federal constitution and in the various States, as the anchor to which, in the hour of danger and of peril, we could look with most confidence for security and safety—as the last barrier that we could successfully interpose against the oppressions of individuals, the exactions of power, or the more to be dreaded dangers of confusion and anarchy.

If these gentlemen are correct, you require a greater amount of political ability and statesmanship to discharge the duties of a supervisor in a township, than to administer the chief executive department of your government—greater legal acquirements and more thorough judicial training to act as a justice of the peace, than to discharge the high functions of a judge of your Supreme Court. Such, sir, and such only, is the practical effect of the argument, when carried out in principle and detail.

We have also had again paraded before us, as the very model of excellence, the federal judiciary system. Now, sir, admitting that it may be best, as applied to the judicial affairs of the Union, does it follow at all that it would be adapted to this or any other of the States? And if this system is so completely perfect in all its parts—so admirably adapted to all conditions of society—to every state and community—why not take it as a whole? Why not appoint your judges by the executive for life or during good behavior? Why not require your Supreme Court to sit only once in each year, and then at the seat of government of the State? Why not require the judges to go but once in each year into each county and hold the circuit? Why not have elected in each county a judge to set with him and give him power to hold a court in his absence? If gentlemen are serious in wanting to engraft this system upon our State constitution, let them avow it in plain terms; if not, let us hear no more rhapsodies upon its beauties and perfections, and let it no longer be held up to us as that model of excellence which we should copy. I, sir, believe in the election of judges by the people, so that that class of officials, as well as others, shall have a direct responsibility to the people for the manner they perform their duties. I also believe in their holding frequent terms of their courts at such places as will best commodore the great mass of our citizens who have interests depending upon their action.

Another objection is urged against our system by our opponents, and alleged by them to be remedied by the article they have reported. It is the election of judges of the Supreme Court by the people of the State at large; and even here the Chief Justice has followed in the train of argument of those who urged that this mode of electing involved the danger of selecting incompetent and bad men. If such be really the fact, it should be avoided, and I propose to consider the proposed remedy in connection with the allegation. The remedy consists in electing the judges of this court in small districts, composed of one-eighth, tenth or twentieth part of the State, so that the electors may be enabled to know personally the man for whom they are casting their ballots. Specious argument indeed! “Diminish the circle from which you are to select, and you will get better and abler men.” I wonder that this sublime discovery in the science of government has not been made at an earlier day. It would have saved vast trouble and expense in the selection of the various officers of government.

The principle, if good and a true one, should have a general and universal application; and it is sometimes a good way of testing the wisdom of a theory, by carrying it to its ultimatum; and I propose that test here, that its unrivalled advantages may be fully seen and justly appreciated. How are all the people to know personally the candidate for whom they vote, as President of the United States, or any other official selected from the nation or from the State at large? The electors cannot know him, and consequently bad men may and probably will be elected. Now, these gentlemen should propose that the people of Delaware or Rhode Island, where every elector is supposed to know every citizen of the State personally, should designate the Chief Magistrate of the nation, and they should be required to take him from one or the other of their own States. The people of some townships of the State should designate the Governor for the State. The inhabitants of some school districts should pick up your members of Congress. Now, these gentlemen have not sufficiently refined upon their plan; they should get the very excellencies of their system, by requiring the people of some small or obscure township to furnish from among them the judges of the Supreme Court. I had supposed that as you increased the numbers from among whom a choice was to be made, just in that ratio you increased the means for finding the requisite talents for any station. I had also supposed that those who administered the laws for the whole State, and whose business it was to induce uniformity in decisions throughout the whole land, and who had in keeping the interests of the whole people, and who should be removed from all local or sectional prejudices or feelings, and who are responsible to the whole people, should be chosen by the entire body of electors of the State. And I am fully convinced this plan of electing your judges of your court of last resort in small districts, is one of the most serious objections to your proposed system. There follows two classes of objections diametrically opposite; each, however, assailing the separate system. One set of opposers tell us that the judges of the Supreme Court will have nothing to do—that their offices will be sinecures. Another set, about equal in numbers and experience, and with about an equal show of argument and reason, assure us that so much business will be forced upon that court that three judges cannot by possibility do it, and we are pointed to Indiana and her overloaded docket as evidence. I propose to leave these two extremes to battle with and balance each other, thinking it not unlikely that the truth lies between the two, and if so, the whole matter is properly reconciled.

I come now to another branch of the inquiry, and by far the most important, as applied to the merits and defects of the existing system—the system that is proposed to be enlarged and continued by incorporating it into the constitution and making it a permanent system in our machinery of government. We are told, as already suggested, we can get better judges; that the plan tends to educate and fit them for judges. This conclusion is based upon the assumption that we are, in the first instance, to elect men wholly unfit for any stations, as judges of the court of last resort. I believe, sir, if the people are left free to select from the State at large, they will secure the very best men—men of first rate acquirements and thoroughly educated to the profession of the law. Such has been the case in other States; and there is no good reason to suppose ours would furnish an exception. But it is urged by the petitioners that, under the existing system, there is a want of proper confidence in our judicial decisions; that the very organization of the court renders it at least possible that improper influences may control the decisions of the Supreme Court. Whether these assumptions are well or ill founded, is hardly material. The impression has gone abroad, and exists, and it will continue to so long as you perpetuate the system that gave rise to it; and it is well known that the administration of the law should not only be pure in fact, but, as far as practicable, placed above and beyond suspicion. Every thing that tends to weaken public confidence in the integrity and sanctity of legal decisions, is of most mischievous tendency, and no one can disguise but that our present system is subject to this objection.

You have upon the bench of the Supreme Court four or a dozen judges; there are pending in that tribunal causes that have been passed upon by each of those judges at the circuits, which the parties are seeking to have reversed upon the ground of error in the decision of those judges; the affirmation of those judgments, however just, cannot induce the satisfaction, and is not free from a class of objections that could have no application to a separate and distinct court. The present judges of our Supreme Court are men of undoubted ability and integrity; and conceding that in the performance of their duties they will give as general satisfaction as any other equal number that could be found in the State, they are, nevertheless, a portion of the human race, and subject to all the influences, impulses, passions or prejudices common to mankind; and it may well be doubted whether it is in the nature of man to be placed in the position they now hold, and not be at times operated upon in their judgments and decisions by some of the improper influences that have been referred to. There may be judges under whose administration the evil may become intolerable; and it is against such a possibility that we should now place the most effectual guards. But we are told by the Chief Justice, in defence of the system, and as an argument against the one we propose, that the New England States, under analogous judicial organization, have secured the most prompt, efficient and satisfactory administration of the laws; and also that the decisions of the old Supreme Court in New York rank higher in point of ability than those made after the creation of a separate court.

Now, sir, as applied to the first allegation, before it can fairly be recognized as proving anything, our opponents should show that the circumstances and condition, the wants and exigencies of our State, are analogous to theirs. Every gentleman here, however, well knows that such is far from being the fact; and that, on the contrary, some of the worst evils that have been entailed upon our State have resulted from borrowing from other States their statutory provisions; and without considering their want of adaptation to our peculiar circumstances, making them rules for our guidance and governance. While lessons of wisdom may properly be drawn from their experience, we should not overlook the experience and experimenting for the past fifteen years in our own State. The results of that experience are around us, and were among the chief causes that induced the assembling of this Convention. That experience has demonstrated that it was worse than folly to attempt, for the coming fifteen or twenty years, a continuance of the present system. And, sir, it may be most truly affirmed that in no department of this government were such entire and radical changes so loudly called for, and so universally demanded by the people, as in our judiciary system. Such, at least, I know to be the fact, as applied to my immediate constituents; and I fully believe it to have been general throughout the State. And now, when change and reformation are to be had everywhere else, in this most important matter there is to be none, unless it be such as I firmly believe will increase existing evils and induce more universal dissatisfaction.

Now, sir, one word as to the last reason adduced by the Chief Justice. He tells us that abler and better decisions by the Supreme Court is the natural result of this system, and that the proof is furnished in the judicial history of the State of New York. To me it appears a sufficient answer to point to the books of reports of that State, and call to mind the enormous multiplication of causes in her Supreme Court, and the consequent increase of business and labor that occurred soon after the change of their system. That increase was the result not only of the natural increase of population, of wealth, and of commerce, but of other and more important, unnatural, or at least unusual, causes. These combined causes tended to pour into the judicial tribunals of that and every other State in the Union, an amount of business unprecedented in our former history, and that rendered the judicial force ordinarily required wholly inadequate to the exigencies of the crisis.

The wild speculations in every department of business, the over-trading and over-doing in every pursuit, that occurred between the years 1830 and '40, and the terrible revulsions in the business and commercial world that was consequent upon this era of madness and folly, induced an amount of business to find its way into the Supreme Court of that State, that rendered lengthened and laborious investigation wholly impracticable. Cases upon which, under an ordinary state of things, the labor of months had been bestowed, were crowded into as many days or hours. The consequences were inevitable—hasty and crude decisions. But another fact should not be forgotten; that for the twenty years prior to the formation of a separate Supreme Court, several of the most laborious and able men that ever adorned the judicial annals of this country had held seats upon the bench of her courts; they were not educated after their induction into office; they were profound lawyers and accomplished jurists when placed there; and their earliest decisions compare favorably with any made by them in after life. Such being the facts, I am not willing to concede that anything unfavorable to our system is fairly deducible from them; but, sir, were it otherwise, I have yet to learn that any State in this Union or any country on the globe has ever attempted such a system, as applied to its principles and details, as is now proposed by our opponents. So far as presented to us, it contemplates eight circuit judges, to be chosen by the electors of their respective circuits. Four of them are to constitute a Supreme Court; three can make a final and binding decision, less than a majority of what is in fact the supreme bench. To me this is an anomaly; but, your supreme bench may change without even the election of new sets of judges. What is to-day the Court may not be to-morrow; three other of these circuit judges may be on the bench, and another decision made reversing that of yesterday. I can see neither stability, uniformity, certainty nor safety in it. I can see, however, standing out in bold relief, every evil and mischief that has cursed the people of Michigan since the organization of our State government. I can also see in the prospective other evils almost as great, added to those that have already existed.

Among the most important considerations that we should seek to accomplish, is that of expediting the final decision of causes. No one thing connected with the administration of our laws has been the subject of more serious and universal complaint than the eternizing of causes in our Circuit and Supreme Courts. Middle aged men, who become involved in litigation in our higher judicial tribunals, either at law or in equity, must have a lifetime extended beyond the ordinary allotment, or their suits would be left a legacy to their children. This was one of the mischiefs that we confidently believe would, to a great extent, be remedied by our proposed system. By the division of duties as already suggested, you will leave no pretext or excuse for not promptly passing upon causes as they arise; and holding two terms of the Supreme Court annually, in each circuit, will place it almost beyond possibility that any cause can be continued without the assent of parties, to exceed one year. The opposite plan, instead of furnishing a corrective, is destined to be worse than the present one. And I fear that hereafter, instead of causes being disposed of in one generation, they will become permanent heir-looms in the families of litigants; and should they ever have an end, it will furnish an interesting subject of research to the legal antiquary to trace back through the mists of ages and ascertain at what era in the history of the world they had their beginning. Another consideration of some importance seems to have been wholly overlooked. By adopting the circuit system, you interpose an effectual barrier between the bench and some of the best legal talents of the State. There are men in our State, and ever will be, whose talents and learning would adorn any judicial position; who have not those physical energies, and that hardy and robust constitution that would enable them to endure the hardships incident to the duties of circuit judges. Every member of the legal profession well knows that to travel at all seasons of the year, on foot or horseback, the hundreds of miles of bad roads that have to be traversed in the newer portions of the State, and then attend to the arduous labors of holding a protracted term of the Circuit Court, requires physical strength and energy seldom found in men much past middle age.

But I have trespassed upon the time of the Convention far longer than I had designed, and will detain you but a few moments, while I advert to the charge that is constantly rung in our ears, that our system will be an expensive one. I regard any bad system an expensive one, and a good one as cheap at almost any rate; and above all things else, a judiciary system should not be squared by the dollars and cents that its administration may cost. But as the matter has been so often adverted to, let us examine as to the fact a moment.

We propose 3 judges of the Supreme Court, say at $1,500 each, $4,500

5 judges of Circuit Courts, at same, 7,500

Making for pay of judges annually, $12,000

Now, sir, what are the people of the State now paying for salaries to judicial officers?

4 judges of Supreme Court, at $1,500 each, $6,000

1 Chief Justice, 1,600

30 county judges, (as estimated, per annum,) 13,400

Making annually the sum of $21,000

So that our extravagant system will operate to reduce, in the single item of the pay of judges, the taxation of the State $9,000 per annum. Add to this the enormous expenses incurred in the various counties for contingent expenses, extra compensation to sheriffs, constables, and other incidental charges, and I am confident that the reduction will be equal to one half.

This saving would double the number of the judges we propose to elect for the circuits; and no one pretends but that six or eight judges, disconnected with other duties, could for the next twenty years do promptly the judicial business of the State. And, sir, by our system we leave to the people and the Legislature full power over the subject. Changes in or increase of the circuits, have no effect on your Supreme Court.

Under the other system you increase the number of circuits and of judges to twelve or fifteen; (and I confidently predict it will ere long be necessary;) and you have presented the anomaly of a supreme bench composed, in fact, of as many judges; yet one-fourth of the number, for all practical purposes, compose that tribunal, and give law to the State—make decisions that bind the other three-fourths of their colleagues at the circuits, in common with all other inferior jurisdictions in the State. I ask gentlemen to pause and reflect before they shall impose such an incongruous system upon the people of Michigan for the coming fifteen or twenty years. It is true, you give a power to change after six or eight years, thus practically conceding that by that time the judicial organization you are now making will have become intolerable. I believe it will be so before half that number of years has gone by. All its better features we have tried already, and even these have been universally condemned. What, then, can you expect from their continuance, overloaded with still more obnoxious provisions than have as yet obtained in our own or any other State?

I will not say, as others have said, that I am confident the constitution will be rejected by the people if we adopt this system. While I believe it ought to be rejected, yet I am convinced that the desire for change is so universal, almost any constitution we present will be gladly tried as a hoped for remedy for existing and prospective evils. This fact should but induce more guarded and careful action upon the part of this Convention. Above all things let us place our judiciary upon high and firm ground, that it may in all coming time be adequate to our wants, and at the same time command the confidence and respect of the people of the State. Our proposed system, I confidently believe, will accomplish both these results, and I am equally well convinced the other will fail to accomplish either.

[Mr. Goodwin then addressed the Convention in favor of the independent system, and was followed by Mr. McCLELLAND, in reply, in favor of the circuit system.]

Mr. WILLIAMS had not intended to say anything on this subject, but as other gentlemen had been called on besides those belonging to the legal profession, he would respond to the call. It is true that the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] insisted that he was a lawyer. Still, he had been exclusively, for fifteen years, engaged in a multiplicity of business, as the gentleman from Monroe was well aware. He knew not the motives of the gentleman, unless it was to drag him into the profession in order to give it respectability and character in the Convention. However, what little he had to say was drawn from his experience and observation as a business man.

When we first came together, he felt partial to the Circuit Court system. But from day to day his views had changed, and he was now in favor of such a system in its principal features as the committee have reported. In the first place, it cannot be concealed that this Convention was called together on account of the deep, pervading dissatisfaction with either the construction or administration of all parts of the government—legislative, executive and judicial. The legislative department has been changed and modified, radically. Shall we revamp the old judiciary system? With that system, including the County Courts, the people were thoroughly dissatisfied. We ought, therefore, to reorganize all its machinery in such a manner as to give it efficiency, responsibility, character, and more than all, the popular confidence.

He was opposed to the system, as far as it was intelligible, of the gentleman from Monroe. How does he propose to detail those of the circuit judges who are to sit as a Supreme Court? How is the latter to be grafted—how dove-tailed to the other? Is it to be decided by the judges themselves, or by the Legislature? Either way is open to weighty objections. The detail of the system is not forshadowed. The plan is not matured. We know not whether it is proposed to make it complicated or simple in its details.

On the plan of the committee we can construct a system, strong, efficient, simple and adequate at once to meet the growing wants and the expectations of the whole State. It seems to be conceded on all hands that the County Courts are to be superceded. If so, here will be a large amount of business thrown on the Circuit Court. Now, if we make the circuits so small that in the counties having 10,000 people or more the terms can be held quarterly, we at once supply the deficiency created by the annihilation of the County Courts. But if the circuit judges are encumbered with all the duties of the Courts of Chancery and County Courts besides, and are obliged to sit in banc as a Court of Appeals, he believed the court would be overloaded with business, and incompetent to discharge the duties incumbent upon it.

He wanted a court of responsibility. He wanted to leave no chance for excuse. Rightly or wrongfully, it is said of the present court, that a court is adjourned in our county in order that the judge may hasten to sit in the court in banc. They hasten to leave their duties as a Supreme Court, in order to hasten around their circuit to fulfill engagements. He wanted no such system. Let the circuit judges be freed from all duties but holding regularly their terms for trials of fact. Let no contingency relieve them from holding every appointment. In case of sickness the judge of another circuit to hold the court, and we have here responsibility. As regards the Supreme Court, having no duties on the circuit, they can have no excuses. They can decide appeals promptly and readily. Not only so, the judges of the upper court knowing that at the next election they are sure to be superceded by the judges of the circuit, if negligent or dilatory, will always be ready to discharge all their obligations. Both courts therefore will be responsible, not only on these accounts, but being subjected to the Argus eyes of the whole people, and compelled to pass the ordeal of a popular election, and knowing and feeling that those only can be elected who prove the most capable, they are sure to be faithful.

Objections are made on the score of multiplicity of judges and the cost. It may take four supreme judges, and five or seven on the circuits, and the whole swarm of county judges are dispensed with. On the other plan, unless we have a large number of circuits, we must have a kind of County Court, or be deprived of courts except once a year, or at long intervals. Even if the salaries of the Supreme Court are entirely added to the cost of the circuit system, still the $11,400 which, according to the report of the Secretary of State, was paid last year as salaries to county judges, are entirely saved—a sum far more than adequate to pay the salaries of the supreme judges.

Objections are made to the plan of the committee, because it is not democratic. The judges are elected by the people every six years under either system—held to a rigid accountability. On the periodical return of the election, no man will stand the rigid scrutiny unless he is faithful, industrious, learned and enlightened. One system is as democratic as the other, because in both the judges are held accountable to their creators on the recurrence of the same period of time. He had listened to the speech of the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. HASCALL.] It was ingenious, honest and able. But he confessed he could not appreciate the force of the argument that an institution was not democratic, which was renovated by the popular will. He believed that in any system we might adopt, the mere fact that the judges were elective would give them the public confidence to a degree which they never could enjoy if they were the mere creatures of Executive appointment. At this day, through the west, no judiciary can enjoy the public confidence unless elective—no judiciary so elective can forfeit it, unless by neglect, or want of integrity or other qualifications.

A great deal has been said about the necessity of keeping a man on the circuit in order to prevent his growing rusty, that he may understand the business relations and feelings of men. He thought very little of the argument. Are our dearest rights and privileges to be tried before a judge who is just learning his duties? Is he to be so incompetent that he is to experiment on us, in order to fit himself to discriminate and judge rightly? Is he to learn his trade like a bungling tailor who spoils the coat and wastes the cloth of his customers? Put a tyro on the circuit and he will learn, but it is a dear way to educate a judge. No, if we choose men of mature age, men who for a score of years have devoted themselves to those investigations which are necessary; men of that keen discrimination, which is needed to weigh nice questions of fact and law and evidence, how much will they lose during six years in the performance of the highest functions that man can bestow on man, with all their reputation as men and judges at stake. When a man is elevated to such a position, it is too late to make himself familiar with human life or human duty; with business relations of men, or their habits of thought and feeling. Besides you will find the practical operations of the elections to be this: The Supreme Court will every time be renovated by elevating from the circuit those most distinguished for honor, integrity, keenness of discrimination and that extensive knowledge of men and things, in which it is said they must be schooled. If your courts are to be schools, even that object is as well effected one way as the other. He was much more afraid of an ignorant and incompetent supreme tribunal in the plan of the gentleman from Monroe. The time would soon come when we must have a dozen circuits. If the twelve were to be chosen by general ticket, it is inevitable that the detailed four will be sometimes mere political hacks, elected by the log-rolling plan of a caucus; and if elected in districts, there will often be young and incompetent men chosen. In either case, the court of last resort is a creature of chance, in which we could not always repose confidence. The case of Judge Blackford of Indiana, taken above, puts to flight all their arguments that a man must rust out by sitting as a judge in banc. Here is a man who has been 33 years performing the duties in chambers, and he is held all over the Union in the highest estimation, as one of the most accomplished jurists of the nation. Fit when he took the position, experience does not seem to have rendered him less fit.

Here he would observe that the Chief Justice had alluded to certain discontents in Indiana; certain clamors perhaps relative to the great amount of unfinished business. He lived himself on the borders of Indiana, and as far as his knowledge extended, the people of that State viewed their Supreme Court with pride and satisfaction. They were proud of their supreme judges—proud of their reports. If there was discontent, he believed it arose from the fact that the State had outgrown the ability of the present judicial force, and not from any fault of the system itself. There may be a feeling that at present the provision of judges is inadequate to the task imposed on them; he doubted much whether there was much hostility to the system.

There has been a great deal of quotation, a great deal of theorizing, which had produced very little impression on his mind. He cared very much less about the opinions of any man, even Chief Justice Spencer, than he did for a practical consideration for which we were bound to provide. We must meet the facts of our own case, and provide for them; and the only rules or advice we are bound to follow are such as will provide for ourselves the most responsible, prompt, learned and efficient administration of justice. Among judicial tribunals, "that which is best administered, is best." That which proves the best on trial, also, will receive the popular approbation. No system will be popular because its theory seems most plausible. Bring justice home promptly to every man's door, and the system under which it is dispensed must be popular.

All these quotations of authority he regarded as futile on another account. Courts will be the exponent and representative of the people themselves. A corrupt and ignorant people will have corrupt and ignorant courts; an enlightened people enlightened courts. Just so far as the State is distinguished for intelligence, integrity, thrift, honesty, and a regard for law and order, just so far will your courts be distinguished by the same characteristics. The courts will not advance far before your civilization. They are certain to keep pace, but will rarely outstrip you. Both alike are subject to the same laws of progress and decay; and whatever system or theory you adopt, you may depend that practically it will be a type of the people themselves.

Mr. WHIPPLE rose to explain. The gentleman he had conversed with said he did not know that the people of Indiana would change their system; but the court had over six hundred cases standing on their docket. A system that can produce such a state of things must be wrong. Another thing he would mention. The gentleman from Oakland had attributed to him a word he had never used. He did not make use of the word "faisheod." He had said that he thought they should have known the facts. There were names of gentlemen on that paper who should have known the facts.

Mr. N. PIERCE supposed, when legal gentlemen had argued the question, others would come in as jurors. He had endeavored to learn the nature of the subject, and was ready to vote. All the arguments advanced had convinced him that it was better to have a Circuit Court with supreme authority, than to have a separate Supreme Court. The more he heard on the subject, the more he was convinced the Circuit Court system was preferable to the other. The arguments which had convinced the gentleman from St. Joseph [Mr. WILLIAMS] on one side, had convinced him on the other. He had heard nothing amiss of the judges. Law was a labyrinth he never wished to get into. If a man was evil enough disposed not to pay, he should never expect to get it by law. They have been arraigned by the people, and they should come out now and say whether they have been to blame or not.

A gentleman had said that a good judiciary was not dear, and a bad one was dear at any price; but if I (said Mr. P.) can get one as good and cheaper than another, I shall prefer it. I do not think, with the gentleman from St. Joseph, that the people want a change; they want to regulate it so that when a man gets into court he may have some chance of getting out again. Gentlemen have said a great deal in favor of the Supreme Court, but I believe they will have to talk a week longer about it before they can make it go.

Mr. MOORE said—Mr. President: I do not know that I can throw much light upon this question. I supposed the legal gentlemen would. I supposed they would point out the defects in the present system. I am something like the animal this morning spoken of, between the two stacks of hay—don't know which to choose. Two great and grand systems of judiciary are proposed. One with an independent supreme bench; the other with supreme judges doing circuit duties. The latter is pretty much our old system, before the County Courts were established. I don't hardly see that the County Courts are going to have a decent burial. What was the reason that County Courts were established in the first place. Because the business was not done up in the circuits—suits accumulated on the calendar and were passed by from time to time, and from court to court; the profession of course growing fat by it; putting an additional fee into their pockets every time a suit was passed by, until at length the people became dissatisfied with it, and the demand for a change in the system was imperative, and County Courts were established. The profession were determined to kill them. They scoffed at them—literally scouted them down. The whole bar let in their decision upon them, and have fairly bluffed the system out of existence. Every thing was said and is said against them that can be; and now, even on this floor, County Courts are spoken of as among the things that were, and as though, by common consent, they would die out, and that too without giving a reason for it. The profession themselves must take the responsibility of this change, should it be made. They will fix it up for themselves, and they must meet the consequences of it. A splendid judiciary is the glory of the bar, and they may have it yet perhaps. They are like all other men. Human nature is the same among all classes, and in every country. Perhaps they are doing only as all others would, in like circumstances. I say nothing about them. Some of them are among my best friends. But, alter this system again, and change it back to the old one, and you make an expense and delay again in suits, the people will not bear. The people want justice administered in a short, plain, and simple way. They want a system they can understand, and one where suits can be tried at any time—where parties can meet and not be obliged to adjourn with their witnesses from time to time, for a new trial; making more costs and paying an additional fee every time to their lawyer. The people want a judiciary system accessible at all times, and under all circumstances ready and cheap. No other will suit the people, I can assure gentlemen.

If the business is no more than done up now under the present system, with a court in every county at all times on hand, how can it be when the County Courts are abolished? I verily believe if the present system was the settled policy of the country, we would have good judges. Such judges as would do credit to the State; justice secured, and the people satisfied. Where the counties have good judges the system works well, and parties and people are content with it. The business is done up, the docket kept clear, and all understand and have their rights without delay. Keep then the County Courts, and establish three supreme judges to appeal to, to settle the law. If you want to send the supreme judges into the circuits, as now, I have no objections. But I have objections to fixing up a burdensome and expensive system, that will cost the State thousands of dollars, for the honor and glory of the profession. Some ten or twelve judges at high salaries, circuiting through the State, seen once in three or six months, part of them never seen perhaps, separated from the rest as in a cloister, nothing to do but expound the law and grow fat—I tell you it will not do. It will neither do up the business, nor satisfy the people. They want nothing more than the County Court system with three supreme judges, paid by the State, and the county judges paid by the county, and the salary fixed by the supervisors—the county judge to be judge of probate also—the fees of the probate office put into the county treasury, and the county would have little to pay besides for their judges. One judge can hold both offices, do all the business, and be well paid for it, and cost the counties but a trifle.

Then, Mr. Chairman, when the reform is brought about in simplifying proceedings in court—the distinction abolished between law and chancery suits—the pleadings stripped of the technicalities which have so long shrouded the law in mystery, and common sense made to take its place—then, I say, we will have no need of either of the splendid plans proposed by the profession. The gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] has promised to aid in this reform; and I hope to find the bar coming up to this work en masse. This will be a reform worth something. But, Mr. Chairman, I did hope, and I do still expect to hear something said by the profession about the County Court system. I want its history. I want to know why it don't answer the purpose. We were told by the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] that one county had a county judge that was fit to sit on the supreme bench. Does not the system do well in that county? Every other change proposed in the constitution has been overhauled from beginning to end. We have had the sessions of the Legislature over and over again; annual, biennial and triennial—the present system of taxation, and all its changes—the supervisor system with all its duties and improvements—the State officers with their powers and responsibilities—single districts and double districts—elective franchise, and all the other reforms that could be invented; but County Courts have slept the sleep of death almost, and no friend nor enemy scarcely giving cause to approve or condemn them. I want to hear something about the present judiciary system. I want to hear something about the County Courts.

On motion of Mr. BUSH, the committee rose, reported progress, asked and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW,

Resolved, That the Secretary of this Convention be and he is hereby required to procure a sufficient quantity of parchment, upon which to enroll the new constitution.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, (46th day,) August 2.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MERRILL.

The PRESIDENT announced Messrs. MASON, WILLIAMS and SOULE a committee in conformity with the resolution adopted on Wednesday last, relative to the eulogy delivered by the Hon. H. T. BACKUS.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. EASTMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the article entitled "County Officers and County Government" was passed.

The motion was laid upon the table.

Mr. WOODMAN called up his resolution relative to the absence of Mr. P. R. ADAMS, offered on the 23d ult.; when,

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the resolution was indefinitely postponed.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the Convention proceeded to consider, in committee of the whole, the article entitled "Judicial Department," Mr. Cook in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of the substitute for section 2; and a division of the question being called for, section 2 was stricken out.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following as a substitute for the substitute:

"The Supreme Court shall consist of four judges, three of whom shall be necessary to form a quorum; and the concurrence of three shall be necessary to every final decision. The final decision of the judges shall be in writing, signed by them; and a judge dissenting from a decision shall give his reasons for such dissent in writing, under his signature. And the Legislature may, if they shall deem it expedient, require each of the judges of the Supreme Court to hold one of the terms of the Circuit Court in each year in any one of the counties of the State in which more than two terms are annually held."

Mr. McCLELLAND—At present the question appears much in the same form as heretofore. I presume the gentleman [Mr. HANSCOM] is very anxious to take the vote this morning. Some of our men have left town, and some of his intend leaving; so that I am not disposed to prevent the vote being taken.

The gentleman from St. Joseph and other gentlemen asked the Convention to determinately fix the details of the County Court, or something of that sort. I expressed myself heretofore upon that subject; but I suppose, from the remarks which the gentleman made, I was misunderstood. I say again that, so far as I am concerned, and the most of those who act with me, we would be for adopting the provision proposed through the columns of the Marshall Expounder. I will read it, to show what I intend; but it would be entirely a matter for the committee to decide; and as there are more men on it in favor of the independent court system, they would sift this matter thoroughly. Yet I have so much confidence in the honor and integrity of that committee, that I would submit it to them, and them alone.

[Mr. McC. here read an extract from a newspaper, a copy of which the reporter could not procure, together with a substitute offered by him on a previous day.]

Mr. BAGG—We know what the gentleman proposes—we are to have the County Court in its most odious form, thereby breaking down the independent system. I wish the gentleman had told us yesterday what he intended to do. I trust, that as the gentleman has shown his hand, some member will call the yeas and nays, and move a reconsideration of the last vote, for I know that there are men in this committee who will not go this system. And let me tell the gentleman, that when the Convention is full, we can beat him on the independent system. We have the strength when we are all here in Convention. I hope some gentleman will move a reconsideration, and let us hang this matter up to-day and pass over to our other business; because I am satisfied that if we go on with this business now, we will have to undo what we would do here now. I do not doubt that we would beat them even now, if we sent for the members at present in the village. I throw these remarks out now, because I do not wish to spend time in perfecting an article that never can be passed in full Convention.

Mr. McCLELLAND—My friend has taken alarm without any real cause. Because I have taken a position, it is no reason why the gentleman or the committee should adopt it. I have not made a proposition of the kind adverted to by the gentleman, [Mr. BAGG;] I only read an extract from a newspaper, bearing upon this subject, which I thought shadowed forth a good plan. I said I was willing to entrust the details to the judiciary committee. The gentleman is one of that committee; and notwithstanding that he has spoken against my plan several times, yet I am willing to submit it to him, as a member of that committee. I am not captious or tenacious about it by any means. There are very many members, a large majority, I may say, of that committee in favor of the independent judiciary system; yet I am quite willing to submit the subject to their investigation. I did not say that this committee must adopt what I have suggested, nor do I know that the gentlemen who have co-operated with me here, are in favor of it at all. I do not know any such thing, for I have not consulted with them upon the subject. Nor have I done anything out of doors in relation to this system; I have only taken action here in this body. I did not know how this committee stood upon the subject under consideration. I do not know who are going for or against it, except perhaps about twelve members.

Mr. HANSCOM (interposing)—I would suggest to the gentleman this course, viz: I will withdraw my amendment, and move that the committee rise, report back and take a direct vote by yeas and nays on concurring in your amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAND—There are some four or five gentlemen absent who are on our side of the question—I do not know it positively, however—nor am I quite satisfied that those with whom I act in this matter will entirely acquiesce in adopting this course. However, I have no objection at all to pursue the course suggested by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] if no other gentlemen in the committee have any objection; that is, to rise, report back to the Convention and let the house take a vote upon agreeing; the amendment can then come up.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the committee then rose, reported the article with an amendment, and asked the concurrence of the Convention therein.

The question being upon concurring in the amendment, viz: striking out section two of the article, the yeas and nays were ordered on the same.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, a call of the Convention was ordered, and Messrs. CRARY, DANFORTH, GRAHAM and PREVOST were found absent without leave.

On motion, Messrs. CRARY and DANFORTH had leave of absence for the day.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Sergeant-at-Arms was dispatched to secure the attendance of Messrs. GRAHAM and PREVOST; but those delegates soon appearing,

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT—The question is upon concurring with the committee of the whole in the amendment reported, striking out section two.

Mr. McCLELLAND—And inserting.

The PRESIDENT—The report of the committee was, asking concurrence in the amendment reported.

Mr. McCLELLAND—No sir; the understanding was that we were to come into Convention and take a test question upon striking out and inserting.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understood the chairman of the committee of the whole to report the question as being on striking out.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I ask the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] as a man of honor, was not what I have said the proposition agreed to?

Mr. HANSCOM—There is no use in arguing about it—it is alike to me which way we take the vote.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Did not the gentleman propose to me to go into Convention to take a vote upon striking—

Mr. HANSCOM—I did.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I appeal to every member of this Convention if the gentleman did not propose to come into Convention and take a vote upon striking out and inserting? I do not want to make any noise about it, for I am the last man under God's heaven who will impose upon another, or be imposed upon.

Mr. HANSCOM—There is no use in the gentleman getting into a passion. It is all the same thing in what manner we take the vote.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Did not the gentleman agree to go into Convention and take the vote in the manner in which I have said?

Mr. HANSCOM—I proposed to withdraw my amendment, and have a test vote taken in Convention on the question reported.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I will ask the general consent of the Convention to permit the vote to be taken in the way arranged between the gentleman and myself. There is something wrong, somewhere.

Mr. HANSCOM—For one, I have no objection. Let the vote be taken upon striking out and concurring.

Mr. KINGSLEY—I respect both gentlemen very much, but I have no idea that they have the right to make a contract to bind this Convention. I do not consider myself bound by any contract which they may have made. I want to know what has been done in committee of the whole; and whatever they have done, satisfies me.

Mr. McCLELLAND—In reply to the gentleman, I will merely say that it is a customary thing to make such an arrangement as was made. I do not pretend to bind any one. I said in committee I was willing to have a direct vote taken, if no gentleman objected. The gentleman did not rise then and object to it. Of course, when an arrangement is made by one party in committee, and another agrees to it, and no one objects, it is too late to say what the gentleman has said, after coming into Convention.

Mr. HANSCOM—Is it not competent for a gentleman to call for a division of the question?

Mr. McCLELLAND—It is. But in parliamentary matters, as well as in every thing else, there is such a thing as good faith. It is a matter of indifference to me what course is pursued.

Mr. MASON—I ask the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] if the understanding had been as he stated, would it not still be competent for any one to call for a division of the question?

Mr. McCLELLAND—Certainly, it would be; but I have ever heard that there was such a thing as “honor among thieves.”

Mr. MASON—For my part I did not understand the arrangement as indicated.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Could the committee have risen without common consent, and reported the article? Suppose a motion was made that the committee rise, and I got up and said I wanted to amend that article; surely the gentleman must see that it could not rise without unanimous consent.

Mr. MASON—Well, I suppose it was granted at the time.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Then observe good faith, or move to go back into committee.

Mr. HANSCOM—I for one do not wish any one to assume that there was any unfairness in this matter. I would consent to take the question on striking out and inserting, to gratify any gentleman's whims and caprices.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—I understood the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] to come into the arrangement in the manner he indicated.

Mr. KINGSLEY—I have no objection to take the vote upon striking out and inserting.

Mr. BRITAIN—I rise mainly to say that, if the question be not taken in the manner suggested, the Convention should go back to the position in which it was when the gentleman from Monroe had the floor, in order that we may arrive at a proper understanding of the question. It is due to the gentleman, and I will make a motion to that effect.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I hope the gentleman will not adopt that course. As to the misunderstanding that has taken place here, all have heard it, and I am willing to submit to the judgment of the Convention.

The question being upon agreeing to the committee's amendment to strike out section two, it was then taken by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Batrow, J. Batrow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Choate, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Graham, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Marvin, McClelland, Moore, Mosher, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Town, Warden, White, Whipple—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Carr, Chandler, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Crouse, Daniels, Dimond, Fralick, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Lee, Lovell, Mason, McLeod, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, Roberts, Robertson, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Webster, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman, President—39.

So the amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the article entitled "Judicial Department" was recommitted to the committee of the whole.

On motion, the Convention resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Cook in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Judicial Department."

Mr. McCLELLAND offered the following to stand as section two:

"For the term of six years, and thereafter until the Legislature shall otherwise provide, the judges of the several Circuit Courts shall constitute a Supreme Court; and four of said judges shall be a quorum able to transact business; and the concurrence of three of said quorum shall be necessary to a final decision. The Legislature shall have power, whenever they deem it expedient, to organize a separate Supreme Court with the jurisdiction and powers prescribed in this constitution; to consist of one chief justice and three associate judges, to be elected by the qualified electors of this State; said separate Supreme Court, when established, shall not be changed or discontinued by the Legislature for eight years after its organization; the judges thereof shall be so classified that but one of them shall go out of office at the same time, and their term of office shall be eight years."

Mr. HANSCOM moved the following as a substitute for the proposition presented by the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND.]

"The Supreme Court shall consist of four judges, three of whom shall be necessary to form a quorum, and the concurrence of three shall be necessary to every final decision. The final decision of the judges shall be in writing, signed by them; and a judge dissenting from a decision, shall give his reasons for such dissent in writing, under his signature; and the Legislature may, if they shall deem it expedient, require each of the judges of the Supreme Court to hold one of the terms of the Circuit Court in each year, in any of the counties of the State in which more than two terms are annually held."

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the substitute of Mr. McCLELLAND as follows: strike out "separate," wherever it occurs; and also strike out all after "decision" in the fifth line, to and including "State," in the eleventh line, and insert, "The Legislature shall have power to provide by law for the organization of a Supreme Court, with the jurisdiction and powers prescribed in this constitution; to consist of one chief justice, to be elected by the qualified electors of the State; and three associate justices, who shall be circuit judges, and taken from the respective circuits for the time being, in such manner as the Legislature may deem expedient."

I shall beg permission (said Mr. B.) to explain my object in offering this amendment. This committee has already decided in favor of what is called the circuit system; and at the same time the provision adopted gives to the legislature the power to change that into an independent system, as it is called. What I wish to do is this: if we maintain the circuit system at all, I want to maintain as much of it as possible. Gentlemen will not understand me as deserting the circuit system, from the introduction of this amendment. I desire to have it so fixed in the constitution, that if the legislature should hereafter change the system of our judiciary, they will not be compelled to establish an entirely independent system. My vote has been given for the circuit system, and I do not desire to incorporate into the constitution a provision under which the independent court, which has received the condemnation of this body, may grow into existence. If the committee do not adopt this, I will offer another amendment providing for a court to consist of four judges, two of whom shall be circuit judges, and the others elected by the people.

I will present my views in regard to this circuit system now, as I have not heretofore troubled the committee on the subject; and in doing so, I shall trespass but for a very few minutes upon the time of the committee. I have constantly listened with profound interest to the arguments which have been presented on both sides of the question. Mr. Chairman, on one of the first days of the discussion, it was contended that the judges of the Supreme Court should associate with the people, and by mingling with them, become acquainted with their wants and necessities, and thereby would be qualified to perform the duties which devolved upon them.

But the declaration was made the opposite, that one of the censures to which our judges have heretofore been subject, is that they are too much with the people, too much controlled by popular opinion, and not independent enough in their decisions. That was one of the objections made by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM.] I beg leave to say that I do not suppose any one will make an objection here that is not worthy of notice. Therefore I propose to notice that objection. The judges, heretofore, have not been removed from the reach of political prejudices, or from the possibility of being candidates for one or all of your political offices. Some of them have moved about on your circuits at the time that they were standing candidates for office. Is it not from this fact that all the evils to which the gentleman adverted have had their origin? If so, is not that a fact which ought to have its weight in our decision of this question? And does not the fact of the judges being candidates for office, explain the cause of all those deleterious influences which have heretofore been thrown around the courts. I think it does.

Such a state of things has heretofore existed, as the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] pointed out; and as many men, undoubtedly, believe with him, is it not the duty of this body to remove as far as possible our judicial functionaries for all future time to come, from the influences of those prejudices? I think it is; and the people have said so, for they have adopted the amendment to the constitution which prevents judges from being candidates for office. Then how are we to protect those tribunals against political prejudices? So long as you have an independent court, will not the circuit judge be a candidate for the office of a Supreme Court judge? He will. The question cannot be answered in the negative. The circuit judges will be, and every man knows it. Would we not have men treading closely on the heels of your circuit judges, promising to secure for them, at the end of their term, a seat on the supreme bench? And on the other hand, would we not find men striving to weaken the strength of your most conspicuous circuit judges—telling the people that their decisions are not what they should be, and would not stand the test of judicial scrutiny? Why should we subject the judicial system of the State to such objections as this, after the people have warned us against them?

There is another thing which I desire to press upon the attention of the Convention; and that is this: the necessity of having your Circuit Court—which is of more importance to the people than all other courts—the necessity, I say, of having it a court of a higher character than any other, so far as you can practically make it so; and that cannot be accomplished in any other way than by having gentlemen upon your circuit bench who would finally decide questions of law in the Supreme Court. I wish the committee to understand me as being in favor of the circuit system. I offer this amendment for the reason already given. The election of the circuit judges is not mentioned in that amendment, but it is provided in the article now under consideration; therefore, it was not necessary to mention it here.

The question on the adoption of the amendment [Mr. BRITAIN'S] was put and lost.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the substitute [Mr. McCLELLAN'S] in the following manner: to strike out the word "separate" wherever it occurs; also to strike out all after the word "decision," in the fifth line, to and including the word "State," in the 11th line, and insert, "The Legislature may provide by law for the organization of a Supreme Court, with the jurisdiction and powers prescribed in this constitution, to consist of four judges, two of whom shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State, and two of whom shall be circuit judges, and taken from the respective judicial circuits for the time being, in such manner as they may deem expedient."

Gentlemen will perceive (said Mr. B.) that there is the same reason for this amendment that there was for the other; the only difference is that two will be elected, and two taken from the circuit bench. I will only express my surprise that the former amendment, which sought to protect the friends of the circuit system, should not have received their support. The committee is simply in this position: they oppose the independent system, yet are going to put into this constitution a principle which may raise up this entire system, if the Legislature so determine. According to the substitute, the Legislature would have no option, if a change in the judicial system were demanded, but to go into the independent plan. They would give up the entire circuit system. I did suppose that we would provide that whatever modification might be hereafter made, as much of the circuit system as practicable would be retained. The friends of the circuit system should examine this matter closely.

Mr. N. PIERCE—The gentleman is surprised that I did not vote for his amendment. I am not willing that the system we establish shall be changed. If the majority of the committee choose to establish the independent system, I will go with them. I am in favor of the circuit system, however. I did not wish to vote for the gentleman's amendment, because it would defeat the circuit plan.

Mr. BRITAIN—I thought so; the gentleman did not understand me. In explanation, I will inform the gentleman that I did not propose to change the system that the committee is adopting—not at all. I go for it. But I wish to put something in the constitution that will preserve a part of the circuit system, no matter what change the Legislature might hereafter make.

The question upon adopting Mr. BRITAIN's amendment was then put and lost.

Mr. MORRISON moved to strike out of the substitute, (Mr. McCLELLAND's,) the words "for the term of six years and thereafter."

In making that proposition, (said Mr. M.,) I do so in order that it may be left to the Legislature to act as they may see fit in regard to the establishment of the independent court, or the continuing of the circuit system. I do not think there has been a strong manifestation of sentiment against the establishment of an independent system, by any means. The vote this morning was very close. It must make it very evident that the people have thought of the matter, and that the old system of the circuit judges doing the Supreme Court business, does not meet with the universal approbation of the people of this State. If it be, may we not anticipate that the people will be desirous of a change—

if they be, as they certainly will, why not leave it in their power to perfect that change? By providing that the circuit judges shall be the Supreme Court judges for six years, we prevent them from acting differently—that is, adopting the other system—unless they had an alteration in the constitution, which is not likely to take place in that period. It is, in fact, forcing a thing upon the people, which we say they shall have whether they want it or not.

Gentlemen said they did not wish to leave this open to the Legislature. Why not? I believe any future Legislature we may have will be as competent, and as willing to carry out the wishes of the people as this Convention. No one, I presume, will attempt to say that the Legislature would not act in conformity with the opinions of their constituents. For my part I cannot by any possibility see why we should not leave the people to say what sort of a court they want. These are the reasons why I offer this amendment.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The question then recurring upon Mr. HANSCOM's substitute, the same was put and lost.

The question then turned upon the substitute presented by the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND.]

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend the substitute by striking out the words "for the term of six years, and thereafter until the Legislature shall otherwise provide."

It is claimed here (said Mr. R.) that the Convention has decided in favor of the Circuit Courts; and it has been claimed also that the reasons which have been adduced in favor of that system, are unanswerable. I shall not trouble the committee on this subject, at all. I do not desire to give any particular reasons why we should have an independent court; there have been plenty given here. I believe a majority of the people are in favor of it; but the committee has expressed an opinion contrary to what I supposed it would be. But I do say now, that there may not be any further delay about this matter, let them substitute the old system, which the people have condemned in all its naked deformities. Let them say we shall have the old Circuit Court system, and not betray the people with a kiss. Let gentlemen come out boldly for the system which has been repudiated by the people, so that the people may know what they are voting for.

The proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] was that for six years you shall endure all the evils of this system; and then the Legislature shall go to work and give you a Supreme Court. That proposition has had its effect; it has brought over to his side some men who were opposed to the old circuit system. I propose to go further, and give the gentleman what he wants, if the reasons in favor of the Circuit Court system are unanswerable, and entirely conclusive. I propose then that the people shall pass upon that simple proposition, not mixed up with any other whatever. I need not give any reasons to show that the plan is preferable to the plan adopted by the committee; but I will say this, that the County Courts were established because of the crying evils growing out of the system which you now propose to erect. I hope then that the amendment will be adopted. I think the people would be better satisfied with what I propose.

The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. BAGG moved to insert after "decision," the words "and they shall cast lots as to whom shall set in banc in the Supreme Court for each and every year."

The committee refused to so amend.

The question being upon the adoption of Mr. McCLELLAND's substitute,

Mr. BRITAIN called for a division of the question; and the first part of the substitute was adopted.

Mr. KINGSLEY observed that the first part of the substitute said "for six years," and the last part, "whenever the Legislature shall deem it expedient." He wanted to know the meaning of this.

Mr. CHURCH remarked that he had his idea about it, and he supposed the gentleman had his too.

Mr. KINGSLEY then moved to amend the second branch of the substitute, by inserting after the word "expedient," the words "for the term of six years."

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the second branch of the substitute. The same was put, after some slight discussion, and adopted.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the committee rose, reported the article with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Convention was asked.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND the article with the amendment was referred to the committee on the judicial department.

The article entitled "Elections," coming up on its passage,

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the same was laid upon the table.

The article entitled "Corporations" was read a third time; when

Mr. McLEOD moved to recommit it to the committee on banking and other corporations except municipal, with instructions to strike therefrom the first clause of section 11, as follows: "From and after the year 1880, the Legislature shall have the power to alter or repeal the charters of all corporations whose charters shall not have expired previous to that time."

Mr. WHITE moved to strike out the entire article, and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"Sec. 1. Corporations may be formed under general laws; but shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes. All general laws, and special acts passed pursuant to this section, may be altered from time to time, or repealed.

"Sec. 2. The term 'corporations,' as used in this article, shall be construed to include all associations and joint stock companies having any of the powers or privileges of corporations, not possessed by individuals or partnerships. And all corporations shall have the right to sue, and shall be subject to be sued in all courts, in like cases as natural persons.

"Sec. 3. The Legislature shall have no power to pass any act granting any special charter for banking purposes; but corporations or associations may be formed for such purposes, under general laws, by a vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to both branches thereof.

"Sec. 4. The Legislature shall not pass any law sanctioning in any manner, directly or indirectly, the suspension of specie payments by any person, association or corporation issuing bank notes of any description.

"Sec. 5. The Legislature shall provide by law for the registry of all bills or notes issued or put in circulation as money, and shall require ample security for the redemption of the same in specie; such security to be in stocks, (bonds or evidence of debt issued by the United States or of individual States, or both,) which shall be deposited with the State Treasurer, and be at least, when offered, equal in value to the amount of bills or notes registered and issued for circulation.

"Sec. 6. The stockholders in every corporation and joint stock association for banking purposes, issuing bank notes or any kind of paper credits to circulate as money, shall be individually responsible to the amount of their respective share or shares of stock in any such corporation or association, for all its issues, debts and liabilities.

"Sec. 7. All corporations and joint stock associations created by the legislature, under and by virtue of this article, shall pay to the State Treasurer for the use of the State, at least one per centum per annum on the capital stock paid in, as a tax; and no other tax shall be assessed or collected against them.

"Sec. 8. In case of the insolvency of any bank or banking association, the bill-holders thereof shall be entitled to preference in payment, over all other creditors of said bank or association."

But the motion to so amend was lost as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burns, Carr, Chandler, Comstock, Daniels, Fralick, Gale, Green, Harvey, Lovell, White, Williams—12.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Bush, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Dimond, Eastman, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Warden, Webster, President—45.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend by adding further instructions, as follows: And to amend section three by striking out in lines 2 and 3, the words "all its debts," and insert "said bank notes or paper credits so circulated as money;" and to strike out in line 4, the words "for one year thereafter."

Mr. C. said: My object is to have this section so amended that the officers and stockholders of every corporation or association for banking purposes, issuing bank notes or paper credits that circulate as money, shall be individually liable for these notes so circulated, and not individually liable for every kind of indebtedness that may possibly arise against that institution in favor of depositors or other persons who may deal confidentially with the corporation.

I think that the people who are obliged to take the paper credits of the institutions in the course of their every day dealings, and unacquainted as they are with the stockholders and officers of the bank, ought to be protected first. I am willing to extend the individual responsibility to that extent. But, if a person go to the establishment and make an arrangement with them, let him take the consequences of such an arrangement made by him with them voluntarily. The section as it stands would have the effect, I think, though it is no great object to me, of driving small capitalists out of the business. The last requisition of the section, that is, "for one year thereafter," is entirely unjust. I hope what I have suggested will be added to the instructions.

Mr. COOK—I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The intention of the committee was, that banks should be placed upon the same footing as private individuals, so far as regards their liability. They could see no reason why associated companies should be exempted from the same rule which applies to private persons. The gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] says this indebtedness is voluntary. Why, sir, indebtedness with individuals is voluntary, and all our business intercourse is voluntary, and not compulsory. We then apply this rule of individual liability to individuals and to partnerships. If I associate in business with that gentleman, I am liable for his acts—he is my agent. So it should be with banks. If persons associate together for banking purposes, and appoint an agent to do their business, why should they not be liable for the acts of that agent? If I go to a banking institution and buy a draft on the city of New York, and pay them a premium for it, why should not the stockholders of that institution be liable for the payment of that draft? It seems to me they should;

and if there should be any exemption from the rule, it ought to be in favor of individuals, and not the bankers. And why, sir? By reason of the privileges which the people give them for banking purposes. Has any individual the right to double his capital, and then loan it at seven per cent? No; but the banks have. Banks have the privilege of loaning their capital to the amount of fifteen per cent. Have individuals that right? We know they have not. Then why except banks from the liability of individuals? Is it that they have the right to make more on their capital than any one else.

The gentleman has alluded to depositors; he would have the bankers exempted of all liability to that class. I entirely differ with the gentleman. They put their money into the bank, which has the use of it, and pays them no interest. The debt so contracted is one of honor—one among business men the most sacred that can be created; yet the gentleman proposes to exempt the stockholders of the institution from any liability to the depositors. It seems to me to be entirely wrong. I would hold them responsible, just the same as I would any other individuals. I can see no reason why they should be exempted from that responsibility.

As regards the last amendment, I think it is of some importance; for it is well known with what facility—if you only make them liable for the time they are stockholders—they could dispose of their stock. If you strike out the proviso, "for one year thereafter," stockholders can dispose of their stock, and of course avoid all responsibility. It is well known to every gentleman, and to the people of this State, how easy it is for parties to get a bank and take the insides out of it, and then let it fall. That has been the experience of the people of Wisconsin in banking institutions? When stockholders find it no longer for their interest to keep a bank in existence, or rather when they find that they can make more by taking the money and putting it in circulation, giving their own notes on the bank, and taking from that bank all of its capital, that should be convertible for the redemption of its bills, they do take it all out, and the first we hear is, that the bank has failed. The creditors look into the vaults for the available property of the bank, but it is all gone. Yet the gentleman [Mr. CHURCH] proposes that there shall be no liability except for the bill holder, who is provided for by the stock. The liability part of this article would amount to very little, or nothing, if the amendment prevails.

Mr. CHURCH—I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. COMSTOCK moved to amend the proposition offered by the gentleman from Mackinac, [Mr. McLEON,] by instructing the committee to report the following as an additional section:

"The term 'corporations,' as used in this article, shall be construed to include all associations and joint stock companies having any of the powers or privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships. And all corporations shall have the right to sue, and shall be subject to be sued, in all courts, in like cases as natural persons."

Mr. J. BARTOW—Does the gentleman mean to include municipal corporations?

Mr. COMSTOCK—This amendment is taken from the New York constitution. It merely defines the signification of the term "corporation," as applied to banking and such like institutions.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WHITE moved further to amend by instructing the committee to add the following as an additional section:

"All the officers and stockholders of every corporation or association for banking purposes, issuing bank notes or bills, or any kind of paper credits, to circulate as money, shall at all times be jointly and severally liable for all the debts and liabilities for such corporation or association."

Mr. HANSOOM proposed to add to the amendment last offered, the words "and for six years thereafter."

Mr. W. accepted the proposition.

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend by instructing the committee to report the following in lieu of section two of the article: "Corporations for banking purposes, shall be formed, extended or renewed by special laws, but no such act of incorporation, extension or renewal, shall take effect until the same shall have been submitted to the people at the next general election, (for representatives,) succeeding the passage of the same, and approved by a majority of all the votes cast at such election for or against such law. There shall not be more than one act of incorporation, extension or renewal of any association with banking powers passed during any one session of the legislature;" and said: Mr. President: as I was absent when this article was under consideration in the committee of the whole, and also during its consideration in Convention, until it was ordered to a third reading, I am not aware what arguments were presented in favor of the provisions of the first and second sections, nor against them, if any; nor am I aware of the feeling of the Convention in regard to those provisions.

The first section of the article provides that the legislature shall pass no act of incorporation, only by general laws, (except for municipal purposes;) and the second section, as it now stands in the article, specifies the manner in which laws may be passed, by which corporations with banking powers may be formed. It is evident that the provisions of those two sections require that such corporations shall be formed only by general laws; consequently, if we are to have any banks in future, those banks will have to be formed under the provisions of a general banking law.

I would ask if gentlemen of this Convention believe that the interest of the State requires at this time the enactment of such a law? Whatever may be the opinion of others, my opinion is, that it does not; but, on the contrary, it is my opinion, that a general banking law (immaterial how well it may be guarded) would be detrimental to the interests of the State, both financially and morally. Michigan has had one general banking law, and what was the result of its operations? It is unnecessary for me to state in detail that result, for every member of this Convention is familiar with it; but suffice to say that bankruptcy and ruin, almost universally throughout the State, followed in its train. And are we again to pass through the scenes of 1837 and 1838? Are we to have a bank at every village throughout the State, for the purpose of manufacturing and putting in circulation paper, as money, as fast as they please?

It may be said that it will be in the power of the people to reject the law. That is true, and that I consider as their only safeguard. But, sir, I fear that they will not do so, for by the provisions of this article of the constitution, they will have but one alternative, and that is to say that they will have no more banks at all, or to take the whole dose; and after the dose is once taken, they will be under the necessity of quietly submitting to the consequences.

There will be men enough of influence in every village, whose interest it is, or who may fancy that it will be for their interest, to have the law ratified by the people; and that influence will be exerted. The plea will be urged that we must have more banks; that the business of the country demands it; that the law and the constitution guards the bill-holders against loss, and that State stocks are to be pledged for the redemption of their bills; and every other argument, however fallacious, will be used to accomplish its sanction.

As to stock securities, I do not wish to be understood that I am opposed to that provision, for I consider that it will enable the bill-holder to realize a part at least of the amount which he might otherwise lose in case the bank should fail; but I will say that under a general law, it will be impossible to guard the people entirely against loss by such securities.

Other States have adopted similar provisions, and in the State of New York several banks have failed that were formed under the provisions of their general banking law, requiring security for the redemption of their bills; and, as I am informed, in every instance the people have sustained a loss. It may be contended that, as a general rule, the system in the State of New York has operated to the satisfaction of the people; this, perhaps, is so, but it is folly for us to compare Michigan with New York. A system that would aid the latter, financially, might ruin the other. New York contains a population seven times as numerous as Michigan, and has the largest commercial city on the continent; being the medium through which is transacted almost the entire commercial and mercantile business of the North-western States. I say, therefore, that we can not with propriety take the State of New York as an example; for, considering the great disparity between the two, the exceptions to the general rule there, it may be feared, and I believe, will prove to be the general result in this State.

Some three years since, the Legislature of the State of Ohio passed a general banking law, in consequence of which, a bank was started in almost every village in the State. I would ask if the people of Ohio are satisfied with the result? It is evident, sir, that they are not. By examining the proceedings of the Convention for the revision of the constitution of that State, you will find that the committee on corporations, feeling that the people demanded at their hands something which would in future be a safeguard against such institutions, have reported an article on that subject, which I will in part read:

"The General Assembly shall not have power to create any bank or banking institution whatever: or authorize the making, emission, or putting in circulation any bill of credit, ticket, certificate, promissory note, or other paper medium, intended to circulate as money, for currency.

"The General Assembly shall prohibit by law any person or personal association, company or corporation, now in existence, from exercising the privilege of banking, or creating, emitting, or putting in circulation any bank notes or any paper of any description whatever, to circulate as money or currency."

Such, sir, (said Mr. M.,) has been the result of the general banking law of Ohio, with a population several times as large as Michigan, and a State requiring greater financial facilities in proportion to its population.

The amendment which I have proposed provides that but one bank shall be incorporated during any one session of the Legislature; and that before such act of incorporation shall take effect, it shall be submitted to the people of the State for their approval. By adopting a provision of this nature, the people will have the full control of every such corporation, as far as regards their creation; and when the public interest requires additional banking facilities, such act of incorporation would be approved by them; and when the public interest did not require any more institutions of that nature, they would certainly reject the law, or at least would be more likely to do so, than they would with the alternative required in the article as it now stands.

What would you think of a physician, who being called upon by an individual for medicine to relieve him from some disease which affected him, and the physician, after having the subject under due consideration, should calculate that the individual would probably be troubled about so often through life with the same complaint, and within thirty years would require in all a given quantity of medicine; and after ascertaining that quantity, as nearly as he could guess at it, should say to the individual that he had come to the conclusion that he must take all the medicine he might possibly require for the next thirty years, at one dose, and deal it out to him accordingly, peremptorily requiring the patient to take the whole or none? I think, sir, that you would say that he was a physician who ought never to have more than one patient. And, sir, this is the manner in which this article as it now stands proposes that the people of the State of Michigan are to be financially doctored. They took one such dose, secured by real estate, in 1837; but vomited it up as soon as possible. And now, sir, we are about to propose to them another dose, with the alternative that they must take the whole dose or none, congratulating ourselves with the idea that if they take it, the fault is theirs and not ours. I must say, Mr. President, that I am opposed to any such principle; and that in case the article is not changed in this respect, I shall feel bound to vote against it on its passage.

I am informed that the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] designs to offer an amendment, by which the Legislature is to be prohibited from passing any act of incorporation for banking purposes; and in case the amendment proposed by myself, or something similar, is not adopted, I shall be happy to record my vote in favor of the proposition, which I understand the gentleman from Oakland proposes to offer.

Mr. BAGG—I will support the amendment; but not for the reasons given by the gentleman. I view the matter in an entirely different light. He assumes that the body politic, or the financial world is sick, and he wants to cure it with an antidote.

Mr. MORRISON (in his seat.)—I did not assume that ground.

Mr. BAGG—In my opinion the financial world is well. I look upon all banks as nothing more or less than a "Pandora's box," to make the people sick. I say give us but one "Pandora's box" at a time, so that we may be able to battle with and overcome the disease arising from it. Let them be, as the Poet says, "like Angel's visits, few and far between;" (laughter;) or I might say like Indians. I would not dignify them with the name of "Angel's visits." I will therefore vote for the proposition, but for an entirely different consideration.

The question was then taken upon adopting the amendment presented by Mr. MORRISON, and was not sustained.

Mr. MOORE moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the article was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, the article reported by the committee on the punishment of crimes was made the special order of the day for to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the President.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the article entitled "Corporations" was taken from the table.

Mr. MASON moved a call of the Convention; and the same being ordered, after calling the roll, the absentees appearing, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The question was announced as being on recommitting the article with instructions.

Mr. McCLELLAND said—There is an amendment to the last clause of the 11th section, which I would suggest to the gentleman who is chairman of the committee to whom the instructions are to be given. This last clause, I understand, would prohibit the construction of rail roads in the State; for, if we are to grant a charter to a rail road which will not run longer than thirty years, it will be very difficult to get the stock taken up. I would suggest to gentlemen who have any thing of the kind in contemplation, to amend this article so as to extend the term of charters for rail roads. The people in my section of the State are not much interested in this matter. I move, therefore, to add to the instruction, after the word "created," the words "except for the construction of rail roads."

Mr. HANSCOM—You can move to amend the original section.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Then I ask the unanimous consent of the Convention to so amend.

Mr. CROUSE—Will the gentleman add the words "canals and plank roads?"

Mr. McCLELLAND—I have no objection to include canals, but I do not think that any more are going to be made. As to the plank roads, the gentleman will see at once that it is unnecessary to particularize them here. A plank road will last, say ten years; so that the provision allows them to construct anew their road twice after its first completion.

The section (11th) was then amended as proposed, by general consent.

Mr. HANSCOM here observed that the words "rail roads" were left out for the very purpose of bringing such companies within the scope of the article.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE said: I assume the position that the happiness of the people, the greatest good of the whole, is the supreme law. Whatever legislative enactment contravenes this paramount law, the people in the exercise of their original inherent sovereignty may and ought to annul. When a charter becomes detrimental to the public interest, it ceases to answer the professed end of its creation, and may and ought to be repealed. Those advocating this doctrine have been sneered at, and an attempt been made to laugh them down; but, I tell you gentlemen, that the thing is not so easily done. This great principle is yet to be vindicated, is yet to triumph over all the powers marshalled by wealth, and will be sustained. Those vested rights, created by charters, must yield, when they come in conflict with the supreme law—the public good. The people in their sovereignty owe it to themselves—they are bound, by every consideration of justice and of right, to remove out of the way every institution that shall be found in its operations and results inconsistent with the great end of their being—the highest good of the whole, individually and collectively.

I defy any man successfully to controvert this position. Gentlemen may cite as many judicial decisions as they please; the position remains untouched, unharmed and as immovable as the eternal hills. I too might cite the authority, opinions, reasonings and arguments of some of the noblest minds and loftiest intellects that ever lived, to sustain my position. But, while I yield to reason and argument, I regard not the opinions of men, or the authority of names, as binding against right.

When Fox and Burke wielded the destinies of the British Empire, they introduced into Parliament a bill to repeal the charter of the East India Company. The measure was sustained by speeches unequalled in eloquence, and by arguments and reasons never yet answered. The bill was defended by six distinguished men, who subsequently became chief justices, and by Mansfield, a name not unknown to fame. They based the right of repeal upon the ground that the further existence of the charter was inconsistent with the public good. True, they were defeated. The money power triumphed. The company then wielded a revenue equal to that of the United States at the present time. But the eloquence, reasoning and arguments of those giants in intellect remain and ever will remain a proud monument to truth and right.

I know it is claimed that Parliament is omnipotent. But omnipotent though it be, it is confessedly, in theory at least, bounded by the principles of justice. But Parliament has no power which is not original and inherent in the people of these States. Whenever a charter becomes, from any reason whatever, repugnant to the public good, the eternal principles of right demand its repeal; and the people in their sovereign capacity fail of their duty if they do not do it. But I have a better and nobler example. The fathers of Republicanism in this country asserted the right to repeal a charter, whenever the public good required it. And they exercised the right; they did the thing. They repealed a perpetual charter, despite the cry of vested rights. The case to which I refer is this: In 1782 an act was passed creating the Bank of North America. In 1785, so deeply injurious to the public interest was the bank regarded by the people of the State, that the charter was repealed. In the course of the debate, Mr Finley remarked: "The right of the Legislature is so clearly confessed by gentlemen of legal knowledge, it is so essential to the safety of government, that it would be an insult to the good sense of the house to say anything more about it." Sir, this thing was done when such a man as one Benjamin Franklin was Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

I know perfectly well what will be said in this Convention. An attempt will be made to break the force of the example and argument by referring us to the constitution of the United States, subsequently adopted, and that much perverted clause in it will be quoted: "No State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts," just as though a law granting privileges to a company was a contract, in the sense of the constitution. I apprehend that the States, when they adopted the constitution, never dreamed that they were signing away one of the essential elements of their sovereignty.

For more than twenty years after the adoption of the constitution, no interpretation of this clause was given, which involved the rights of the States. In 1810, in a case where the State of Georgia had granted lands to individuals, and had revoked the grant, the Supreme Court applied the prohibition. They construed the grant of land to be a contract, and the revoking the grant impairing the obligation. And in 1819 the court determined that a royal charter for a college was a contract in the sense of the constitution; and hence, the State of N. H. could not legislate in regard to it, without impairing its obligation. These decisions have produced a vast amount of mischief and litigation. Many attempts have been made to bring other laws within the indictment, but with little or no success. The court cannot have failed to discover the fearful results to which they led, and those decisions will be abandoned. And I have been credibly informed that of late the judges have taken care to make it known that none of their determinations have intimated that a State statute, which divests a vested right, is repugnant to the constitution of the United States. There cannot be less than eight thousand corporations within the several States. If their charters are to be regarded as contracts, then they are absolutely beyond the reach of State legislation. A fearful consideration, truly! The circulating medium, the business, the capital and welfare of the country mostly in the hands of these corporations, and the States in their sovereign capacity no authority over them! It cannot be. They never intended to surrender the power of control. To take it from them by a mere legal fiction, through the interpretation of a doubtful passage, is, to say the least, a usurpation not to be borne. If the federal courts may thus bind the States, they are but mere slaves; the essential attributes of sovereignty are gone.

But I have not yet done. In 1836, George M. Dallas wrote as follows: "A convention is the prescribed machinery of peaceful revolution. It is the civilized substitute for intestine war; the American mode of carrying out the will of the majority; the inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform or abolish their government in such manner as they shall think proper. When ours shall assemble, it will possess * * * every attribute of absolute sovereignty, except such as may have been yielded and embodied in the Constitution of the United States. What may it not do? It may re-organize our entire system of social existence, proscribing and terminating what is deemed injurious and establishing what is preferred. * * * The only effective limits to its authority are the broad and unchangeable rules of justice and of truth."

This gentleman, after the promulgation of these sentiments, the people of this country delighted to honor, and they elevated him to the highest station in their gift, but one—they made him Vice President of these United States.

There is but one other mode of removing unbearable evils, and that is the European. Take away the peaceful mode above described, and the people have no remedy, no alternative, but the application of physical force—insurrection, with all the incidents of barricades, storming of cities, carnage, rapine and murder, the confused noise of the warrior, and garments rolled in blood.

I cannot but respond a cordial amen to the wish of the gentleman from Hillsdale, that the time may come when we shall have republican courts—courts that will decide according to the right and reason of things.

In case of investments, provision should be made to secure the owners their rights of property. But rights of property and chartered rights are very different things. No one wishes to despoil them of their property, nor does the provision imply any such thing. I am opposed to striking out. The provision is an assertion of the right of the State; a principle which cannot be successfully denied.

A division of the question being had, the same turned upon recommitting, and was taken by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Arzeno, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Cornell, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Green, Hart, Harvey, Kingsley, Lovell, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Newberry, Orr, Prevost, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Webster, White, Whipple, Williams, Woodman, President—42.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Andeson, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Conner, Cook, Crouse, Dimond, Eaton, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Mowry, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Soule, Town, Warden—23.

So the question was sustained.

The question then recurred upon instructing the committee.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend the same by further instructing the committee to amend section 3 by striking out in the second and third lines, the words "all its debts," and inserting in lieu thereof, "said bank notes and paper credits so circulated as money." Also, to strike out in last line of the same section, the words "and for one year thereafter."

Mr. CORNELL inquired the object of the gentleman in making this proposition.

Mr. CHURCH—The object was stated at the time I proposed these instructions, which I afterwards withdrew. The object is briefly this: to hold the stockholders and officers of any banking institution liable for the notes or any other form of paper credits sent into circulation as money, by them, and which the community have to take as money. But I would exclude depositors; because the transactions between a depositor and a bank are voluntary on his side; he has opportunities to look into the responsibility and solvency of the stockholders, and all business between him and them results from his own proper motion. Nor do I think that the widow or orphan who held stock, should be held liable for the debts of the institution, except for the paper money which it had set afloat in circulation.

Mr. BAGG—I should like to know what amount of bank stock widows and orphans hold. (Laughter.)

Mr. CHURCH—I cannot give the gentleman any information on the subject, more than that I know there is a good deal of stock held by the heirs of deceased persons.

Mr. CORNELL—I would be glad to know what great opportunity depositors have of ascertaining the responsibility of stockholders, more than those who take their notes in the course of trade.

Mr. CHURCH—There is a manifest difference, as any one can see. The man who makes a deposit in the bank knows better whether his money is secure or not, than the man who takes a dollar in change in the street, or in the ordinary course of business. We cannot well get along without this paper money—it is almost absolutely necessary; but the parties circulating it, that is, who issued it, I do believe should be held responsible for its redemption. I think this extreme accountability and strictness will operate so as to prevent the investment of capital in those institutions, without securing an equivalent.

Mr. CORNELL agreed with the gentleman in reference to protecting the bill holders. But was it not wrong that the poor depositors who left their money in the hands of the bankers, who made use of it without paying for it, should not be protected also?

Mr. MORRISON—Section five provides that the bill holder, or any person holding anything in the way of a note, or bill of credit, has the preference over all other debtors. I do not look at it in the same light as the gentleman, [Mr. CHURCH.] He seems to intimate that it is a matter of necessity that a man should take back bills that are in circulation. He is under no obligation so to do unless he be disposed. He stands in the same light as the person who is making a deposit. No man is bound to deposit money in a bank. The bill holder is provided for in the other clause, for the State stocks are pledged for the redemption of the bills he holds. But the depositor would be unprotected in any particular; therefore, I am decidedly opposed to striking out, as proposed.

Mr. COOK—I should like to have a division of the question. It is at too late a day for any man to get up and propose to relieve banking institutions of their responsibility. We have provided that the bill holder shall be secured by stock. Under ordinary circumstances that will pay him very well. Now this proposition is to make the bank liable only to the bill holder, who is already provided for. I do not think this question needs any argument. Is it not, however, rather late in the day for any man to make a proposition of this kind? It was especially not to be expected from a gentleman belonging to the same party that I do.

Mr. CHURCH—I think it is rather early in the afternoon for the gentleman to rise and state that any such proposition has been made. If he take and read the words of the amendment proposed to be made, he will see that it is intended to hold these institutions responsible for the paper which they circulate as money. Yet, this gentleman, with his remarkably clear perception, rises in his seat and states that he is surprised a member should be found to rise at this late day, and propose to release a banking institution from all responsibility. I have heard of those who never could tell a hawk from a hand-saw. I had supposed it was a mere poetical license; and in truth I never thought it would find its realization on this floor.

Mr. BRITAIN—This is a question which has previously occupied much attention. I may be permitted perhaps to say a few words upon it. I know it has been said that banks, as well as individuals, should be held responsible for their liabilities. Now, sir, I think the amendment sent to the Chair by the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] exhibits at least a discriminating mind. Whether it be adopted or not, it exhibits a discrimination which is not usually seen in the minds of men who merely glance superficially at a subject. What is our duty as public men in this matter? If you wish to veto banks in every possible shape, and prevent their creation in any form whatever, do so. If you expect to have them at all, then have the soundest you can get. Is not that our duty? Then if you have them at all, how can you secure the soundest? That is the question. What is the condition of the thing? Do you want banks, the stock of which is held by persons having no property of their own, and whose personal responsibility, if the bank break, will be of no service to the parties who hold their bills? That is the plain question. I know perfectly well the difficult ground upon which I stand. I know the feeling that is growing up in this House relative to the position which I have taken, and the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH.] But there is such a thing as a line of duty.

Who do you want to have for stockholders in the banks? Do you want men of straw to stand between the capitalist and the bill holder? That question I put to the gentleman from Hillsdale, [Mr. COOK.] Do you want men of capital, who are willing to let you have their capital to bank upon? If you want the latter, how can you induce them, they living in foreign States, to entrust their millions to agents in this State, who will have it in their power to make them liable to such amounts as would entirely rob them of their living? Yet I am willing that gentlemen should take notes and publish them. I know what I am about on this question. Do you think you can find a man in any foreign State, worth his half-million, perfectly independent, willing to send his $300,000 here to a Michigan agent to bank upon, with the possibility of not only squandering the $300,000, but of robbing him of his remaining $200,000, on which he expected to live? The capitalist will say: "I am willing to send $300,000; that leaves me $200,000 to live upon." That leaves him sufficient to live upon for the remainder of his life, if he should happen to lose the former amount. In that way you can get capital to bank on. But when you say that the man who sends here his capital to bank on, shall be liable for every debt that those agents create, he will not send his capital here at all. Now, if you can procure capitalists to subscribe for your stock, it is good for something; but if you cannot, of what good is it; for if you can get but bankrupts only to take your stock, of what use is their individual liability afterwards?

Sir, this is no new question to me; I have examined it before now in its length and breadth. I know the value of it to the bill holder—it is not worth a pinch of snuff. Think you that a bank will break and permit a man of capital to be mulcted by the bill holders? No sir. If a capitalist has taken stock in the bank, which he will be careful not to do, but if he has, it will be very soon transferred to some man of straw, who is worth nothing. I beg to call attention to a bank now in existence in this State—I mean the Michigan Insurance Company. But in all I have said, I do not desire to be considered an advocate of banks. How long did that bank do business on a small capital on this individual liability principle? Why was not its capital paid up; because the stockholders were not able to do it? By no means, sir; but because they were unwilling to trust any agent with the legitimate banking business which would make them liable for all they were worth, and thereby perhaps reduce them and their families to beggary. I am willing to go for any security under heaven, I care not what it may be, when you convince me that it will accomplish the object we have in view, and will not flatter the eye of the people while it flatters their hearts. I object to this demagoguism which calls out to the people and boasts that it is a guard, and when it comes into their hand proves to be no guard at all.

Mr. HANSCOM—This matter seems to be involved in a sort of Gordian knot on both sides. It appears to be supposed that banking is a kind of infamous robbery on the people, in any form; so to relieve gentlemen on both sides from all further difficulty, I offer this substitute for section 2:

"No banking law or law for banking purposes, nor any act creating, renewing or continuing any association or corporation for banking purposes, shall ever be enacted by the legislature."

I also propose the following as a substitute for the third section:

"No law now in force in this State, creating or authorizing any bank or banking institution, or incorporating any company or association for banking purposes in this State, shall extend to or have any force or effect after the first day of January, 1853; and no such institution, now existing in this State, shall issue any note or bill to be circulated as money after the first day of January, 1851."

The PRESIDENT—This amendment is not in order now; it will be when the pending amendment shall have been disposed of.

The question upon the adoption of the amendment (instructions) presented by the gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] was then put and lost.

Mr. HANSCOM then moved to amend by substituting for sections 2 and 3 what he had previously read.

A division of the question being called for, the same turned on the first branch of the amendment, viz: to strike out section 2 and substitute as above; and the yeas and nays being ordered thereon, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Britain, Asahel Brown, Carr, Church, Dimond, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Morrison, N. Pierce, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Town, Warden, Webster, White, Williams, Woodman—27.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Ammon Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Eastman, Fralick, Gibson, Green, Harvey, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, Prevost, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, Whipple, President—39.

So the first portion of the amendment was disagreed to.

The remainder of the proposition was also rejected by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Bagg, Beardsley, Britain, Asahel Brown, Burns, Carr, Church, Cook, Daniels, Dimond, Eaton, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Town, Webster, White, Williams, Woodman—27.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Green, Harvey, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, Warden, Whipple, President—41.

Upon Mr. McLEOD's proposition as amended, a division of the question was had, and the instructions in regard to section 11 were agreed to by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Alvord, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Cornell, Daniels, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Green, Harvey, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, Prevost, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, White, Whipple, Williams, Woodman, President—42.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Conner, Cook, Crouse, Dimond, Eaton, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Morrison, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Soule, Town, Warden, Webster—27.

The question then turned upon adopting the second branch of the proposition, instructing the committee to report an additional section, which was put and carried.

So the article was recommitted to the committee in which it originated, with instructions.

Mr. COOK, from the committee on banking and other corporations except municipal, to whom was referred the article entitled "Corporations," with certain instructions, reported the same back to the Convention amended agreeably thereto.

Mr. COOK moved the previous question on the article, and the same being sustained, the main question was ordered to be now put; and on the question, "Shall the article now pass?" the yeas and nays were ordered, and with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Chandler, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Daniels, Eastman, Gibson, Harvey, Kingsley, Lee, McClelland, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Town, Warden, Willard, Woodman, President—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Britain, Asahel Brown, Burns, Carr, Comstock, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Lovell, Mason, McLeod, Morrison, N. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, Robertson, Webster, White, Whipple, Williams—29.

So the article (corporations) was passed, and under the rule, referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the article "Exemptions and the rights of Married Women," was taken from the table, and the question being on the passage of the same,

Mr. AXFORD moved that the article be committed to the committee on Exemptions and the rights of Married Women, with instructions to amend as follows:

Strike out sections one and two, and substitute the following to stand as sections one and two of said article:

Substitute for section one: "Personal property to the amount of not less than two hundred and fifty dollars nor over five hundred dollars of every resident of this State shall be exempt from sale on execution or any other final process of any court of law or equity, except for the purchase money of the same; and at the first session of the legislature after the adoption of this constitution they shall provide and designate by law the kinds of property and the amount so to be exempted."

Substitute for section two: "A homestead of every family of this State, of forty acres and no more, not exceeding in value five hundred dollars, and which shall not be included in any city, village or recorded town plat, or in lieu thereof, any lot in any village, city or recorded town plat, not exceeding in value five hundred dollars, shall not be subject to any forced sale for any debt contracted after the adoption of this constitution, except for the purchase money of the same; nor shall the owner of such homestead, if a married man, alienate the same by any deed of conveyance without the consent of his wife, obtained in due form of law; but no such exemption shall be valid, except the owner or owners thereof shall have filed a description of the same in the office of the register of deeds in the county in which said real estate is situated."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE offered the following substitute for the instructions proposed by Mr. AXFORD:

Amend section 1, line 1, by inserting after "State" the words "to consist of such articles as shall be designated by law." Also, amend section 2, line 3, by inserting after the word "plat," as follows: "or such parts of lots as shall be equal thereto, not exceeding in value $1,500." Amend section 3 by striking out of line 3 the following: "for their benefit and support during minority."

Mr. AXFORD moved to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$500."

A division being had, the Convention refused to strike out.

The substitute was then agreed to by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Daniels, Eaton, Eastman, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lovell, Mason, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Warden, Webster, Whipple, Williams, Woodman, President—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Axford, Butterfield, Carr, Crouse, Fralick, Hanscom, Lee, Newberry, Robertson, Skinner—10.

Mr. MASON moved to amend the instructions by adding: amend section 1 by striking out "resident of," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "person in;" which did not prevail.

Mr. MOORE moved to amend the same by adding: amend section 5 by inserting after "devise," the words "otherwise than from her husband;" which was not agreed to.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to amend the instructions by adding: amend the 5th section by adding thereto, "and she may devise the same as if she were unmarried."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. BEARDSLEY's amendment was then agreed to by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield Church, Comstock, Crouse, Daniels, Eastman, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, N. Pierce, Prevost, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Warden, Webster, White, Whipple, Williams, Woodman—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Axford, Britain, Carr, Choate, Conner, Cook, Desnoyers, Fralick, Gibson, Hanscom, Lovell, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Robertson, President—16.

The proposition of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, as amended, was then agreed to, and the article recommitted with instructions.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE, from the committee on exemptions and the rights of married women, reported back the article bearing that title, amended agreeably to instructions.

The question being, "shall the article now pass?" the yeas and nays were had, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eastman, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lovell, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Robertson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Warden, Webster, White, Williams, Woodman—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Axford, Burns, Carr, Crouse, Fralick, Newberry, Orr, Rix Robinson, President—9.

So the article was passed, and under the rule referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, (47th day,) August 3.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. BUSH,

Resolved, That the committee on printing be requested to instruct the State printer not to strike off the copies of any form of the debates set up, until the reporter who has reported the same shall have had an opportunity of examining the proof sheet.

Mr. BRITAIN would move for a reconsideration, so that the gentleman from Ingham would explain his meaning. Was the object to cast a stigma upon the committee? Was the motive to allow the reporters to sit six weeks after the adjournment, to arrange their reports? If the gentleman persisted in his motion, he would add another, that the committee on printing be discharged.

The motion to reconsider was carried.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—There is a great deal of time taken up on trivial matters, which might well be dispensed with. They have the right to see the proof sheet.

Mr. BUSH—I do not see anything reprehensible in the resolution. I was not aware of the facts until this morning. I was told by a reporter this morning that he had been repeatedly for the proof of the matter that he had reported, and that he could get no satisfactory answer. If this statement is true, and I have no reason to doubt it, I see no impropriety in this Convention instructing the printer, through the committee, to afford the necessary facilities. I was not aware that there would be any feeling on the subject, as it was upon my part an act of courtesy.

On motion of Mr. ALVORD, the resolution was indefinitely postponed.

The Article reported by the committee on the punishment of crimes, coming up under the resolution of yesterday, and the question being upon ordering it to a third reading,

Mr. WOODMAN said—As a member of the committee that reported the article, I feel bound to say a few words in its defence. As to the phraseology of the report I shall say nothing. The principle is all that I shall endeavor to discuss; and I wish to say, in the commencement, that the committee considered this was all that came under their consideration after the gentleman from Wayne had refused to act as chairman. And, although we were thus deprived of our head—though the legal knowledge of the gentleman from Wayne was lost to us—though we lost the reflected splendor which the committee might have enjoyed, sustained by his helping hand, we yet endeavored to do the best we could. We instructed Mr. WARDEN to report. And after various delays it was presented. We can say if it is not as lengthy as some, yet it is a unanimous report, and we think that a careful consideration would establish this principle in the mind of every man.

Four years ago the State of Michigan abolished capital punishment, and our experience now will warrant us in asserting the principle in the constitution. I base this assertion upon the fact that crime has not increased since that time within the boundaries of this State. There are only four convicts within the State Prison for the crime of murder; and I learned from the Executive that only one knew that the death penalty had been abolished—showing conclusively that the principle may safely be here adopted.

We are the observed of all observers. We have tried it for four years, and the eyes of the people of the Union are upon us to see whether we will sustain the advance we have made, or fall back to the old system. Gentlemen must see that this view is correct. Although the State of Michigan has taken the lead in this measure, it has been agitated in other States; and I am credibly informed that in the State of New Hampshire the principle was lost only by a single vote. I apprehend few gentlemen will deny that the principle is right. Few measures, in my opinion, will find more favor with the people, and I believe that few measures are of more importance than this, whether we shall or shall not establish this principle.

As one who feels fully the importance of this principle, I hope that the question will be fairly taken upon its merits. The lives of our fellow beings depend upon our decision. I believe that the principle is thoroughly established; I believe that there are but few men who are not satisfied from experience that the penalty of death does not deter from crime. I shall sustain the principle. I hope that it will be inserted in the constitution.

Mr. BEARDSLEY—I cannot but express my disapprobation that this should be inserted in the constitution of the land. If I understand the bible, I believe death was the punishment for murder, fixed by the Almighty; and it is not necessary to have it abolished by the fundamental law. It is abolished by the statute, and it has not been sufficiently tried to ascertain whether it will be successful or not. The gentleman says that four convicts are in the State Prison for the crime of murder; that only one knew that the death penalty was abolished. This argument only proves that ignorance of the law prevails among the people. Crime might be ten times increased if it was fully understood by all. It appears to me that a principle of this kind is encouraging murder, if a man is only to suffer imprisonment for the crime of murder. The same of rape. Take a case: A man endeavors to rob my house; I discover him; it was not his intention to murder me; but he does so, because he destroys my evidence; while, if detected, his punishment is not greater, even if the crime of murder is added.

Mr. FRALICK moved an indefinite postponement.

Mr. WOODMAN—I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion. I hope the principle will be voted upon on its merits. I, for one, am anxious to record my vote in its favor, to be engrafted in the constitution; and if there is not another vote in this House, I will still cheerfully give mine in its favor. It is a principle that has grown with my growth and strengthened with my strength; and I ask this Convention that upon it I may record my vote.

Mr. CORNELL—We now have a law to that effect in the statute, and I see no necessity for placing it in the constitution. It is the right of society to preserve itself by punishing crime, by the best measures that will ensure its safety. If a man commits crime he should be punished. If a community cannot punish crime in a proper manner to preserve themselves without taking life, they have a right to take it; if they can punish crime properly by any other means, they have a right to do so.

There are a great many circumstances to be taken into consideration with regard to this question. I have heard it said that criminals would rather be executed at once than drag out a lingering life in the penitentiary; this argument, however, I consider to be fallacious; for the fear of death and the love of life are the most powerful motives in the human breast; all would rather exist. Experience, however, has shown that the punishment of death does not deter from crime. What was the law in England? A man might swindle thousands, might ruin hundreds, and yet escape; a boy who stole a gooseberry pie might be hung. I admit that it is not so now; but has it ever prevented or deterred from crime? Individuals have stolen from under the gallows; it has not even there deterred from crime. In order to deter, the punishment should be certain. Every gentleman knows the difficulty of obtaining a jury or a verdict against a criminal, when the law punishes with death. Punishment should be certain when the fact is proved.

I have no particular objection to this principle being here engrafted, but I do not see the necessity of it, for we have now the means within our reach; we have it on the statute; therefore, it is needless to place it in the constitution.

Mr. WOODMAN—It is not enjoined upon us by Scripture—it was part of the Jewish code used at that particular time; it might have been proper to have had greater severity of laws; reasons might have existed then which do not now.

Gentlemen say that we should not insert this in the constitution; that it is needless. We have put in the constitution an exemption of 40 acres, and I conceive this is fully as proper. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his proposition; I want upon it a vote.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I wish to correct the gentleman in one respect. This was no part of the Jewish law; it existed long prior to the Jewish code. It was subsequently adopted in the Jewish code; but it was given to the whole family of man, not particularly to that race. As to the principle involved, I shall not at present take up the time of the Convention in discussing it. I have my opinions with regard to it. I think it is an important subject. A large portion of the people of the State, are in direct hostility to the principle; and my objection to it is this, that placed in the constitution, it will array a hostile feeling against the constitution itself. The principle is undergoing discussion, and the people of this State will come to a decision upon this matter; either sustain the principle or not. There are various considerations to be taken in question, and it may well be doubted if it is proper to place it in the Constitution at the present time. I shall vote against the principle, but at the same time I shall take no action to support the other side of the question.

Mr. BUSH—I believe the law is backed up by public opinion. I believe that it will be a permanent principle in the State of Michigan. I think it ought to be placed in the constitution, and I shall vote against its indefinite postponement. My own impression is, that the support which has been attempted to be derived from Scripture authority, has been carried beyond its legitimate bearings.

The first murderer was Cain. He slew his brother under circumstances which peculiarly aggravated his crime, for Abel was righteous. What was his punishment? That he should be a wanderer and an outcast; but that whoso slew Cain should be punished. So that in the first instance, we find that the death penalty was not enforced. Nor was it so enforced until after the time that Noah planted a vineyard. And we find a prophetic denunciation in the Scriptures: "He that sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." It was speaking of the effect which would follow, and which does generally follow. The word "shall" had the same meaning as the word "will." It was so understood, and should be so regarded. By the Jewish code, if a bull gored with his horns, the bull was put to death. If the owner knew that he was wont to gore, the owner was put to death. But we find standing forth in the same decalogue: "Thou shalt not kill."

I am proud that the State of Michigan was the first State in the Union to abolish the death penalty; and we can say that the system now established works admirably, and fully sustains our position. What is the tendency of this mode of punishment?

It only hardens the community and makes them familiar with scenes of crime—makes them more criminal. This has been our experience. I never saw or heard of a public execution where it was not a matter among the crowd of revel and gayety. The effect was the reverse of a good effect upon the spectators.

Mr. FRALICK—I made this motion, thinking that it belonged properly to the Legislature. We have a law upon this subject. The question has been fully discussed by the people, and I am perfectly willing that it shall be left to them to act in the matter as their best judgment may direct. I do not think that it can be properly placed in the constitution.

Mr. MOORE—I do not believe it is necessary to place it in the constitution. I hope that it will be left to the Legislature.

Mr. HANSCOM—I am opposed to the introduction of this principle in the constitution, because I am opposed to the introduction of one single proposition in this constitution that is not needed. I am in favor of the principle, but I think that it can be sufficiently regulated by public sentiment.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—I accord entirely with the sentiments of the gentleman from Oakland. There is no imperative necessity for incorporating this in the constitution, as we have a statute law on the subject; and it is our duty to place in this constitution no article that shall needlessly impede its adoption by the people. I hope it will be postponed; for, although it is our law, I know that in my county many persons are so prejudiced, that if the constitution was unexceptionable in every other respect, and contained this provision, they would vote against it. I have heard this repeated many times by men of intelligence and ability. Our present law is a mere experiment; it may, or may not be sustained by the people; but if it is, we have no need to engraft it here. I shall vote for the indefinite postponement.

Mr. N. PIERCE—It will take just as long to postpone it as to take a direct vote. If punishment does not deter crime, as some gentlemen argue, we had better abolish the State prison, for it certainly increases the expense of the State. I had supposed that punishment was for the purpose of reforming the criminal and helping to maintain good order through the land; if it is not so, there is no reason for confining a man.

I will go as far as most people upon this question. I have suffered no injury from the wicked; but there are some reasons why it should not be abolished. If a man has committed rape, murder or arson, if every means had been tried for his reformation, and every means had failed, why should he not be used up? For the most atrocious criminal can, after a year or two, by the influence of friends, obtain a pardon from the Executive, to commence probably a fresh career of crime. What is the object of keeping him a tax upon the public while he lives, if he will not reform? If people think otherwise—if they say that punishment does no good, why, abolish it altogether.

Mr. BUSH—I will not detain the Convention more than a few moments. I did not intend to make another remark, but from the continued arguments here, I deem it my duty to make a reply.

The gentleman from Calhoun has attempted to carry out the idea that the advocates of this system were opposed to all punishment. I rise to correct the gentleman upon this subject, and tell him that experience has shown that it is necessary to punish; but there is a difference of opinion as to the extent to which punishment should be carried in certain cases. I will point out one to the gentleman's attention. Let an enemy attempt to take his life, and he would use every means of self-defence, even to the taking the life of his enemy, if compelled so to do. But let that enemy attempt to take his life, and the gentleman from Calhoun has thrown him bound and helpless to the ground; would he then take his life? He would not, sir; he would revolt from it. His sense of propriety would be shocked—he would not murder him in cold blood.

Sir, when a person raises his arm against the laws of the State, if it is necessary to take his life to secure him, it is right so to do. They must catch him where they can find him; but having caught and secured him, I contend that they have no right to take his life. From what source does community take its rights and powers to take life? It can but take the rights which individuals have yielded to preserve the rights of society; but an individual has no right to take his life, or that of another. If, then, individuals cannot give that right, how can the community have that right? It cannot be taken except by that which is beyond that right, the law of self-preservation. Two armies meet, and much blood is shed; but if one is the conqueror, takes a portion of the other prisoners, and murders them in cold blood, the whole civilized world is shocked at the atrocity. Well, look at the laws of the State. One man is at war with the community. He is under their control. Yet they take him, and publicly execute him. They violate the solemn Covenant: "Thou shalt not kill." You have not the right to kill him; it cannot be delegated, for it does not exist. Human life is inviolate. He gave and He will take it away. I am not in favor of having him what the gentleman from Calhoun calls "used up," for it is not in accordance with the principles of justice and humanity.

The gentleman from Jackson thought it would endanger the constitution. If gentlemen had been as careful upon other subjects, it would probably have been as well for the interests of the people of the State. The gentleman from Calhoun has been much interested in placing in this constitution a large exemption law. Yet he said not a word then about the danger of the constitution, while voting for a measure that was in direct conflict with the vital interests of a large portion of the people of the State. On that and some other questions, there is danger of public sentiment. This is a matter of mere expediency alone, for it is now a part of our law.

Some great questions have been so tied up that no legislative action can be had upon them. I am in favor of this measure; although in one sense I have but little reason to care, for I firmly believe that it is as permanently fixed in this State, as the constitution of the State itself. I think that it is a beneficial provision—that it is humane—that we should not take the attributes of Divinity—that we should recollect that He who made us is a God, long suffering and gracious, abundant in mercy and truth.

Mr. BAGG—I rise merely to give a reason why I shall vote against indefinite postponement upon this subject. I am in favor of this, because I believe that vengeance belongs to a higher power, and there it ought to be left. When we had capital punishment by law, we must remember that the attempts to try criminals has cost this State a great deal of time and a great deal of money. Public sentiment is so opposed to life being taken, that I shall vote for it being placed in the constitution; and as far as the question of its acceptance by the people is concerned, it matters not to me whether it is received or not. I have but one guide; that is the dictate of my own judgment. What I think right to be placed in the constitution, for that I shall vote.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I do not rise to present an argument for or against capital punishment. I have no doubt that those who wish it inserted in the constitution act from pure motives; from feelings of the highest humanity. But I would submit to them whether the law now in force is not sufficient to answer the purpose; or whether there has been any indication on the part of the people to repeal the law. Again, I would submit whether cases may not arise in which it would be absolutely necessary to take human life. The contingency may never occur; but we may have insurrection or war, rendering it absolutely necessary to be taken away. It is better to leave this to legislative action. It is now the law of the land; and until it is fully tested, I would give the people power to rescind it or not.

Mr. WOODMAN asked five minutes time of the Convention. The committee of six who reported this article were unanimous in their opinion respecting the abolition of capital punishment. We consider we have not been treated with the respect that has been given to other committees. We have taken but little time in this Convention making speeches, and we want this question brought up—we want to record our votes, and we ask it as a privilege. I ask the gentleman from Wayne to withdraw his proposition, that it may not be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. McCLELLAND—When I vote for or against an indefinite postponement, I consider that I am voting for or against the article. I believe it is so understood. The gentleman appears to censure the members. I do not see with what reason.

Mr. WOODMAN—I do not censure the gentleman from Monroe. But it is an important question, and I claim that the committee be treated with due respect.

Mr. LEACH—I do not wish to insert capital punishment in this constitution, as there is no probability that the law on the subject will be changed. I am therefore content that the law shall stand as it now does.

Mr. COMSTOCK thought that the question of capital punishment sustained a relation at the present time that imprisonment for debt did a few years ago. The latter question was settled by the advancing intelligence of the age, and he had no doubt that the former would be in a similar manner. He wished to record his vote in favor of its abolition.

Mr. WILLIAMS was in favor of the abolition of capital punishment; but did not want it placed in the constitution.

Mr. GALE—It seems rather fashionable for gentlemen to give their opinions, and I hope the Convention will hear me. I shall vote for this principle. My mind is made up on this subject, and I shall vote for it; and although I wish the subject had not come up at the present time, and think, with others, it has come up with a great deal of impropriety at the present time, yet I always wish to record my vote in favor of the principle. A man cannot delegate that which he does not possess himself. He cannot delegate the right to take his life, either to another person or the community; neither is it necessary to take the life of a criminal by way of punishment.

Mr. KINGSLEY said—It may not be understood by all the Convention that there is still one crime recognized by the laws of this State, the commission of which is punishable with death. It is the crime of treason against the State. That crime has never been committed within this State, yet it may be committed. Within the next sixteen years we may be engaged in a war with England—we are near her possessions. In such a war, which is not at all impossible, we may find in our midst those who will aid the enemy; traitors who may aid in the war against us. They may be so numerous that the state prison would not hold them. It may then be necessary to put in force the law we have.

The law, as it now exists, is a mere experiment. There is no danger of its alteration, unless there should be a necessity for it. Catharine of Russia abolished capital punishments by law. The law remained in force for twenty years, but necessity compelled her again to resort to capital punishments to check the increase of crime in her dominions. Boccacio, on crimes, furnishes this piece of history.

No one will vote against the constitution we are framing, if we leave out this provision. Many men may be induced to vote against it, if we insert it. I am willing the law shall remain as it is. It never will be altered unless the public good requires it. Public sentiment does not require us to adopt this provision. We should not adopt propositions of doubtful utility, which are not called for. Indeed, the principle proposed to be engrafted here, is not so fully established to be right, as to entitle it to a place in the fundamental law of the State.

Mr. CORNELL conceded the principle, but hoped as it was on the statute it would not be placed in the constitution; there might a contingency arise that might make it necessary to take life; he hoped not, but it might occur.

Mr. N. PIERCE—If the Convention does not postpone, I wish to amend the report of the committee.

Mr. AXFORD moved the previous question, but the call was not sustained.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to postpone indefinitely, and the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Axford, Alvord, Anderson, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, S. Clark, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Fralick, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Lovell, McClelland, Moore, Mowry, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, White, Whipple, Williams, President—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Bagg, H. Bartow, Britain, Asahel Brown, Bush, Comstock, Cook, Crouse, Daniels, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Gale, Lee, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, Orr, N. Pierce, Prevost, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Warden, Webster, Woodman—28.

So the article was indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT announced the following communication:

"Mr. J. Coates respectfully resigns his appointment as Reporter to the Convention."

And the same was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the article entitled "Finance and Taxation" was taken from the table, and the question being upon concurring in the amendments made in committee of the whole,

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the substitute for section one, reported by the committee, was amended as follows:

Strike out in the second line, "and of the balance of," and insert "the principal and interest of."

Also, strike out from lines three and four, "until the 1st day of January, 1852," and insert "until the extinguishment of the State debt, other than the amounts due to the primary school, university and other educational funds."

Mr. McCLELLAND—I want to ask how the gentleman from Berrien provides for the State debt. There is such a vagueness about this proposition that I cannot see what the intention is. I want something which will clearly show our determination to pay the State debt itself; and I am afraid that the construction will be that the interest merely has to be paid. I think the State debt should be extinguished before any diversion of the funds is allowed; for, if I understand the matter correctly, a great many of these specific taxes arose from sources that were pledged for the payment of the State debt; and I am opposed to diverting the funds from that purpose.

Mr. BUSH—If gentlemen will look at the session laws, they will find a provision like this: "The proceeds of all rail roads and canals constructed by the State, the interest of all loans made by the State from the internal improvement fund, and dividends from bank stock shall constitute a sinking fund for the principal and interest of the State debt."

The provisions of this law are written not only on the statute book, but also on the face of every one of the bonds. If gentlemen are anxious to carry out the pledged faith of the State, they will strike out the whole section.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I should be glad if the chairman of the committee would state whether any of these specific taxes are pledged for any portion of the debt that the State now owes. If that is so, I shall be glad to know it.

Mr. BRITAIN—In answer to the gentleman from Monroe, I am happy to say that the article under consideration must, in one respect, meet his approbation. It specifically provides for the payment of the principal of the State debt. To the gentleman from Berrien I would say, I do not know that the specific taxes are now pledged for any thing except the payment of the interest on the primary school and university funds. If they are pledged for other purposes, I have not learned. The interest on the State debt is about $140,000. The interest on the primary school and university funds is about $17,000. The specific tax for 1849, amounted to about $19,000; but in 1852 will amount to $70,000; and unlike other amounts accruing to the treasury, its receipt can be depended upon when due. As the principal of the various educational funds had been applied in payment of State indebtedness, and as the great interests of education imperiously demanded the prompt payment and distribution of the interest due its various funds, it was thought advisable to secure this desirable end by appropriating for that purpose the most reliable fund of the State, to wit: the specific tax fund; and I am satisfied that gentlemen, upon reflection, will approve of this arrangement, because they will at once see that it is more important that the interest accruing to the educational fund be promptly paid, than any other debt which could be due from it.

Mr. FRALICK—When in order, I propose to offer a substitute for section 1.

"The Legislature shall provide for an annual tax, sufficient, with other sources of income, to defray the estimated expenses of the State for each year, including the interest on the debt of the State; and whenever the expenses of any year, including such interest, shall exceed the income, the Legislature shall provide for levying a tax the ensuing year, sufficient, with other sources of income, to pay the deficiency, as well as the estimated expenses of such ensuing year, including such interest."

This substitute, (said Mr. F.) if adopted, will leave the specific taxes and all others, where they properly belong, and as heretofore provided by law. It makes a general obligatory provision that the interest of the entire State debt, including the interest on the debt to the different educational funds, shall and must be paid from year to year.

If any deficiency should occur in any year, in the payment of the interest of the entire State debt, including the amount set apart for a sinking fund, and the current expenses of the State, it makes it obligatory upon the Legislature to levy an additional tax the ensuing year, to make up said deficiency. If this course is adopted it will not only make ample provision for the payment of the indebtedness of the State, and the interest thereon, together with the expenses of the State, but will also give the people of the State the satisfaction of knowing that their faith has been kept inviolate to their creditors; and which would not be the fact if the section as it now stands in the article is retained; as by that the specific taxes would be diverted from the fund to which they have been heretofore pledged by the State.

After the State debt is paid, I have no objection to the Legislature's appropriating the specific taxes in any manner they shall judge the best interests of the State will be promoted; but, until that debt is paid, or the amount other than that owing to the educational funds, is paid, I consider the faith of the State pledged not to divert these taxes, more particularly the specific taxes upon the rail roads in the State, from the payment of both principal and interest of said debt. And, in my opinion, any such diversion as anticipated in the section I propose to strike out, would be a violation of the faith of the State.

It is provided in the second section of this article that a sinking fund shall be formed for the purpose of paying and extinguishing the principal of the State debt. I want this substitute adopted, so that the Legislature may not be precluded from using all the ordinary means of the State, as well as the power of raising a direct tax for the purpose of discharging the calls upon the treasury of the State, as provided in the substitute, and for the formation of said sinking fund; which they cannot do if the section as it now stands in the article is not amended or stricken out.

This question was discussed at length in the committee whose chairman reported the article, and the principles of the substitute were agreed to by a majority of the committee, as I understood; and myself, as well as others of the committee, were surprised and disappointed by the manner in which the chairman drew up the first section of the article in his report; and it is my opinion, had the section been drawn containing the principles of the substitute, it would have saved two days of the time of this Convention; as I am confident this Convention will never adopt this article unless the main principles of the substitute are inserted, and thereby secure the faith of the people of the State from jeopardy or violation.

Mr. WHITE—I am at a loss how to proceed. When we look at the subject, and see the various projects that emanate from the chairman of that committee, it throws a doubt over my mind whether we are proceeding correctly or not. I wish to act in this matter understandingly. I wish to act for the best interests of the people of the State.

I think that, as the fourth proposition has come from the gentleman, the proper way will be for him to give us some data to act upon; that we may not thus vote in the dark. I would ask if he has made no examination with regard to the resources of the State; what they are, what they will be? We have seen no statistics—no means of obtaining correct information; and I deem that information essential to every member in this Convention.

I want to vote understandingly on a matter of this vital importance. The good faith of the State depends upon our action. If the chairman of this committee is not prepared to sustain his positions, I hope the Convention will take some other course with respect to this matter.

Mr. FRALICK—By the amendment made by the delegate from Berrien, the entire amount of specific taxes, now and hereafter to be collected, will go into the primary school and university funds; and those taxes will be diverted from the purposes to which they have been heretofore pledged, and the whole amount of the deficiency will have to be made up by a direct tax, as the amendment provides that these specific taxes shall be distributed from year to year, with the regular proceeds of the school fund: which taxes will undoubtedly increase to a large amount in a few years, but will afford, under this amendment, no adequate relief to the tax payers of the State. For they will have been diverted from their proper course, the general fund, and the whole amount of the interest on all the State debt, the amount set apart for a sinking fund, together with the current expenses of the State, will have to be made up by a direct tax upon the property of the people of the State. This will make a very heavy direct tax; and if the people complain, as most assuredly they will, they cannot correct the evil without an amendment to the constitution. For these, and many other reasons I might assign, I am opposed to the amendment, or of diverting these specific taxes from the fund where they properly belong.

Mr. CHURCH proposed the following substitute for the one reported by the committee:

"All specific taxes, save those received from the mining companies organized in the upper peninsula, shall be applied in paying the interest upon the State indebtedness; and to the payment of said indebtedness, (save that in favor of the several educational funds,) until the full extinguishment of said State indebtedness, at which time the said specific taxes shall be added to, and forever constitute a part of, the proceeds of the primary school fund."

Mr. C. said—This substitute differs from others in appropriating to one purpose these specific taxes, for the payment of the interest and principal of the State indebtedness, that was contracted for the purpose of prosecuting the internal improvement of the State.

If the general fund has run in debt to the school or university fund, it can be otherwise taken care of. If there is a debt which we are bound to hold in particular regard, it is the debt contracted for internal improvements. This is all that I think necessary. I do not want it encumbered with other provisions. I think in its present shape it is more intelligible and direct.

Mr. CORNELL would ask the gentleman from Kent what advantage this substitute had over the original section?

Mr. CHURCH—It makes a distinct provision for a debt that we have incurred by an attempt at prosecuting a magnificent system of internal improvements, and it leaves the indebtedness of the general fund to take care of itself. The Legislature can make provision for that; but I want the specific taxes, except those I have reserved, distinctly applied to the payment of the State debt. My object is to have a plain, simple, direct proposition to effect that object.

Mr. CORNELL would inquire why the specific taxes in the upper peninsula should be excepted?

Mr. CHURCH—It is small at present, and is, if our information is correct, needed for the support of the town and county governments. That being the case, they should be returned in the manner that the Legislature thinks best. They may appropriate it in part, or to such counties as may need it the most.

There has been a demand for a separate organization in the upper peninsula; what kind of government does not yet appear. They may need a distinct sum given for the purpose of internal improvement. The canal around Saut Ste Marie may yet become a State work. It is but a small sum, and there are various considerations that suggest the propriety of leaving this matter apart from the other specific taxes. It would not swell the amount much larger in the aggregate sum; while, by including it with the rest, we may be committing gross injustice to the people of the upper peninsula.

Mr. BRITAIN—I see an objection to the principle of a separate arrangement for the people of the upper peninsula. Gentlemen will always find me willing to do what is right with regard to the people of the upper peninsula; but in establishing a general rule I cannot except them. They are entitled to as much attention as other portions of the State, and no more. If charters exist in the upper peninsula that are detrimental to their interests, the evil may be remedied some other way; but when we are legislating for the people of the State of Michigan, let us legislate for the whole State.

There are other reasons why I am not in favor of the substitute of the gentleman from Kent; but if this was all the objection that could be brought against it, I should still be opposed to it. He proposes to make these specific taxes appropriated only for the interest and principal of the State debt. Are we under any obligation to do so? Are we bound by any principle of good faith to do so? I think that no gentleman in this Convention can show that we are. Sir, we have, as already stated, applied the educational funds in payment of the State debt, and we are at liberty to pursue that policy with the specific taxes which is best calculated to advance the interests of the State.

With regard to the second proposition of the gentleman from Kent, the State is constantly receiving the principal of the university and primary school funds. Does the State not apply it to the payment of the interest of the State debt? And I would ask if it can be applied to a better purpose? It does not come in with perfect regularity; but some years more, and some years less, on account of being dependent upon the sale of lands. There might be a difficulty in paying the interest of the primary school and other educational funds from these receipts, on account of this irregularity.

Well, if the State is in the constant receipt of the primary school and other educational funds, which she applies in payment of State indebtedness, I would ask if by this plan the obligations of the State are not fulfilled? Is not its duty performed? Then, for what reason do we want the substitute of the gentleman from Kent? And why not at once specify that we will pay the interest accruing to the educational funds out of the specific taxes, for the simple reason that the receipt of them is regular, and the educational funds can with safety depend upon them for the payment of their interest when due? So long as the State can thus secure to these funds the payment of interest due to them, without injustice to the holders of State stocks, I can conceive no reason why we should not, and I hope the Convention will, do it. I believe that we are bound by every consideration of duty to do so; and I think that any change would be a retrograde change instead of an advance. I hope that we shall not legislate for any one part of the country, but for the whole of the State of Michigan.

Mr. WILLIAMS disagreed with the gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] in toto. In the first place he denied that there was one obligation of the State more sacred than all others, and that the State debt proper. The general indebtedness was in the nature of an ordinary debt arising on contract, while the debt to the primary school fund was for a trust fund—an obligation always regarded as sacred. Not only would it be incumbent on the State to pay the interest on this trust, but the principal also, before any other debt whatever. The least we can do is to use all specific taxes to pay interest on the educational trust funds.

The gentleman gives as a reason for excepting the specific taxes raised on mining companies in the Upper Peninsula, that the specific tax is in lieu of all other taxes, for county and town purposes, and therefore being exempt from taxation there, the specific taxes should be refunded to the Upper Peninsula. Now, I am informed that the Treasurer of the State is in possession of a written opinion of the Attorney General that some or all of those companies are subject to local taxation, in spite of the specific tax. If so, the gentleman's argument all falls to the ground.

I am in favor of appropriating all specific taxes, which can honestly be so used, to the payment of interest on these sacred educational funds.

[Mr. WHIPPLE next made a few remarks.]

Mr. J. D. PIERCE was much obliged for the statements of the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE;] he was satisfied from the statements that it was perfectly competent to adopt the substitute of the committee of the whole as made this morning. We have in good faith appropriated the gross amount of the public works for the payment of the public debt. We have done more; we have used the educational funds for the payment of the public debt; now we propose to take the specific taxes, leaving the trust funds entirely unprovided for. I am perfectly satisfied that it is entirely competent to adopt the amendment.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, a call of the Convention was ordered, and Messrs. ARZENO, BARNARD, J. BARTOW, BEARDS-

LEY, BURNS, DESNOYERS, LEACH, PREVOST, and STURGIS were absent without leave.

Mr. BUSH asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. BARNARD.

Mr. EATON for Mr. DESNOYERS.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with; but the motion was lost.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, the Sergeant-at-arms was dispatched for the absentees.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The argument assigned by the gentleman from Berrien, contains good and sound reasons. I have understood that the Attorney General has given an opinion relative to the charters of the mining companies in the upper peninsula. That his opinion was that it relieved these companies from a tax upon the real estate, though not upon the personal property. I voted to except the mining companies, and shall do so again, so that the matter can be left to the Legislature. I shall vote for the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Berrien. I cannot, under the circumstances, vote for the substitute of the gentleman from Kent. I want this other educational fund protected, so that the Legislature will have nothing to do with it. Adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Berrien, or I am fearful they will be levying it at discretion.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—There are nineteen charters on which real estate may be taxed for township and county purposes.

Mr. HANSCOM said the Chief Justice had given reasons why the specific taxes should be placed in the general fund. The faith of the State was pledged to that course. It was a mere matter of expediency, as far as the other interests were concerned, to place these specific taxes apart for that purpose. The State might do it on that ground, but was not bound so to do.

Mr. BRITAIN—Mr. President, if my worthy colleague who read to us a few minutes ago, the act under which the five million loan was made, pledging the dividends of all banks and the proceeds of all rail roads and canals for the extinguishment of said debt, was correct in his inference, that "the dividends of all banks and the proceeds of all rail roads and canals, covers all the specific taxes upon banks, rail roads and canals," then, of course, these taxes should be so applied; and the Legis-ature have broken faith by applying them to the payment of interest on the educational funds. But, sir, before we surrender control over these funds, so obviously required by public interest to be set apart for the payment of interest on the educational funds, should we not endeavor to ascertain whether such was really the fact?

Sir, notwithstanding my great respect for the opinions of my colleague, when deliberately formed, I think in this case he has merely glanced at the subject; and that by his commendable anxiety to maintain inviolate the faith of the State, he has been drawn into an erroneous conclusion. Sir, I was a member of the Legislature which framed that law; and I have not the most distant recollection of any such understanding of it at the time; nor do I now think that the language of the law and the practice of the State admit such a conclusion.

Sir, the State was collecting specific taxes from banks at the time, and if they were intended to be included why are they not named in the law? or if the law was supposed to cover them, why were they not immediately so applied while the law and its object were fresh in the recollections of the various officers of the State?

Now, Mr. President, let us examine the law, and, if possible, see what it does mean: "The dividends of banks and proceeds of rail roads and canals," certainly does not mean the specific taxes collected either from banks, plank roads, or mining companies, if the taxes paid by these companies are under our control; and those collected from rail roads and canals are only involved in doubt. Now, sir, let us suppose that some gentlemen had purchased a farm and agreed to pay $3,000 for it in five years, and to pay upon it all the proceeds of the farm until it should be paid for. If at the end of three years he sells the farm for $2,500, and pays the same over in good faith, together with the proceeds of the three years, amounting in all to $2,800, has he not so far fulfilled his contract in good faith? And what, if after he had sold it, a tax had been collected upon it by the government; could that tax be considered a part of the proceeds of the farm, and he accused of bad faith, because he did not pay that amount to the original owner also? Sir, I trust not; and I think that the two cases are parallel; and I believe also that when the State sold the rail roads, and faithfully applied all the proceeds of the sale in payment of the State debt, she fully and entirely fulfilled that part of the law which required her to apply the proceeds of the rail roads in payment of the debt created by the five million loan.

Mr. WHIPPLE—The State meant the dividends, for it never dreamed at that time of selling the railroad.

Mr. CORNELL—I would ask the Chief Justice a question. I owe an individual money—I cannot pay him—I borrow money to pay part, with the promise that I will repay to the lender as soon as money comes in my possession—I ask him which I am bound to pay first, the old debt or the man that lent me the borrowed money?

Mr. WHIPPLE—We have borrowed money first from the internal improvement fund, subsequently from the school fund. We are bound in equity to first provide for the older debt; that is the rule. The older equity will prevail.

Mr. CORNELL—The specific taxes had no existence at the time the first money was borrowed. Shall we take these specific taxes that were then not thought of and apply them as a matter of right to the first debt?

Mr. HANSCOM would ask if the present indebtedness was not a balance due on the five million loan? Have we absolved ourselves by appropriating the proceeds of the sale to that debt? Have we met the provisions of the law? The answer will easily be seen, when a part of that sale was this very specific tax—that was a consideration in the sale, that this tax should be paid yearly into the treasury of the State. Is it not then clearly a part of the proceeds arising from the sale of this very road? I, for my part, do not see the difference.

Mr. BRITAIN—I do not see that a specific tax paid the State by a railroad for its protection, is any more the proceeds of such railroad than a tax upon a horse, which I might have sold five years ago, is a part of the proceeds of such horse. It is no part of the profits or of the proceeds of the horse in one instance, nor of the railroad in the other.

Mr. President: as there is now no business formally before the Convention, the absentees not yet having been brought in under the call, I beg permission to explain a matter of some consequence to the State, and thus avoid detaining the Convention when it shall be engaged in business.

The Convention was a few days since honored with a resolution of the common council of the city of Detroit, respectfully requesting the incorporation into this constitution of a provision to prevent banks, railroads, and other incorporations from being exempted from municipal and county taxes. The committee on finance and taxation, to whom this resolution was referred, instructed me to report the Article on Finance and Taxation, as a full report upon all the various propositions which had from time to time been submitted to them; but as the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. GOODWIN] seems to desire a more formal report, I beg permission in this way to explain the opinions which prevail with a majority of the committee, and which have governed any action of mine in the premises.

This exemption from municipal and county taxation seems to have been incorporated into these charters, for two purposes:

1st. For the benefit of the stockholders, and for the express purpose of relieving them from the fluctuations of township and county taxes, and from the inconvenience of attending to the assessment and collection of taxes in each of the townships through which they run. This exemption is not only regarded by the stockholders as one of their most valuable immunities, but is secured to them by one of those unalterable laws for which the gentleman from Wayne and other gentlemen of the legal profession entertain so much respect.

2d. To make the State realize from such corporations the largest practicable amount to its treasury. I do not now propose to enter upon an investigation of the inviolability of the grant; but leave that to gentlemen more learned in the law, and confine myself to an examination of the justice and policy of the second proposition; in doing which, I propose to ascertain the character of each of the corporations in question.

1st. I propose to examine a rail road company. Its charter can only be granted by a constitutional majority of the representatives of the whole people; and is only granted upon the earnest solicitations of the inhabitants of the "cities and counties" through which the charter extends. You grant them the charter and surrender to them the carrying trade of the country through which the charter extends, at the solicitation of its inhabitants, for the alleged reason that the interests of said inhabitants will be promoted by having their carrying trade more cheaply, expeditiously and safely done than they can do it themselves upon their own common highways. In granting these charters, you always endeavor, though sometimes unsuccessfully, to secure these benefits to the people; and the company chartered always promise them, whether the charter secures them to the people or not, and generally contend that the charter does secure them.

The people asking the charter expect further advantages from it. They expect that the promised facilities for travel and transportation will draw through their section of the State the trade and travel of other and less fortunate portions of the State; that the value of their farms and the commerce of their cities, and, in fact, that their wealth and general influence will be increased.

Now, sir, if the State, by granting a rail road charter, has advanced the interests of that portion through which the charter extends, beyond that of any other portion of it, and perhaps to the prejudice of other portions of it, is it not clear that, whatever tax the chartered company pays, should be paid to the common treasury for the benefit of the whole State; and would it not be as absurd to permit the cities and counties through which the charter extends to tax those whom the State has permitted to improve their commercial facilities, as it would be to permit a township to tax any valuable improvement upon one of its highways, made by the State or county?

If the State collect all the tax paid by such companies, are not the people at whose solicitation and for whose benefit the State permitted the roads to be constructed, highly favored, when compared with other portions of the State? The relations existing between plank road companies and the people will be found to be very similar to those existing between rail road companies and the people, to wit:

The legislature at the request of those interested permits a combination of capitalists to construct through the State, or between two given points in the State, a planked highway, upon which the business heretofore done upon the common highways can be more cheaply done by the people than upon their own common highways. This plank way, as in the case of a rail road, by its cheapness and facility of transportation, draws upon its own line the trade and travel of neighboring towns and thoroughfares, and thus increases the value of property, and the commerce of cities and villages, throughout its whole line. And may I not here again ask the question, if a plank road company be required to pay a tax upon the plank way which the State has, at the solicitation of the inhabitants along its line, permitted them to construct for the special benefit of such inhabitants, should it not be paid into the common treasury for the benefit of the whole State? And would there be any more propriety in permitting the towns and counties through which it runs to tax it for township and county purposes, than there would have been in permitting them to tax a government road, originally made for their special benefit, and perhaps now succeeded by this identical plank road? The only plea which could be made for taxing, in either case, must be that the road was not made with their money, and that they should be paid for protecting it; and it would be as equitable to take the people's money out of the treasury, in the latter case, as it would be to withhold the people's money from the treasury in the other.

But the gentleman from Wayne says there is a plank road entirely within the county of Wayne. Well, sir, what kind of charters have they? Are their charters confined to the county of Wayne? No sir, except in a single instance. The legislature would not grant such charters, and the persons who asked for the charters knew it. They therefore ask for charters for roads from Saginaw, from Lansing and other places to Detroit, with the intention, perhaps, of building the best portion of it, and forfeiting the balance. Now, sir, should this entitle the county of Wayne to a tax upon those roads, because they have not been extended beyond her limits? Is not a failure to build a violation of faith, and a fraud upon the people; and ought it not to put the seal of disapprobation upon those legislatures who have permitted companies to neglect all but the best portions of these roads, without securing to others the privilege of building the balance and becoming stockholders in the whole road?

Let us see, Mr. President, what the operation would be. A farmer starts from Lansing with thirty bushels of wheat; he travels on common roads to within twenty miles of Detroit, and could have completed his journey upon common roads with equal facility; but here he finds a plank road built by some catch-penny, just far enough out of the city to come the grab upon the concentrated travel, and he must now pay toll without the least possible benefit. Had the road been built to Lansing, as per charter, he could have carried sixty bushels of wheat, and traveled with more rapidity. Should this imposition entitle the county of Wayne, and the city of Detroit, whose inhabitants perhaps own this stock, to tax it for municipal and county purposes?

Mr. President, let us now endeavor to ascertain the relation subsisting between banks and the people. A bank claims to be a State institution—to have received its authority to do business from the people of the whole State—to have been created for the purpose of aiding the commercial business of the whole State. The whole State does business with them; and if a bank fails, the loss must be sustained by the bill holders of the whole State. Many persons have to incur the fatigues and expense of long journeys to transact business with them, while those in the vicinity of the bank can do it at home. Now, Mr. President, are not the places in which these public institutions are located the favored portions of the State, even though they be not permitted to tax them for municipal and county purposes? And can there be a single reason given why the entire amount of tax paid by them should not go into the common treasury for the benefit of the whole State?

The relation existing between mining and manufacturing companies and the State, seems to be of a different character. They merely ask a corporate name to enable a number of individuals to carry on an industrial pursuit. They are not in any way responsible to the public for the performance of any services, nor in fact have they anything to do with the public, or the public with them. It is proper, perhaps, for the Legislature to stipulate with them in their charters for the payment of a specific State tax, but it is certainly an outrage upon the rights of the people with whom they are located, to exempt them from the payment of municipal and county taxes. Wherever they have been so exempted, a portion of the tax collected should be returned to the proper counties for township and county purposes; but this wrong should, under no circumstances, in my opinion, be extended.

Mr. President, I have now completed the examination of the relation existing between these several corporations and the State, and also the pretension of counties and municipalities to the right of taxing banks, rail roads, and plank roads for municipal and county purposes; and the investigation has led me irresistibly to the conclusion that these institutions are emphatically public or State institutions, created by the authority and for the benefit of the State, and that they are responsible to and dependent upon the State. That they are privileged institutions, and should bear their full share of the burdens of government. That those portions of the State in which these institutions are located are highly favored portions of the State. That, as this favor is received from the State, the State has a right to specify the terms upon which it shall be received, and under this last right, to stipulate that all taxes paid by such corporations shall be paid into the treasury of the State, to lighten the burdens of taxation upon the less favored portions of the State. That the portions of the State in which these institutions are located are more highly favored than other portions of the State, even though they be not permitted to tax them for municipal and county purposes, and that they so consider it themselves. That the balance of the State owe it to themselves to persevere in the policy of collecting into the State treasury all the taxes paid by these corporations; and that when the city of Detroit or any other city or county shall gravely resolve not to receive the location of a bank, rail road, or plank road within its limits, unless permitted to tax them for municipal and county purposes, it will be time for the State to consider what she will do.

Mr. President, I have been aware, from the beginning, of the readiness and pertinacity with which persons sustain a private interest at the expense of a public interest, and could easily see that the city of Detroit could unite with her various other plans, by which rail roads, plank roads or banks have been located, and take your legislature by storm, and even, perhaps, rob the people of their rights; and I have for that reason been anxious to see this matter settled in the constitution, now and forever, and save all expense of future legislation upon the subject; and I trust that the Convention will settle it, by giving these specific taxes to the State, and prevent future Legislatures from quarreling about their disposal.

The absentees appearing,

On motion of Mr. COOK, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The President called the Convention to order.

The article "Finance and Taxation" being under consideration, and the question being on the proposition of Mr. CHURCH, offered this morning, Mr. ROBERTS made some remarks thereon, when

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend the substitute reported by the committee, by inserting after "taxes," in the first line, the words "save those received from the mining companies in the upper peninsula."

Mr. BRITAIN said he would prefer that one-half per cent of the money received from companies paying one per cent in lieu of all other taxes, be retained for county and township purposes.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I want the whole subject left to the Legislature, as we cannot at the present time tell what is the proper policy. Although I have had a good deal of connection with the upper peninsula, when I was upon a different theatre, yet I must confess that I am entirely in the dark as to the best course to be pursued. We do not know what is necessary for that section of the State; and while this uncertainty hangs over it, I am not willing to fix this definitely. I desire to leave it to the control of the Legislature, to be acted upon in future, and as will be conformable to the interests of the whole people of the State.

Mr. ROBERTS—I did wish that this matter had been left until the committee had made their report. In answer to the gentleman from Monroe, who has spoken in favor of postponing a definite action upon this subject with respect to the upper country, I say that we call upon this Convention to be definite. We want a perfect understanding as to our footing hereafter, or to be separated from you. That is what we demand, unless we can live with you on terms of equality, amity and friendship. We are yet but a child, but we have a strong frame.

Mr. BRITAIN—Great caution should be exercised with regard to this matter. The gentleman has exhibited with great clearness the condition of the country; and it is true that that country has had no benefits from the large expenditures in the lower peninsula.

Mr. McLEOD—Requisitions have been made for a number of years for grants of land, which have been given.

Mr. BRITAIN would like the gentleman to specify if any had been given.

Mr. McLEOD—Five hundred acres have been given to make a bridge path from Mackinac to Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. BRITAIN—Any other?

Mr. McLEOD—You can talk about that quite a long while.

Mr. BRITAIN—The upper country has not been in a condition to receive grants. An appropriation of five hundred acres may have been given, but what does that amount to? But new relations are beginning to exist. The new settlements will have wants similar to those of other new settlements. They will want roads and bridges, and organizations, and they must have them; and for the next fifteen years they will draw from us, not we from them.

It would not be the gentleman's interest to divide the State now. What have the school funds received from the upper peninsula? Not one dollar to the acre. Yet the people of the upper country are entitled to the same proportion as the inhabitants of the lower.

I am not aware how far there have been grants of internal improvement lands made there. I understood that the Secretary of the Treasury was unwilling that the State should lay its hands upon any lands in the upper peninsula.

Mr. HANSCOM said he thought the value was uncertain—that it would be unjust at the present time.

Mr. BRITAIN—No injustice should be done to that country; and I hope that every member will carry home with him and repeat the sentiment, that justice should be done to the upper country, whenever he may have an opportunity.

Is there any reason to adopt the plan of the gentleman from Monroe? He wishes to arrive at the same end as myself, but in a different way. I think that gentleman must see the danger of separate legislation. As one people, one organization, its claims will be stronger upon us, and there must be very many demands upon us from that portion of the country.

Mr. ROBERTS—I do not intend to take the proposition of either the gentleman from Monroe or that of the gentleman from Berrien. I will leave it to the judgment of the Convention, after explaining it as far as I can.

I wish to correct the gentleman from Berrien in one remark: that we shall call upon the lower peninsula for aid or assistance. We have nearly grown up—we have as yet received no aid or assistance; and we never shall get it unless we pay you in advance. You may take our money and hand us a part back, but you never will unless you take it in advance. All experience has shown this. The hard fate imposed upon us by the general government and the course of the State government have shown it conclusively. Can you give us our proportion of land? It is all located in the lower peninsula, and there is not an acre left. That in the upper peninsula was objected to, because they thought they might get five dollars per acre for them. The lands were located in Van Buren county, or Berrien county. We shall only be on terms of brotherhood when you give us justice and equality.

Mr. BRITAIN said there was no wish to oppress the upper peninsula. It was judged best to locate the lands in the lower peninsula; but the upper peninsula was entitled to a proportion, with the claims which a new county always had and must have. He did not doubt the older portion of the State would cheerfully comply. If they wished to separate, this was useless.

Mr. ROBERTS—We have no wish to separate; but we wish that we should live on like brothers. We have our school lands, and I can point out one location that I can sell to-morrow for $100,000. We are not therefore under the necessity of begging from the lower peninsula. We want to be placed on the same footing as the counties here, with respect to the money from the specific taxes: we might want half; we might in some instances want three-fourths. For the kind feeling that the gentleman from Berrien has shown, I thank him.

The amendment was carried, and Mr. CHURCH withdrew his proposition.

Mr. FRALICK offered the following substitute for the one reported by the committee for section one:

“The legislature shall provide for an annual tax, sufficient, with other sources of income, to defray the estimated expenses of the State for each year, including the interest on the debt of the State; and whenever the expenses of any year, including such interest, shall exceed the income, the legislature shall provide for levying a tax the ensuing year, sufficient, with other sources of income, to pay the deficiency, as well as the estimated expenses of such ensuing year, including such interest.”

But the same was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the amendment of the committee was so amended as to strike out but the first sub-division of section one, and substitute as reported.

The amendments of the committee were then severally concurred in.

The article being up for amendment,

Mr. BUTTERFIELD moved to amend section eleven by striking out the words “of taxation,” in the first line, and inserting the following: “for the assessment and collection of all taxes.”

Mr. B. said—The object is simply to place resident and non-resident land on an equal footing. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRALICK—Gentlemen seem to be in considerable of a hurry with this amendment. It is not noticed; but the effect will surely be that the entire tax must be closed in the township. Every tax roll must be closed there and then.

Mr. WHITE was not aware that such was the character of the amendment. He knew a case in Lapeer, where a young man who had paid his taxes regularly, had a stranger come with a tax deed; and although he could prove that he paid his tax, it cost $50 to clear his land. Other instances he could cite to prove that the present system was unjust, unequal and oppressive.

The yeas and nays were taken, and the motion was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, H. Bartow, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Chandler, Gale, Green, Hart, Harvey, Leach, Moore, Morrison, Orr, N. Pierce, Sturgis, Webster, White, Williams, Woodman—20.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Axford, Bagg, Beardsley, Bush, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hascall, Kingsley, McClelland, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Prevost, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Town, Warden, Whipple, President—31.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend by adding thereto the following additional section:

“Every act making an appropriation for purposes not provided for by this constitution, shall contain a provision for the necessary State tax to meet such appropriation, and a statement of the year or years in which said tax is to be levied; and said act shall, before it shall take effect, be submitted to the people at a general election, or at the annual township meetings, and be approved by a majority of all the votes given for and against it at said election or annual township meetings.”

Mr. B. said—There is no closing section in the article. There is no provision prohibiting the Legislature from appropriating money for any new purpose which they might choose, even if not named in the constitution. This prohibits the appropriation until sanctioned by the people; that is all that is meant by the section.

Mr. COOK—The proposition was submitted in committee of the whole, and was rejected, because it was thought to be impracticable. I am of the same opinion still. Take an instance: suppose a member of the legislature should die and funeral expenses be incurred; does this constitution provide for a payment of that description? Yet, by this section, it would have to go to the people, and be voted upon by them. It is necessary to give many powers to the legislature not specified in the constitution. It is a provision that ought not to be adopted.

Mr. BRITAIN—The common provision for the payment of the current expenses would cover that ground. I have no objection to give the Legislature all the power that is necessary. The Legislature of 1852 might appropriate half a million for the purpose of building another Capitol, or any other act equally rash and wild. The object was to submit this to the people, before it could be so appropriated. I want the yeas and nays.

Not a sufficient number voting therefor, the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to; and the article was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the Convention then adjourned.

MONDAY, (48th day,) August 5.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. McCLELLAND offered the following, which was laid upon the table:

Resolved, That this Convention will adjourn, sine die, on Monday the 19th inst.

Mr. WHITTEMORE moved to recommit the article on Elections to committee with which it originated, with instructions to strike out of section one, the words “and also every white male inhabitant who shall have resided in the State two years and a half, and declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States,” and that the article be reported back as amended forthwith.

Mr. LEACH moved to amend the proposition by striking out the word “white.”

Mr. McCLELLAND—Mr President: I was not present when the discussion was had upon this article, and shall not attempt to re-open it. But I shall make a few brief remarks pertinent to the proposition now before the Convention. I am in favor of the instruction proposed by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. WHITEMORE,] believing that it will leave the article in a more acceptable shape.

The gentleman from Genesee [Mr. LEACH] has moved a further instruction to strike out the word "white," with a view to permit persons of color to vote. I am and always have been willing to submit this question to the people, and let them decide for themselves. Their decision will, I hope, end all agitation on the subject; and hence I shall vote for the resolution, which submits it in a separate form to the electors. I would do anything in my power, compatible with my duty as a good citizen, to ameliorate the condition of the blacks, and make them intelligent and happy. This, in my judgment, cannot be done in this way. I voted against the same proposition in the Convention of 1835, and the same reasons will induce me to do so again. I cannot agree to confer upon them the privilege of the elective franchise. No two distinct castes can exist in a country, without one being superior to the other. They cannot with safety be placed on an equality with the whites, either socially or politically. The granting the privilege asked for would be an entering wedge to a state of things to which I am irreconcilably hostile. I shall therefore vote against this instruction.

The motion to amend was lost by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. H. Bartow, Asahel Brown, Chandler, Comstock, Daniels, Green Harvey, Leach, Lovell, Orr, N. Pierce, Prevost, Williams—13.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Choate, Church, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Kingsley, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, J. D. Pierce, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Town, Walker, Warden, Whittemore, Woodman, President—46.

Mr. FRALICK moved to amend so as to instruct the committee to strike out section one, and substitute in lieu thereof as follows:

"In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State six months next preceding an election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and every white male inhabitant who was permitted to vote under the provisions of the previous constitution of this State, and their male descendants of the age aforesaid, having resided in the State six months next preceding an election, shall have the right of voting as aforesaid; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote except in the township or ward of which he is an actual resident, and in which he has resided for ten days next preceding the day of election."

Mr. F. said he had not heard any fault found with the original provision in our constitution upon this subject; nor had he heard that it required to be amended; perhaps other gentleman had. The first section was fair and liberal. He thought that when a man became a citizen he ought to have the right of voting, and not until then.

Mr. WALKER suggested the propriety of not taking up and discussing over again, in a thin house, those questions which the minority had not succeeded in carrying in a full Convention. It seemed to him to be rather a curious mode of procedure to take up questions and discuss them anew, upon which all due deliberation had been previously had.

Mr. HANSCOM observed that there was a provision in the article which gave those coming from other places the right of voting, after they had resided in this State for a certain period. He hoped the gentleman would withdraw his proposition. The Convention had already given a full expression of opinion on this subject.

Mr. FRALICK did not desire to withdraw his proposition. He did not know that the gentleman [Mr. WALKER] had any right to impugn his motives.

The question being upon Mr. FRALICK's amendment, the yeas and nays were ordered thereon, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Ammon Brown, Church, Fralick, McLeod, Mowry, Newberry, Prevost, Rix Robinson, Town—10.

YAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Eaton, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Leach, Lee, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Walker, Warden, Whittimore, Williams, Woodman, President—46.

The proposition of Mr. WHITEMORE was then rejected by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Danforth, Eastman, Fralick, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Kingsley, McClelland, McLeod, Newberry, Skinner, Storey, Town, Whittimore—18.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Asahel Brown, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Daniels, Eaton, Gale, Gibson, Green, Harvey, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Morrison, Mosher, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Soule, Walker, Warden, Williams, Woodman, President—44.

Mr. DANIELS proposed the following:

Resolved, That no member shall occupy more than five minutes in speaking at any one time, either in Convention or committee of the whole, from and after this date, except by leave of the Convention or committee.

And the same was adopted—yeas 51, nays 6.

On motion of Mr. GREEN,

Resolved, That the committee on phraseology be instructed to inquire into the propriety of so altering the phraseology in the article on elections, as to make it unnecessary to refer to the constitution of 1835.

Mr. HANSCOM asked and obtained leave to introduce an article entitled "Judicial Department," as follows:

ARTICLE —.

Judicial Department.

Sec. 1. The judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court, in Circuit Courts, in Probate Courts, and in justices of the peace. Municipal courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction may be established by the Legislature in cities.

Sec. 2. The Supreme Court shall consist of three judges, two of whom shall form a quorum, and the concurrence of two shall be necessary to every decision. And the Legislature shall have power, after the year 1855, to provide by law for the election of an additional judge of said Supreme Court; and also to provide that the concurrence of three of said judges shall be necessary to every final decision. And the Legislature may also provide that each of the judges of the Supreme Court shall be authorized and required to hold one term of the Circuit Courts in each and every year, in any of the counties of this State in which more than two terms of such circuit shall be annually held. The final decisions of the judges shall be in writing, and signed by those concurring; and a judge dissenting from a decision shall give the reasons for such dissent, in writing, under his signature.

Sec. 3. The judges of the Supreme Court shall be elected by the qualified electors, and shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified.

Sec. 4. Of the judges of the Supreme Court first elected, one shall hold his office for two years, one for four years, and one for six years, to be determined by lot at the first session of the court after their election. Thereafter the judge elected to fill the office shall hold the same for the term of six years. The judge having the shortest time to serve shall be chief justice.

Sec. 5. The Supreme Court shall have a general superintending control over all inferior courts, and shall have power to issue writs of error, habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, and other original and remedial writs, and to hear and determine the same. In all other cases it shall have appellate jurisdiction only.

Sec. 6. The Supreme Court shall hold at least one term annually in each judicial circuit, at such time and place as may be designated by said court; and the Legislature may provide for the holding of the terms in each or either of the said circuits in each and every year.

Sec. 7. The Supreme Court shall have power, by general rules, to establish, modify, amend and simplify the practice in said court, and in the Circuit Courts.

Sec. 8. The State shall be divided into five judicial circuits; in each of which one circuit judge shall be elected by the qualified electors thereof, who shall hold his office for the term of six years, and until his successor is elected and qualified.

Sec. 9. The Legislature may alter the limits of circuits, or increase the number of the same; but no increase thereof shall be made except at the session of the Legislature first held after the apportionment of Senators and Representatives provided for in this constitution. No alteration or increase shall have the effect to remove a judge from office. In every additional circuit established, the judge shall be elected, and his term of office shall continue as provided in this constitution for the judges of the Circuit Court.

Sec. 10. The Circuit Courts shall have original jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal, not excepted in this constitution, and not prohibited by law, and appellate jurisdiction from all inferior courts and tribunals, and a supervisory control of the same. They shall also have power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, and other writs necessary to carry into effect their orders, judgments and decrees, and give them a general control over inferior courts and tribunals within their respective jurisdictions.

Sec. 11. Each of the judges of the Supreme and Circuit Courts shall receive a salary, payable quarterly. They shall receive no fees or perquisites of office, or other compensation; and shall hold no other office of trust or profit during the term for which they are elected. All votes for either of them, for any office other than a judicial one, given either by the Legislature or the people, shall be void.

Sec. 12. The judges of the Supreme Court may appoint a reporter of their decisions. The judges of the Circuit Courts, within their respective jurisdiction, may fill vacancies in the office of county clerk, and of prosecuting attorney. But no judge of the Supreme Court or of a Circuit Court shall exercise any other power of appointment to public office.

Sec. 13. A Circuit Court shall be held at least once in each year, in every county organized for judicial purposes. In counties having a population of 15,000 inhabitants, by the last preceding enumeration provided for in this constitution, there shall be held not less than three terms of such court in each year, unless otherwise provided by law. Judges of the Circuit Court may hold courts for each other, and shall do so when required by law.

Sec. 14. The clerk of each county organized for judicial purposes shall be the clerk of the Circuit Court of such county, and of the Supreme Court when held within the same.

Sec. 15. Appeals and writs of error may be taken from the Circuit Court of any county, to the Supreme Court held in the circuit which includes such county, or, with the consent of parties in the cause, to the Supreme Court held in any other circuit.

Sec. 16. In each of the counties organized for judicial purposes, there shall be a Court of Probate. The judge of such court shall be elected by the qualified electors of the county in which he resides, and shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor is elected and qualified. The jurisdiction, powers and duties of such court shall be prescribed by law. And in counties having a population of less than 15,000 inhabitants, the Legislature may authorize and require the Circuit Courts to perform the duties of such Probate Courts.

Sec. 17. When a vacancy occurs in the office of judge of the Supreme Court, Circuit Court or Probate Court, such vacancy shall be filled by appointment of the Governor, which shall continue until a successor is elected and qualified; and when elected, such successor shall hold his office the residue of the unexpired term.

Sec. 18. The Supreme Court, the Circuit and Probate Courts of each county, shall be courts of record, and shall each have a common seal.

Sec. 19. The Legislature may provide by law for the election of one or more persons in each organized county, who may be vested with judicial powers, not exceeding those of a judge of the circuit court at chambers. In counties having a population of less than twenty thousand inhabitants, by the last preceding enumeration provided for in this constitution, these powers may be devolved upon the judge of probate.

Sec. 20. The Legislature shall provide for the speedy publication of all statute laws of a public nature, and of such judicial decisions as it may deem expedient. All laws and judicial decisions shall be free for publication by any person.

Sec. 21. There shall be such number of justices of the peace in each organized township, not exceeding four, as may be prescribed by law. They shall be elected by the qualified electors of the township, and shall hold their offices for four years, and until their successors are elected and qualified. They shall have such criminal and civil jurisdiction, and perform such duties, as may be prescribed by law. At their first election in any township, they shall be classified by law in such manner that one justice shall be elected annually in each township thereafter. The legislature may increase the number of justices in cities.

Sec. 22. Judges of the Supreme Court, circuit judges and justices of the peace shall be conservators of the peace within their respective jurisdictions.

Sec. 23. The first election of the judges of the Supreme Court and judges of the Circuit Courts, shall be held on the first Monday in April, 1851, and for the election of judges of Probate Courts on the first Monday of April, 1853; and every two years thereafter, an election shall be held for one judge of the Supreme Court, and every sixth year thereafter, for judges of the Circuit Courts, and every fourth year thereafter, for judges of probate in such counties as by law are required to elect such judge of probate. Whenever an additional circuit is created, such provisions may be made as to hold the subsequent election of such additional judge at the regular elections herein provided.

Sec. 24. The removal of a judge beyond the limits of the jurisdiction for which he was elected, or of a justice of the peace beyond the limits of the township in which he was elected, shall vacate his office.

Sec. 25. The style of all process shall be: "In the name of the people of the State of Michigan." All indictments shall conclude: "against the peace of the people of the State of Michigan."

Which was read the first and second time, referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

Mr. WHIPPLE, from the committee on the executive department, to whom was referred the article entitled "Executive Department," with instructions "to inquire into the expediency of so amending said article as to provide for the election of Speaker of the House of Representatives by the people," reported the same back, deeming such a provision inexpedient.

The report was accepted, the committee discharged, and the report was agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Bartow, Ammon Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Eastman, Fralick, Gibson, Hanscom, Harvey, Mowry, N. Pierce, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Walker, Whipple, President—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Baggs, Britain, Asahel Brown, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hart, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Newberry, Orr, Roberts, Robertson, Storey, Warden, Williams, Woodman—20.

Mr. EASTMAN called up his motion to reconsider the vote by which the article entitled "County Officers and County Governments" was passed.

Mr. E. said—I had, sir, intended to ask a recommitment of the article when it was taken up for its passage, and which, I believe, was well understood by my friend on my left, my colleague, the honorable chairman [Mr. RIX ROBINSON] who reported the article, and who, of course, has taken a very deep interest in the speedy progress of it, who anticipated my intentions by instantly springing the guillotine that cuts off the organs of speech, the previous question. I might have begged his indulgence to withdraw a moment, in courtesy; but divining the whole movement, about in its true light, I chose to throw myself upon the indulgence of the Convention by a motion to reconsider.

I have been honored with a personal acquaintance with the honorable Chairman, my colleague, for fifteen years—have known him while in the discharge of the many, arduous, high and important posts of public trusts lavished on him by a confiding constituency. In his private walk I have had occasion to know him intimately, and am ready to confess, sir, that I have been and am now proud to claim him among my warmest personal friends. I have esteemed him as one of the noblest works of God, and have universally spoken of him as such—a gentleman of wisdom, honest integrity in all his relations in life as far as the frailty of even the best specimens of self-loving humanity will admit. I am sincere, truly so, in awarding these best of qualities to my friend, the honorable Chairman; and I really hope, sir, that this particular section nine in this act, reported by him, was engrafted there with no other view than to subserve the public weal. I should be truly sorry to have reason to think it had been so engrafted, so industriously fostered, carefully watched, and so suddenly sprung under the protection of the previous question by my friend from any other motives than such as have usually characterized his actions for disinterestedness and the promotion of the public good. I should be very sorry, sir, extremely sorry, to have the least occasion to think otherwise. I am sure he has in all things heretofore, like Cæsar's wife, stood above suspicion in my humble estimation. But, sir, in this single instance, there is a little mist hanging about my vision.

However, I do wish this particular section nine, relating to the removal of county seats, could be stricken out, or modified into some shape more unexceptionable than it now is. It has seemed to me that a portion of the members of this Convention have not duly considered its effect upon those counties where candor and common consent dictate that the present location is out of place—where a change of location is evidently called for. I can readily conceive that members coming from counties where their sites are desirably established, central or far aside, may be inclined to give an indifferent or an ardent support to this section, according to circumstances. I could instance several examples within my information, where we should expect gentlemen residing at or interested in valuable property in and about these sites that are situated on the extreme verge of counties, might naturally see nothing wrong in the provisions of this section, but might even ardently advocate that no site, when once established, should ever be removed.

Others may feel very indifferent. The site in their county is centrally situated—every body is satisfied; and they may not see any harm in putting the matter at rest. There has been so much agitation, and it has cost so much, that it is better to “put on the screws,” and silence the business at once. This may seem very plausible, but will it stop agitation? Will it gag the oppressed into silence? Figure to yourselves a site on the extreme verge of a county, twenty miles from the centre, settled through its whole extent. Those in one half of the territorial limits are obliged to travel from one to twenty miles extra, every time they have occasion to visit their capital. This is no fiction. Sir, I am one of the number that now feels the reality of such a situation at present, and doomed to all future time to pay the penalty, if this section remains unmodified. I know of other counties similarly circumstanced, but the sufferers in this matter do not happen to have their advocates on this floor, I believe. It will be said, no doubt, why not remove the site, if it is so one-sided, so very onerous and oppressive to such a large portion of the people? Perhaps it may be removed in some very extreme cases. The official corps—the men of leisure and wealth—the business influence, with all the power that can be brought to bear within the sphere of one of these cat boils on the body politic of counties, (I think it was Jefferson that denominated cities as the sores of the nation,) together with all the competition and jealousy that will spring up or be fomented among the claimants around the central region, may not be sufficient in extreme cases to prevent a removal, where, perhaps, four-fifths of the people are sufferers. But, sir, with the odds enumerated, always in favor of the old location, it would be almost beyond hope to remove a site under any circumstances, even with a majority vote in favor of it.

I attempted to show, on a former day, that from the manner in which the new counties would settle upon the border first, their sites would almost unavoidably be aside from the proper place in after time. And I would ask—and seriously ask—if it be the design of this Convention to chain down, for all time to come, the people of all those counties under the tyranny of this iron rule, deliver over by this fundamental Mede and Persian decree, two-thirds of the otherwise noble, independent yeomanry of these counties into the power of the one-third, constituted of the officials, with their retainers, that usually hover about these notable spots? Why not let the people, a majority of the people, govern themselves? What is there in this that we should infringe upon the first principles, the very spirit and essence of our free institutions? I have been always taught to believe that, in matters of common interest, a majority should always control—should always govern. I have yet to learn that any greater number is requisite, except in the grant of special privileges, money making corporations, and other exclusive favors. In all the counties all the people are on a common level, every one of them has an equal interest, a common interest in the location of their county site, and consequently should not be debarred from an equal voice in its location or relocation. Any other rule must then be esteemed unjust, anti-republican and tyrannical. Suppose every surveyed township in a county has its supervisor; a majority of the board—all other things being equal—would locate the site near the centre, geographically, but if the electors were largely to one side, whose approval must be had, there must be a compromise; it would be fixed nearer toward the populous centre; and this would be right enough for the time being. A majority of the board and a majority of the electors would be most likely to do right in the case. But I do think that the introduction of disinterested men to simply select the best point, to be confirmed or rejected by the people, is the better rule. I need not say more as it regards the right and equity of this matter—this is apparent. But, sir, is it good policy in us to make all the laws, tie up the hands of all future Legislatures, under the seeming impression that we alone are the people, and that all wisdom will die with us? Shall we not trust something to those who may come after us? Our doings are designed to be almost immutable landmarks—fundamental axioms. Should we not be very careful that we do not legislate too much—that we do not undertake to impose general rules without sufficient knowledge of local bearings? This has been often remarked on this floor by the best talent here, while considering other subjects. Many other points that we have introduced into our new code will invite opposition. Perhaps a large majority of the people might acquiesce in this section as it stands. It may suit their interests; and if it do so, I believe they can very readily be reconciled to its justice and equity. But, sir, I speak advisedly when I say many votes will be given adversely to our whole code, whatever else of good it may contain, if this section is retained entire. For one, I should be glad to give my vote for it; and with this section modified or abolished, I see no reason as yet why I might not.

Now, sir, the common complaint among our common constituency is, that we are doing too much, spending too much time in legislating; they beg of us to make such amendments as were obvious and called for. Such as in the main we have made; leave the details for their special agents to attend to hereafter, from time to time, and finish up and come home, and not assume to act upon subjects that have not been canvassed by them; those that have not been agitated or considered, and upon which their wishes have not been expressed. But, sir, is not this just one of those subjects that have not been generally discussed, as it regards the propriety of its being among our fixed laws? It seems to me it is—that it is preposterous to attempt to impose this cardinal rule, immutably to bind and govern, and apply to all the changes and the invisible varying circumstances incident to our yet wild, but rapidly populating border regions. I think we should avoid every stringent rule that will endanger or jeopardize the rights or equal privileges of any of our constituents. I can see no such danger in omitting this section altogether; very far from that; but if retained, it might go far to secure the interests of some, and operate as a perpetual burthen on the just rights and equal privileges of many. In fine, sir, the provisions of this section (9) in this article, are truly despotic; just the spirit of monarchial governments—gag down the people, silence the masses; let the few who enjoy the advantage of power, control the many.

Mr. RIX ROBINSON—I rise merely to reply to the statement made by the gentleman near me, my colleague, in regard to my having sprung the previous question on him; it is unfounded and untrue. He was sitting beside me when I moved the previous question; and if he had intimated to me that he did not desire me to make that motion, I would not have made it. The article was not arranged by me, but by a gentleman in the committee over which I had the honor to preside. I feel deep regret that my colleague should have made the charge against me which he has made.

Mr. COMSTOCK observed that this subject had been fully considered heretofore, and he hoped that the matter would not be reconsidered.

Mr. EASTMAN rose to explain in regard to the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. RIX ROBINSON.] He had not conferred with him on the subject. He conversed with his other colleague, who knew, probably, that he [Mr. E.] had a motion to make; and he rose at the same time that his colleague rose to move the previous question. That was put, and therefore cut off all remarks. He had not designed to hurt the gentleman's feelings, for he was certainly a man whom he had the honor to claim as amongst his warmest personal friends.

Mr. RIX ROBINSON observed that the charge was made too direct. The gentleman did not make any motion, nor intimate to him in regard to his [Mr. E.'s] motion.

The yeas and nays being ordered upon the motion to reconsider, were had, and resulted yeas 17, nays 46.

The article entitled "Executive Department" coming up, and the question being, "shall the article now pass?" the yeas and nays were had, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Town, Walker, Warden, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Eastman, Hanscom, McLeod, Roberts, Storey, Whipple, President—8.

So the article was passed, and under the rule referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

The article "Of Elections" coming up on its passage, with the resolution accompanying the same, a division of the question was had, and the article was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield Carr, Choate, Church, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Dimond, Eaton, Gibson, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Soule, Sturgis, Walker, Warden, Williams, President—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Axford, Ammon Brown, Chandler, Comstock, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Leach, Lovell, McLeod, Mowry, Newberry, Prevost, Roberts, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Town, Whipple, Whittemore, Woodman—25.

The resolution was passed by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Town, Walker, Warden, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman, President—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Axford, Bagg, Butterfield, Carr, J. Clark, Hanscom, McLeod, Newberry, Roberts, E. S. Robinson, Storey, Whipple—12.

And the article and resolution were, under the rule, referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

The article entitled "Finance and Taxation" coming up for a third reading,

Mr. FRALICK moved to pass the same over for the day; which was not agreed to.

The article was then read a third time, when

Mr. BAGG moved to recommit the same to the committee on finance and taxation, with instructions to strike from section eleven the words, "except upon property paying specific taxes."

The PRESIDENT called Mr. BUSH to the chair.

Mr. GOODWIN moved the following addition to the instructions proposed by Mr. BAGG:

And also to add to section one the following: "But the legislature may provide that when any private corporations are or shall be, in consideration of specific taxes, exempt by their charters from all other taxation, the counties, towns, cities or villages within which such corporation may hold property which would be taxable if held by other persons, shall be entitled to an equitable proportion of such specific taxes for local purposes."

Mr. G. briefly stated the object he had in view, as embodied in his proposition, and said—The gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] argued very strangely on a previous day, viz: that a town or city within which a railroad enjoyed property for the uses contemplated by the charter, should not be entitled to any portion of the specific tax. He could not see the justice of not permitting towns and cities to receive that benefit from property so enjoyed, that it would from other property situated within their limits. There might be other than rail road charters granted to corporations; there might be canal charters, &c., &c. But not only did that rail road, which had been adverted to in particular, possess the powers usually granted to such corporations, but was also chartered as a navigation company, and was at present running boats worth $200,000 to and from Detroit. They had the powers of a vast navigation company, possessed property to a large amount along the margin of the river, and thus necessarily came into competition with other business in the city. Their property along the river might extend at least a quarter of a mile, or perhaps more; and not only had they store-houses for rail road purposes, but also for their navigation purposes. If it were not then for this provision in the charter of the company, which prohibited all other taxation in consequence of a certain amount being paid to the State, all this property would be subject to local taxation, like all other property possessed and enjoyed within the city limits. If there were justice or propriety in the view taken by the gentleman, in withholding in relation to the upper peninsula, was there not equal justice in withholding a fair proportion of this specific tax for local purposes by the action of the legislature? This was what the amendment aimed at.

Mr. BRITAIN here remarked that he did not understand the subject of the taxation of the upper peninsula to have been definitely disposed of. The matter had merely been deferred until the business of that region of the country would come before the Convention.

Mr. GOODWIN replied that he believed the property of the upper country would be exempted under the general provisions of the article. But it was a matter of equal justice, a matter of right, upon the great principle of equal taxation, that all property, such as that to which he had adverted, should be taxed for local purposes. Was there any reason—was there a particle of justice in saying that a million's or two millions' worth of property situated in the city of Detroit, should be withheld from all local taxation, which if held by a private individual would be subject to taxation? There had been inserted in this article a provision requiring the taxation throughout the State to be equal—we said that the Legislature should provide for an uniform rate of taxation—we established a general principle of equal taxation. Then was not that principle generally applicable? Should it not be applied equally throughout the State? The amendment which he had presented, if adopted, would give efficacy to the principle which had been established, and render consistent the action of the Convention; besides, the question involved was one of mere justice—of equal rights—of uniform taxation.

After some slight conversational discussion, in which Messrs. BRITAIN, COMSTOCK, GOODWIN and HANSCOM participated, the amendment [Mr. BAGG's] was withdrawn.

The question then turned upon the passage of the article, and the yeas and nays being ordered and had thereon, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Chandler, Church, Conner, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Eaton, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lovell, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Town, Walker, Warden, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Bagg, Butterfield, Carr, Choate, Cornell, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Lee, McLeod, Storey, President—12.

So the article was passed, and under the rule referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

The President took the chair.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the article entitled "State Officers" was taken from the table; and the question being on recommitting with instructions, as proposed by Mr. STOREY on the 24th ult.,

Mr. STOREY observed that he had moved to recommit this article with the instructions which he had proposed, for the reason that he was of opinion the officers of the State prison should be elected in the same manner as the other State officers. The plan he proposed was in accordance with the N. Y. system. The section which he sought to have incorporated in the article was copied from the N. Y. constitution. It was the system at present in existence in Connecticut, and in the prisons of many of the other States. Our present prison system he considered a bad one; there was no direct responsibility on the part either of the agents or inspectors. His proposition would have the effect of making them directly responsible.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to amend by further instructing the committee so to amend the article that the Attorney General shall not be required to keep his office at the seat of government; but the motion did not prevail.

A division of the question was had, and the motion to recommit was lost.

Upon the question, "shall the article now pass?" the vote, by yeas and nays, stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Crouse, Conner, Danforth, Daniels, Eastman, Eaton, Gale, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Town, Walker, Warden, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman, President—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, McLeod, Skinner, Storey—7.

So the article was passed, and under the rule referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. WHIPPLE in the chair.

The committee took up for consideration the resolution relative to the sale of ardent spirits.

Mr. EATON moved to strike out the first branch of the resolution.

Mr. E. said the reason he had for making this motion was because the article (the legislative) contained a provision very nearly the same as this resolution.

Mr. ROBERTSON hoped the motion would not prevail. It appeared proper to him that we should submit this question to the people in a separate article. There were many who would oppose it, because they thought it was going to abolish the sale of ardent spirits. Some would oppose it, because it was going to throw open the traffic to all. Others, because they supposed it was going to cut off the whole concern. He was for submitting the matter, then, to the people, for a separate vote. It would be a strenuously contested question. There were objections enough to other parts of the constitution, without mixing it up with this subject; for it was one which undoubtedly would excite a great deal of feeling.

Mr. WALKER trusted that the resolution would not be struck out. Since the introduction of the bill, he had been home to his constituents, and he found it to be the universal opinion of the people that this subject should be submitted for their action, as a separate proposition, and not mixed up with other questions.

Mr. CHURCH—I think the delegate from Wayne is under a misapprehension. It does not by any means follow that the existing license laws are repealed in effect, if the new constitution should be adopted by the people, in the Legislative article of which there is a provision prohibiting the Legislature from passing any other license laws, or passing them hereafter. The license laws now in force were passed by a Legislature entirely competent to pass them, acting within the sphere of their constitutional authority; and those laws are on the statute book, and will remain there, just as the present organization of the grand jury would exist until the Legislature, under the present constitution, made some change. If there be evil in this matter, it is evil wholly; and the existing laws should be made the subject of action, as this resolution proposes. Therefore, I desire to keep the resolution entire, more particularly as to the first branch of it, which has reference to the existing license laws; besides the other reason which members have for retaining it in its integrity. By-and-by we can strike out the provision in the article on the Legislative Department, which has been referred to; and in that place it is, perhaps, obnoxious.

Mr. BAGG—I understand that the resolution which my colleague [Mr. EATON] proposes to strike out, was brought up during my absence. Now, sir, about the 8th of June, being here in this Convention, I offered a resolution on this subject; and about the 21st of the same month it went before a committee. We had the subject up; it was debated, and the committee was almost unanimously in favor of the resolution, which was identically this article now before us. Well, some time after, on the motion of the gentleman who is the father of temperance, all the petitions on this subject of license were referred to a special committee, which was then formed and organized, and its reflective operation upon our previous acts has been treasured up in that committee.

Now, when the subject came up, it was upon the gentleman's motion that the article was struck out in committee of the whole.

Then, sir, we went home to our constituents—we came back “fresh from the people,” and what did we do? We passed upon it and put it into the constitution. It was then reconsidered, or an attempt was made to reconsider, and an attempt made to recommit; and by a dozen of a majority this article was put into our constitution, there to remain. And what has this special committee been doing all the time? They have slumbered and slept—killed time in “thoughtless meditation.” (Laughter.) They have hardly ever had the committee together; and now, at this late day, when we have scarcely a quorum in attendance, they come in and try to override us, after we have established this same provision in the constitution. Yet this is the action of the gentleman and his committee! The mountain has labored, and what has it brought forth? Striking out in the one instance what he labors to re-establish in another. I hope this resolution will be struck out at once. What we have already provided on this subject is sufficient. I have been told by Mr. Baughman, the temperance lecturer, from his pulpit, that a great majority of temperance men—or what I used to call the St. Paul men, (laughter,) were in favor of the provision which we have placed in our constitution. I am willing to go for what I think is right and proper, and what I believe a great majority of the temperance men are in favor of; although the gentleman, [Mr. GARDINER,] a temperance man, obstructed everything we did here. After all, this resolution is a senseless concern; I think it is calculated to raise up prejudices against the constitution. We have done away with what the temperance men desired us to abolish; we have done away with the license laws, and left moral suasion to have its effect. This resolution, however, is calculated to do away with all that; to undo what we have done. If it were in order, I would move to sweep away the whole thing.

Mr. EATON—I have no particular feeling in regard to this matter. I have already stated my reason for moving to strike out. I cannot for the life of me see why we should submit a matter to the people, for them to say if it shall be put in the constitution, when we have got it there already. The gentleman from Kent [Mr.

CHURCH] says that it does not touch license laws that are already passed, but may be applicable to other things. It is to be supposed, however, that the Legislature will adapt the laws to the spirit of the constitution we are making, if it be adopted. I do not see why the laws cannot be made applicable to this provision, as incorporated in our constitution.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—I trust that the first resolution will not be struck out. I believe that this Convention is disposed liberally to place this subject before the people as they desire to have it presented to them. If the temperance people of this State desire anything on this subject at all, it is that it may be presented to them in the form in which the committee have presented it for your action. The gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG,] it is true, may represent a certain portion of the temperance sentiment of the State; but I think he has declared his sentiment and the sincerity of his support of this question, by announcing that he would move to strike out "the whole thing." I speak advisedly when I say that a large portion of the people of the county I in part represent, that is, the entire of the temperance people, are decidedly in favor of having this matter submitted in the form proposed by the committee. They are in favor of the people having an opportunity of expressing their sentiments upon this difficult question. If the majority of the people should decide against it, they are willing that that sentiment should prevail. But they do believe that the people are in favor of the second resolution as proposed here.

But there are other reasons why it should not be stricken out here, and some why it should in the legislative article; they are sufficiently obvious, however, and do not require to be detailed. Put the question, I say, as the people desire it to be put—let it go to the people as they wish. Let them say whether they would prefer to abide by the existing laws, or prohibit all licenses, and thereby the traffic in ardent spirits.

In regard to the second resolution, I would remark this in reference to the sentiment therein embraced: I understand the sentiment of the temperance community in this State to be this: that the traffic in liquor, as a drink or beverage, is wrong; if it be a poison, that it should be placed upon the same footing that other poisons are placed. If there be danger attendant on the use of liquors, as is admitted by a large majority of the people, then they ask that it may be placed in the same category with other deadly poisons—that it be placed upon the druggists' shelf, side by side with hemlock and prussic acid. I will say, in conclusion, that this resolution is in entire accordance with the sentiments and wishes of the public, so far as indicated by the prayer of the various petitions presented here upon this subject.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I wish to ask the chairman of the select committee [Mr. GARDINER] a question. In the legislative article we adopted a provision prohibiting the Legislature from passing any laws for granting licenses for the traffic in ardent spirits: well, what I want to know is, if that be not what the petitioners on this subject asked, so far as that question is concerned?

Mr. GARDINER—Some of them asked for that?

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—Did not a majority ask for that one thing?

Mr. GARDINER—They asked for an abolition of the license laws. I consider that the provision in the article on the legislative department does not do that.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—During the adjournment, some of the Sons of Temperance and the officers of that organization, came to me and said they wished that to be inserted into the constitution; and the other question they were willing should be submitted in a distinct form to be voted upon by the people. So far, then, as I understand public opinion in my county, I find that both parties, and all parties, are willing to have the license question determined in the constitution, and the other question submitted to a separate vote. That is the reason I voted for the adoption of the provision in the legislative article.

Mr. GARDINER—In reply to what the gentleman says respecting the wishes of the Sons of Temperance, I will tell the gentleman that, so far as my action has been concerned on this subject, I act under the immediate instructions of the Grand Division of the State of Michigan.

At the last meeting of the Grand Division, held in Detroit, it was resolved, and urged upon us not to incorporate this principle in the body of the constitution, least it might endanger the adoption of the instrument by the people. Under these instructions I have acted from the commencement of this matter.

I will remark, in answer to the statement made by the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG,] that I came here to urge this matter on the Convention when there is not a quorum present—in reply, I say, it was without my volition that this matter was now brought forward. The gentleman himself pledged me that he would go for submitting the question to the people. See how he has redeemed that pledge! I have nothing more to say on the subject. I have submitted the matter to the Convention, and I hope they will lay it before the people. There is one thing it will do. If, as has been argued, the people be not prepared to adopt this resolution, the submission of it, together with the second article, will quiet the clamors on the subject that have been rung through the State from year to year. If it be once submitted to the people, and they say “no,” the temperance men will rest content under that decision. Why not gratify them by letting them have a vote upon the matter? I hope, then, that they will be gratified in this particular—it is all they ask.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I would ask the chairman of the committee on the legislative department, if that article did not abolish the license laws in this State?

Mr. McCLELLAND—I would answer that question by reading that part of the article referred to by the gentleman from Wayne—

Mr. BAGG (interposing)—I would answer that it does.

Mr. CHURCH—I would say that it does not.

Mr. BAGG—I am as much of a lawyer—

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I wish, sir, to have this matter arranged in such a manner as will satisfy the temperance people of the State. I am willing to adopt either course in regard to this subject.

Mr. BAGG—When the gentleman [Mr. GARDINER] went against us on the provision in the legislative article—

Mr. GARDINER (interposing)—My name is on the journal in favor of it.

Mr. BAGG—The gentleman moved to strike it out; and it was only by the good sense of the Convention, when a little fuller, that the provision was reinstated. Common sense, now, has something to do with this matter. I stated that I had something to do with this temperance business—that I had a son at the head of one of those temperance lodges. I went home and got some “sentiment” on the subject. Baughman, the temperance lecturer, was here lately, and what does he say? He says we are right; and he may be supposed to be somewhat of a judge in regard to this subject—he speaks ex cathedra. It will be remembered, too, that I made an appeal to the St. Paul men; and the provision would never have been passed, except for the men who sometimes take a little “for the stomach’s sake.” (Laughter.) And they are the men, sir, the better qualified to give an expression of the public sentiment than the extreme drunkard on the one hand, or the ultra temperance man upon the other.

I shall say but little in regard to the second resolution. It appears to me, however, that it will make as much excitement and will tend to hurt the temperance cause almost as much, for the first year or two, as what we have done, will help it, by removing the barrier to moral suasion. The first resolution will be struck out at once—no mistake about that.

Mr. FRALICK—What are we doing here? We are trying to revise the constitution; to render it better adapted to the interests of the people than it is at present. I am not in favor of putting any provision in it that will tend to excite any amount of feeling, or would dispose the people to go against the constitution. I am in favor of having this question submitted to the people separately, in the form here indicated. I think that when we shall have completed our labors here, we will have enough of matters in the instrument to excite opposition to its adoption. I hope the resolutions will be adopted, and the provision in the legislative article struck out, for the reason that by that means the question will be settled on its own merits.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I had supposed this subject had been amply discussed heretofore; and that the committee was ready to decide what disposition to make of it.

agree with an old man I once heard of in N. Y.; on being asked to subscribe for a grave yard—"no," says he, "I won't subscribe a cent. If there is anything in this world I detest, it is a grave yard." So, if there is anything in this world I detest, it is the grog question in elections. In regard to the resolutions, I am as much opposed to the latter portion as the other. Passing over the phraseology, which is defective, (for instead of "mechanical, medicinal and chemical purposes," it should read "scientific and medicinal purposes,") I have objections to the creation of any laws by the Legislature, authorizing any set of men to sell liquor, to the exclusion of others, for medicinal, chemical and mechanical purposes. Why, every body knows—every man here knows that every drug store and shop in his village would be turned into grog shops. The stuff would be sold as freely as ever. It would be a perfect "striped pig" operation.

I hope these resolutions will fail, for they would bring this whole question to the polls, when the people have the grave question before them of the adoption of the constitution. But let the section relative to the abolition of the license system stand, and there need be no agitation. As I understand the matter, the Convention passed that section for these reasons: If it were a reputable business let all pursue it. If otherwise, why should the treasury be replenished by the wages of sin? Let not the State descend from its dignity to the pitiful level of taking five dollars per man for the pursuit of a trade it condemns by the very act. Again, it is proved clear enough that such laws are generally a dead letter, not half the time operative. Why allow your Legislature then to pass laws which are partial or dead letters? Is it not a kind of foolery? But the agitation at the polls of the question "license" and "no license," creates ill feeling; and often a bitter animosity, hostile to the peace of the community. Why throw this fire-brand into elections? The enactment of this section seems to be talked of as though an encroachment on men's rights. Not at all. It determines what the Legislature shall not do; as in case of lotteries, it forbids them. It seems license laws are an anomaly—no other trade pays a penalty or a bribe for the exercise of it. Why should this? unless it is done to provide for the mischief it causes; which it can never do. I hope then, as a question of political economy, as well as on the score of expediency and justice, the section will be adhered to, and these resolutions not brought into the election.

Mr. N. PIERCE was willing to adopt the legislative article as it at present stood, or to adopt the resolution, and strike out the section referred to in the article; he did not care which course was pursued.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the committee rose and reported the resolution without amendment.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved that the Convention adjourn; which was not agreed to.

Mr. EATON moved to strike out the first branch of the resolution.

Several members here endeavored to catch the President's eye, among them Mr. BRITAIN and others.

The previous question, however, was moved, and being sustained, the main question was ordered to be now put, and the yeas and nays being ordered and had, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Carr, Chandler, Eaton, Gaie, Hanscom, Hart, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Soule, Sturgis, Town, Warden, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman—27.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Arzeno, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Eastman, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Mosher, N. Pierce, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Walker, Whipple, President—33.

When Mr. BRITAIN's name was called, he said: I do not desire, sir, to be driven into voting on two or three principles; particularly as I had not an opportunity of expressing my opinions. I addressed the chair in a manner loud enough to be heard at the Ohio House. The Convention may excuse me as it may see fit.

Mr. WHIPPLE would assure his colleague that he did not hear him when he was in the chair in committee of the whole.

Mr. BRITAIN—I endeavored several times to catch the attention of the chair.

The PRESIDENT—I did not perceive the gentleman on the floor.

It was then moved that Mr. BRITAIN be excused from voting; which was not agreed to.

Mr. GALE suggested that the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] be allowed to explain for one hour. (A laugh.)

Mr. ALVORD observed that three hours would be better.

A MEMBER—Until 8 o'clock this evening. (Loud Laughter.)

When Mr. BRITAIN's name was again called, he said he could not conscientiously vote, as he was not allowed to give his reasons.

The motion to strike out (Mr. EATON's) was lost, as indicated by the foregoing vote.

Mr. BAGG moved a call of the Convention; but the call was not sustained.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to adjourn; which was lost.

Mr. GALE moved a call of the Convention; which was not agreed to.

Mr. EATON moved to adjourn; but the motion was lost.

The question being on ordering the resolution to a third reading, the yeas and nays were ordered and resulted—yeas 28, nays 32.

So the Convention refused to order the resolution to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Mr. STOREY offered the following:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted by this Convention on the 4th day of June last, by which the Governor of the State was invited to take a seat within the bar of the Convention during its sittings, be and the same is hereby rescinded.

Mr. S. said—I offer this resolution, sir, for the single and significant reason that I am tired of seeing the Executive of the State and some of the State officers nosing about among the members of the Convention, logrolling with them upon questions which are to come up for action here. The practice has become too palpable and too obnoxious to be longer overlooked. Hardly a day passes that something of this kind is not observable here; and I offer this resolution in good faith, hoping that even though it be not adopted, it will have the effect to abate a nuisance which has become insufferable.

Mr. McLEOD—I rise to say one word on the subject. I opposed the resolution inviting the Executive to take a seat on this floor, at the time of its adoption, and it has been a source of nuisance since. It is enough for us to be under the influence of demagoguism one-half the time, without having the adventitious influence of the State officers brought to bear upon us, as has been the case.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I am very glad to hear the repentant brethren make this confession. The influence of the Executive has never been brought to bear upon me; nor did the Treasurer, when I wanted to get some money, tell me in what way I ought to vote, (Laughter.) I should like that the gentlemen who have been controlled, would tell how they were influenced. I am always glad to see the Executive officers within the bar of the House. I did not vote on the resolution, but I am glad to see the Governor here at all times. I am glad to see members getting up and confessing their sins, though I must say that I am surprised that any member of the Convention should propose such a resolution. I suppose it is offered because we fixed the items of the article passed this morning. I voted for some of them, although I did not approve of them. I do not suppose the Executive had any thing to do with the passage of these matters.

Mr. LEACH—It is but a short time since the gentlemen from Jackson and Mackinac [Messrs. STORER and McLEOD] were extolling the Governor as a man of ability and integrity, on this floor. I am willing that the Governor should have a seat here; and if he did influence gentlemen in their votes, perhaps it would not be injurious.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. BAGG said he was happy to think the resolution just offered by the gentleman from Jackson, [Mr. STORER,] came from the very source it did. It was just the quarter of all others, from which it might have been anticipated. No other person of either party in this Convention, could have been stimulated by passion, or otherwise, to have offered it. As it was, it not only fell harmless at the Governor's feet, but added another laurel to his brow.

Mr. McLEOD—I am one of those who cannot be deterred from saying what is right, by the broad-sides of the majority. I have no doubt but that the resolution will be voted down; however, I desire that my sentiments should go on record, in regard to any influence being exercised upon me in my votes. I have experienced no annoyance from executive or other illegitimate influence whatever. The resolution asking the Governor to take a seat within the bar, seemed to be entirely a matter of taste. I was sorry to see that resolution offered at all; and I am sorry that it has remained in force so long. I would say to the last speaker that there is such a thing as despicable toadyism—a contemptible lick-spittleism—if it be a parliamentary term. And I would say to the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. N. PIERCE,] that the reason why he was not subjected to this influence (I suppose he was correct in saying that) is, because there are somethings so worthless as not to justify any interference at all.

Mr. BAGG, (replying.)—Although he might be guilty of what the gentleman from Mackinac charged him with, he would inform that gentleman that he possessed another talent in his youth, which was somewhat prominent in his character—that of portrait painting, orally and by pen and pencil. He could not only draw from nature, but also from habits, and exhibit in bold relief. The gentleman from Mackinaw had been profuse in his personalities towards himself, whenever he had been able to attend the sittings of the Convention, from his numerous catalogue of ailments; and he would now inform that gentleman that, should these personalities be again repeated, he should fearlessly draw his character to the letter, to the life—aye, to the death—and exhibit him to public gaze, as his conduct and character justly merited.

Mr. HANSCOM withdrew his motion, and the resolution was,

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. WHIPPLE, the Convention resolved itself into a committee of the whole upon the general order, Mr. HANSCOM in the chair.

The committee rose without transacting any business.

Mr. CHURCH, from the committee on the judiciary, reported back the article entitled "Judicial Department," amended so as to read:

ARTICLE —.

Judicial Department.

Sec. 1. The judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court, in Circuit Courts, in Probate Courts, and in justices of the peace. Inferior local courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction may be established by the Legislature in cities.

Sec. 2. For the term of six years, and thereafter, until the Legislature shall otherwise provide, the judges of the several Circuit Courts shall be judges of the Supreme Court, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, and a concurrence of three shall be necessary to a decision. The Legislature shall have power, if they should think expedient and necessary, to provide by law for the organization of a separate Supreme Court, with the jurisdiction and powers prescribed in this constitution, to consist of one chief justice and two associate justices, to be elected by the qualified electors of the State. The separate court, when so organized, shall not be changed or discontinued by the Legislature for eight years after its organization. The judges thereof shall be so classified that but one of them shall go out of office at the same time, and their term of office shall be the same as is provided for the judges of the Circuit Court.

Sec. 3. The Supreme Court shall have a general superintending control over all inferior courts, and shall have power to issue writs of error, habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, and other original and remedial writs, and to hear and determine the same. In all other cases it shall have appellate jurisdiction only.

Sec. 4. Four terms of the Supreme Court shall be held annually at such times and places as may be designated by said circuit judges.

Sec. 5. The Supreme Court shall have power, by general rules, to establish, mod-fy and amend the practice in said court and in the Circuit Courts.

Sec. 6. The State shall be divided into eight judicial circuits, in each of which one circuit judge shall reside after the election, who shall hold his office for the term of six years and until his successor is elected and qualified.

Sec. 7. The Legislature may alter the limits of circuits, or increase the number of the same. No alteration or increase shall have the effect to remove a judge from office. In every additional circuit established, the judge shall be elected by the qualified electors of this State, and his term of office shall continue as provided in this constitution for judges of the Circuit Court.

Sec. 8. The Circuit Courts shall have original jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal, not excepted in this constitution, and not prohibited by law; and appellate jurisdiction from all inferior courts and tribunals, and a supervisory control of the same. They shall also have power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari and other writs necessary to carry into effect their orders, judgments and decrees, and give them a general control over inferior courts and tribunals within their respective jurisdictions.

Sec. 9. Each of the judges of the Circuit Courts shall receive a salary, payable quarterly. They shall receive no fees or perquisites of office, or other compensation; and shall hold no other office of trust or profit during the term for which they are elected. All votes for either of them, for any office other than the one held by them, given either by the Legislature or the people, shall be void.

Sec. 10. The Supreme Court may appoint a reporter of its decisions. The judges of the Circuit Courts, within their respective jurisdiction, may fill vacancies in the office of county clerk and of prosecuting attorney; but no judge of the Supreme Court or of the Circuit Court shall exercise any other power of appointment to public office.

Sec. 11. A Circuit Court shall be held at least twice in each year in every county organized for judicial purposes. Judges of the Circuit Court may hold courts for each other, and shall do so when required by law.

Sec. 12. The clerk of each county organized for judicial purposes shall be the clerk of the Circuit Court of such county, and of the Supreme Court when held within the same.

Sec. 13. In each of the counties organized for judicial purposes, there shall be a court of probate. The judge of such court shall be elected by the qualified electors of the county in which he resides, and shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor is elected and qualified. The jurisdiction, powers and duties of such court shall be prescribed by law.

Sec. 14. When a vacancy occurs in the office of judge of the Supreme Court, Circuit Court or Probate Court, such vacancy shall be filled by appointment of the governor, which shall continue until a successor is elected and qualified; and when elected, such successor shall hold his office the residue of the unexpired term.

Sec. 15. The Supreme Court, the Circuit and Probate Courts of each county shall be courts of record, and shall each have a common seal.

Sec. 16. The Legislature may provide by law for the election of one or more persons in each organized county, who may be vested with such judicial powers as the Legislature may prescribe. And the Legislature may authorize the judges of probate of the several counties to hold one or more terms of the Circuit Court in their respective counties, in addition to the terms required to be held by the circuit judge, and in the absence of such circuit judge; and may also confer upon the judges of probate judicial powers in special cases, and such as are usually exercised by a judge of the Supreme and Circuit Courts at chambers.

Sec. 17. There shall be four justices of the peace in each organized township. They shall be elected by the qualified electors of the township, and shall hold their offices for four years, and until their successors are elected and qualified. They shall have such criminal and civil jurisdiction, and perform such duties as may be prescribed by law. At their first election in any township, they shall be classified by law in such manner that one justice shall be elected annually in each township thereafter. The legislature may increase the number of justices in cities.

Sec. 18. Judges of the Supreme Court, circuit judges, and justices of the peace, shall be conservators of the peace within their respective jurisdictions.

Sec. 19. The first election of judges of the Supreme Court, and judges of the Circuit and Probate Courts, shall be held on the first Monday in April, 1851; and every two years thereafter, an election shall be held for one judge of the Supreme Court; and every sixth year thereafter, for judges of the Circuit Court; and every fourth year thereafter, for judges of probate. Whenever an additional circuit is created, such provision may be made as to hold the subsequent election of such additional judge at the regular elections herein provided.

Sec. 20. The removal of a judge beyond the limits of the jurisdiction for which he was elected, or of a justice of the peace beyond the limits of the township in which he was elected, shall vacate his office.

Sec. 21. The style of all process shall be: "In the name of the people of the State of Michigan." All indictments shall conclude: "against the peace of the people of the State of Michigan."

The article was laid upon the table and ordered printed.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON,

Resolved, That each article of this constitution, as passed and referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology, be printed for the use of this Convention; and

Resolved, That said committee be and they are hereby instructed to prepare a fair copy of each article, as amended by them, and procure the same to be printed before making their report.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the article entitled "Education" was taken up.

The question being upon concurring in the amendments made in committee of the whole, section 1, as amended, was agreed to.

Section 3, as amended, was then read.

The question being on agreeing to the amendment,

Mr. GREEN moved to amend the original section by striking out all to and inclusive of the word "respectively," in the sixth line, and substituting as follows:

"Each of the cities and townships of this State shall, in the year ———, and in each and every year thereafter, raise by tax upon the real and personal estate in such cities and townships respectively, a sum equal to —, for each and every person residing in said cities and townships between the ages of four and eighteen years, as shall appear by the returns of the school districts therein; which sum, together with the money apportioned to each of such cities and townships from the interest of the primary school fund, shall be apportioned pro rata among the several school districts therein, according to the number of persons between the ages of four and eighteen years, residing in each, as shall appear by the last annual reports of such districts, to be used by them in payment of teachers' wages therein. The amount so to be raised may be increased or diminished by the Legislature as they may deem right and proper; but such increase or diminution shall not exceed — cents per scholar, as above named, at any one session of the Legislature."

Mr. GREEN said he did not desire to prolong the discussion upon this question. The uniform opposition which all the propositions offered on this subject had received, prevented his supposing that any proposition of his would obtain the unanimous support of the Convention. He thought, however, that his proposition presented advantages over any which had been as yet presented. He was of opinion that this would be better than any other, on account of the inequalities of some of the counties. It appeared to him to be unjust, where the authorities of a town had a right to make those districts as small as they pleased, and to give such salaries as they saw fit, to require another district to raise a sum, without reference to the size of the district. It would be better, he thought, to levy the sum upon the scholars. They would know when they employed teachers how many they would have to teach, and calculate their expenses accordingly. There would be then all the inducement possible for them to make their money go as far as they could. Small districts would be induced to alter their boundaries, so as to embrace more territory. He had objections to the article as amended; in fact certain persons would be excluded from the schools—those who were under four and over eighteen years of age. Such a provision would be very unwise. It sometimes happened that persons over eighteen desired to attend school. As to those under four, it was often very desirable to send them to school.

Mr. N. PIERCE observed that it seemed to him there was some difficulty about the proposition, [Mr. GREEN'S.] The gentleman preferred collecting the tax in towns. He altogether preferred collecting the tax in the whole State; for, some towns would not have the same proportion in regard to the amount of scholars to be educated, as others; the tax then would be unequal throughout the State. The article as amended would suit him very well, if the words "between the ages of four and eighteen years" were struck out, and the words "that all children or persons attending schools" were inserted. This, he would much prefer to the proposition offered by the gentleman; but if the Convention should otherwise decide, he was content.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the amendment reported from the committee of the whole would not be agreed to. He was willing to lay down by constitutional provision some broad principle, so that the Legislature would have only to go on and establish this system at a subsequent period. It would be better, in his judgment, to leave the whole matter with the Legislature. They could try one mode of taxation or another. He was willing that the subject should be left for them to act upon as in their wisdom they saw proper.

Mr. GREEN had intended to have said, when up, that he was willing to leave the matter to the Legislature; that would be his choice, and was, in his opinion, the best course to be pursued.

Mr. GREEN'S amendment was not adopted.

Mr. LEACH moved to amend the substitute reported by the committee by striking not of lines three and four, the words "not exceeding two mills upon the dollar;" which was disagreed to.

Mr. GALE offered the following as a substitute for the one reported by the committee.

"The Legislature shall establish and provide for a system of primary schools within five years from the adoption of this constitution, in which the instruction shall be conducted in the English language; and as nearly free to all scholars residing in the several districts as may be deemed practicable."

Mr. LEACH moved to amend by striking out "five" and inserting "two;" which was lost.

Mr. GALE—As the matter now stands, it is carried out too much in detail, yet it does not carry out what it bears upon the face of it. It declares that these schools shall be free schools; let any man carry it out in figures, and he will find it is no such case. He may calculate upon the taxable property of the State, and upon his two mills on the dollar, and yet he cannot carry out his free schools. It ought to be a little practicable; but it is entirely impracticable now. Take, for instance, a school of fifteen pupils—there are many that have but that number, and some as low as eight or ten—it is necessary they should be formed into a district, or else they cannot get an education; the settlements are so sparse that they cannot have a great number of scholars attending, on account of the distance they have to go to school; and they would have but $12 75 to sustain their school for three months! The whole thing appears to me to be entirely impracticable. I think it would be entirely the better course to leave the matter in the hands of the Legislature. Again, it is highly impolitic that we should inflict the system of free schools on the State without having investigated the whole matter, and knowing what it would be in its practical details.

Mr. WALKER observed that these schools were not to be supported, according to the provision of the section, merely by a tax of two mills. The mode of taxation was optional, either by the two mills, or by a town tax, or by both.

The amendment presented by the gentleman from Genesee, [Mr. GALE,] was not adopted.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following substitute for the one proposed by the committee:

"The Legislature shall, within five years from the adoption of this constitution, provide for and establish a system of primary schools, by which such schools shall be kept free and without charge for tuition, for at least three months in the year, in each school district within the State."

Mr. WOODMAN moved to strike out "three months," and insert "four months;" also strike out "five years," and insert "three years."

A division was had, and the first branch of the amendment was lost.

The second proposition was also disagreed to, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Chandler, Choate, Conner, Cornell, Daniels, Eastman, Gale, Green, Hart, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Mowry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Robertson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Walker, Warden, Webster, Williams, Woodman—31.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Church, Comstock, Crouse, Danforth, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Newberry, N. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Town, President—32.

The substitute offered by Mr. HANSCOM was negatived.

Mr. BAGG offered the following as a substitute, which was rejected:

"The Legislature shall establish a uniform system of primary schools throughout this State, by levying a State tax upon the taxable property of this State."

The substitute reported by the committee of the whole for section 3 was then concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to amend section ten, by adding:

"The said school and farm shall be under the superintendence of the Regents of the University, who may locate the same on any of the University land which they may appropriate for that purpose, not exceeding 640 acres, or on any land donated for the purpose; and it shall be a branch of the University for instruction in agriculture and the natural sciences connected therewith."

And said:—It may not be obvious why I have offered the amendment. I will briefly, therefore, explain. Placing the institution in question under the board of regents obviates the necessity of creating a new board. My principal reason is, however, to connect the School with the University as a branch, in order that the school, which may be illy supplied with professors, may avail itself of those provided and paid for by the University. The professors of the natural sciences and the professor of anatomy and physiology can deliver full courses of lectures to the proposed school, with very little additional cost. It is to gain this great advantage that I want the disposition of the whole subject as contemplated by the amendment. It will be a responsible trust. The funds may be large, the experiment is new, and I know of no more fit repository of the trust than the regents, highly fitted as I believe they must necessarily be.

Mr. McCLELLAND was somewhat in favor of the experiment of a model farm. But he would submit it to the Convention to say if it were proper to bind up those lands so that if this experiment failed, or the people became entirely dissatisfied with it, they were to be bound hand and foot in regard to the disposition of these lands. He did not like the idea of so fixing these twenty-two sections of salt spring lands, as to take them out of the hands of the people entirely, and place them beyond the action of the legislature in any contingency. He would therefore vote against the amendment.

Mr. WALKER observed that, instead of twenty-two sections, there were but about 2000 acres of unappropriated salt lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I went to the land office in order to ascertain the facts relative to these salt lands, and there learned that the whole number of acres granted us by the general government was seventy-two sections; but we never received but 45,345 acres; being 735 acres less than 72 whole sections. Of these lands, fifty sections have been appropriated to the deaf, dumb and blind asylum, the insane asylum and the Normal school—equal to 32,000 acres; thus leaving, in fact, applicable to this subject, (acres,) 13,345

Of this quantity has been sold, (acres,) 3721

The gen'l gov't has disposed of, which must be re-granted by gov't, 7680
Leaving unsold in office, 1944—13,345

The quantity sold by the State has brought the sum of $16,273 25

One quarter having been paid in hand. The balance (9,624 acres) should yield $4 per acre, if sold at the minimum valuation, 38,496 00

$54,769 25

The gross fund, therefore, if all the lands were sold, would amount to $54,769 25;—a sum fully adequate to establish on a stable and respectable basis the institution contemplated.

The gentleman from Monroe talks about the failure of the school, and therefore thinks the fund should not be inviolably and unchangeably devoted to the object. It is for fear of failure that I would have them thus devoted. Why fail? Prosecute it to success. Instruction, calculated to educe larger crops from the earth, and to promote the health, growth and development of all the earth produces, ought not to fail. If our first attempts fail, let us try again. It is an object worthy of attempts till we are successful.

Mr. McCLELLAND would go as far as the farthest to encourage agriculture, in all its different forms; but he did not place that confidence in this kind of a school that the gentleman [Mr. WILLIAMS] did. They might do as they pleased in regard to this matter, but he was of opinion that whenever such institutions were established by the State, they finally became mere political machines. It was ten times better to give these lands to the farmers of the State, than to the politicians. Still, he was for trying the experiment; however, if it should fail, he desired that the power of disposing of these lands should be with the people.

Mr. CROUSE was opposed to the whole proposition, and would at the proper time move to strike out. He was entirely opposed to submitting the management of this proposed institution to the regents of the University—they might know as much about farming as the man in the moon did about cheese. If we put it under the control of any, let it be under the control of thorough farmers. He was opposed to it on this account, too: it would soon be almost exclusively for the benefit of the sons of gentlemen residing in villages and cities. The farmers' sons would not want to go there, because they could learn all they wanted to learn at home. It would be better to take these lands and apply them to the payment of the State debt.

The question was then taken upon Mr. WILLIAMS' amendment, and was lost.

Mr. WARDEN moved to amend the amendment made in committee by striking out the words "and farm," wherever they occurred.

Mr. N. PIERCE—The subject is one familiar to all here, although not farmers. I am not tenacious whether the amendment made by the committee should prevail or not, or whether the amendment to the amendment should prevail. I think the model farm is only a small part of the matter. I suppose the education is the principal thing on which reliance will be placed. Whether it is rational to apply some of the lands granted by the United States to this State, to this purpose, is a matter for the consideration of this Convention. It seems to me that the agricultural population have as much right to have a share in the education of the State as any other branch of the people; and I think it fair to apply the public funds to some extent to that purpose. But it will be an experimental matter. I know it is thought by many people that the State is rich. I think she is poor; and I think her burthens will be very heavy for the next ten years. I am not disposed, then, to take the revenues of the State and apply them unreasonably to any experimental matter whatever. If the Convention do not think it consistent with the present policy of the State, they should not take these lands for this purpose; we ought rather to apply them to the reduction of our debt, or to other means of education.

Mr. CORNELL did not know if this were the time at which to start an agricultural school. He was of opinion for many years that at least one quarter of the time was thrown away by reason of our students not being obliged to work at their studies; if they did, they would leave our colleges with stronger constitutions and sounder understandings. Six hours were as many as any man should study in a day. Was it not as well that our students should labor for a certain portion of time, as to be moping and lounging about the streets? What was the consequence of the present system? Men went through their different classes, and when they came out they were broken down in mind and body; and of the principles of the business they embraced, they knew nothing almost. If they were taught to labor, they would turn out something else. Every man should have more or less a practical education. The farmer had no need to know the dead languages; but he might the modern, and the natural sciences. He should be taught everything appertaining to the management of the farm. The gentleman last up did not attach any importance to the model farm—he (Mr. C.) did, for this reason: that when a man studied anything in the laboratory, he would go out with a practical man, and apply the principle which he had previously studied. A man would thus become imbued with a spirit for application of the sciences to agriculture, so that in after life, when he went upon a farm, he would understand thoroughly the theory and practice of farming. A great deal might be said on this subject; but he would simply say that he considered the model farm of importance, and if any portion of the proposition were retained, that should be.

Mr. BRITAIN thought that the best school in which men learned farming was a practical one. The agricultural school the best adapted for making farmers, was the farm under the direction of the owner, whose interest it was to apply every facility for the better cultivation of his property. He would venture the opinion that if we gave $50,000 to the regents of the University, or three other men, that farm would never be carried on as well as if it had received no government sustenance.

If the University was so fixed as to have the mechanical labor system connected with it, he would readily approve of it. But that was out of the question. If it should happen that the farm were located at some place far away from the University, the pupils would lose the advantages pointed out by the gentleman from Jackson, [Mr. CORNELL.] He could not see how we were to attach a model farm to the University. Let farmers be taught geology, chemistry, &c., &c., and then go home and apply that knowledge. But he should like to know what farmer would think of sending his son abroad to be taught how to plow, reap, or sow, or to do anything connected with a farm in that way? He would venture to say that any practical farmer could teach these, or any professors, in everything relating to a farm. As to the benefits resulting from this proposition, he was entirely in the dark.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I am somewhat surprised at the remarks made, especially by the gentleman from Livingston, [Mr. CROUSE.] He has thrown out a kind of stuff that this would be a school for rich men's sons. Now, the design is exactly contrary. It is to take those who are certain to be skilled in manual labor, and teach them the general laws by which every thing grows and thrives; to illustrate to them, by practice, the newest discoveries in agriculture; to open their minds to the reception of every useful truth, come from whence it may; and more than all, relieve the young from the thralldom of any traditional errors which may have clung to their fathers from generation to generation. Teach rich men's sons to work! To work with the hoe and the plow! Every boy in this country understands that. But the object of such a school is to teach a man how to promote and protect all his interests. I hardly know how to illustrate the subject. But, suppose the farmers of this State had, by a thorough education of the young wheat growers, increased the value of the wheat one cent per bushel. If we raise 7,000,000 bushels, it would make $70,000. If it could be increased in quantity ten per cent, it would make a difference in the production of the State for a single year, of $500,000. Bring sharpened intellects to every daily pursuit of the farmer, and produce, by the use of study, experiment and science, a corresponding increase of the productions of the State, and the cost of a hundred schools would soon be saved.

There are many branches of study that a farmer's boy ought to know, and which he does not learn in ordinary schools, which are rather calculated to fit a man for the counting room or college. I recollect a short time since, that I saw a man—a respectable and intelligent man—upon the point of losing quite a large sum in a court, because he could not measure wood, piled in the shape of a section of a cone, for a coal pit. A man will find every day, in practical life, that he could save himself from expense and loss of time, if he had a knowledge of such matters. He ought to be familiar with the laws by which mechanical powers are applied. He ought to understand the readiest methods by which measurements of all kinds are made. I will put a case to the gentleman from Livingston: Suppose he and a neighbor had a large bin of wheat to measure, before they could settle or divide. An untaught man might measure it all over, and handle all. His boy, if taught rightly, could, in less than five minutes, calculate from the cubic contents the number of bushels, and save the whole time and expense. These are the kinds of knowledge which he would have every farmer learn while young. But the great advantage of these schools was in the instruction which might be obtained in agricultural chemistry—a knowledge of the elements necessary to each crop; and that knowledge of physiology which would enable a man to propagate with success the finest breed of animals, or bring to the most perfect development, vegetable life. But the five minutes had expired, and he would not encroach on the rule, though he could pile up abundant proofs to show the advantages of such a school.

Mr. CROUSE remarked that he was as anxious as the gentleman [Mr. WILLIAMS] for farmers to have their sons educated. He believed that this article provided for their education, without a model farm. He certainly would be glad for his son to be able to calculate quantities. But, if he had a son who could not calculate the contents of an oat or corn bin, he certainly would sit up with him at night and teach him. He would not send him to a model farm or to the University to learn it. The article made such a provision that every child could be at school three months in every year for fourteen years, or three and a half years in all. He would venture to say that nine-tenths of the people had never been within the walls of a school house for that period. The article also provided that the course of education should be pursued under competent teachers; and altogether it would afford sufficient facilities, under existing circumstances, for the acquisition of a good education.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE concurred very fully with the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] To give a proper direction to knowledge in this department, (agriculture,) was of the utmost importance to mankind; for in fact the entire subsistence of the earth depended on it. Knowledge, and varied knowledge, was highly needed in farming. In Europe they were ahead of us in this respect. The reason was this: they turned their young men to farming, and sent them to farming schools. They raised in Europe as much as from sixty to seventy bushels to the acre; and in some instances we succeeded in doing so in this country.

If the gentleman from Livingston, [Mr. CROUSE,] or any other gentleman, hired a man who had been trained in one of these schools, and set him plowing along side of a man who had not been so educated, he would see that the former did twice the work of the latter. He [Mr. P.] had a man for some time, who had been two years in one of these schools, and in the sowing season he would not have a furrow that was not of equal length with the rest, and all straight.

Mr. ROBERTSON (interposing) inquired in what country in Europe farmers sent their sons to farming schools.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE, in reply, said that in Germany young men were sent to them, and in many parts of Great Britain such schools had been established, supported by private patronage. He saw no difficulty in carrying out the proposition, and would vote for it.

Mr. CORNELL observed it was well understood that when the law was passed establishing the State University, there was provision made for branches thereto and one of them was to be an agricultural branch; the branches had been lopped off, and this proposition was only intended to carry out that provision. The utility of the plan, he thought no man acquainted with farming operations, could for a moment question; and that science should to some extent direct practice, and practice follow its teachings, none would deny. It was not claimed that the professors in this establishment were to be practical farmers; their business would be to show the best mode of applying scientific knowledge to agriculture. He would here refer to one simple matter—he would refer to our manures. Our lands are rich enough without manures now, but the time would come when they would require them. What sort of manure would a farmer apply to his lands unless he knew something of chemistry? If he did not know, he would guess at it. A man might apply a manure containing all the elements sufficient to raise forty bushels to the acre, yet, lacking one other element, it would not produce three bushels. Practical farmers knew that such was the case. He knew an instance of a farmer in North Carolina who had a farm that had been an excellent wheat farm; the quantity of wheat, however, decreased from year to year. The farmer manured his lands with all sorts of manures, but to no purpose. At length the farmers in his neighborhood said he should not sow wheat except once in three years, and they recommended certain descriptions of manure. The farmer, however, got nothing but straw, and about three bushels of wheat. Some of the farmers then recommended him to apply plaster; still he got but three bushels. Then they told him to put on lime and plaster, and still he got no more. Then a committee was appointed to investigate the case, and they finally stated the facts to the editor of an agricultural paper, described the manure applied, and it was found out that the manure lacked but one element, which, if the farmer had gone to the expense of twelve shillings or so, in procuring, he would have had twenty-eight or thirty bushels to the acre. The ingredient wanted was simply phosphoric acid; that which was found in bones. It was so that where a necessary element of a manure was lacking, the farmer received but very little return for his outlay.

Mr. COMSTOCK expressed himself in favor of retaining the provision; he thought it due to the farming community that means for the acquisition of this very useful information should be afforded them.

Mr. CROUSE said it was observed by the gentleman from Calhoun, that they attained to greater perfection in Europe than we did here. In his part of the country there were farmers who had been brought up in England, and for his life he could not see that they were any better farmers than we were, and in some instances they were not as good.

The question was then taken upon Mr. WARDEN'S motion to strike out, and was lost.

The question then recurred upon agreeing to the amendments reported from the committee of the whole.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend by inserting after the word "and," where it first occurred, the words "it shall be competent for the Legislature to appropriate;" and also to strike out "set apart," in the sixth line of the section as amended.

Mr. McC. said his object was to prevent these lands being put beyond the reach of the Legislature, if there should be a failure in the farm. He had great confidence in the scheme, if it did not get into the hands of politicians. We had had a great deal of experience on this subject; for it had been found that wherever collegiate institutions were in the hands of State officers, they had generally become mere political machines, and turned out a failure.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he was opposed to the amendment. He trusted that he duly appreciated the happy faculty, the ingenuity and aptness of the gentleman from Monroe, (whom one of his political friends had pleasantly dubbed "the Earl of Halifax,") in striking between wind and water. But, with due respect, he thought that in this instance he [Mr. McCLELLAND] had struck above the water line. He seemed to be awfully afraid to appropriate these lands inviolably; yet this same article contained two sections, which, by our action, we had just incorporated, as far as we could at this stage of our proceedings, into the constitution. Twenty-five sections of these salt lands, by sections eight and nine, had been created a perpetual and inviolable fund for the support of the State normal school, and for the asylums for the insane, and for deaf mutes, and the blind. If we were satisfied with the expediency and importance of an agricultural school, there were no reasons bearing on the application of the fifty sections, which would not justify us in appropriating the last twenty-two sections, as inviolably as the other fifty.

Mr. McCLELLAND said—The normal school plan has been most fully tested in nearly all the old States of the Union. But gentlemen must admit that in this country at least, this model farm or agricultural school, exclusively agricultural in its character, is an experiment. Well, if it be an experiment, I ask is it judicious or wise in us to bind up forever these salt spring lands? Why does the gentleman mistrust the Legislature? If the people be in favor of appropriating lands for this purpose, the Legislature will act in accordance with their wishes, as a matter of course; and our making this provision will show them what we intend should be done with these lands. But if this experiment should fail, yet the gentleman [Mr. WILLIAMS] would make it imperative on the people to sustain this school in this way, and no other. But if it prove a failure, would it be reasonable to ask any man to support it? I should think it would not.

The gentleman figured a little while ago. Well, it is the easiest thing in the world to figure. He reminds me of the farmer who once had a farm which he would not sell for "love or money." But the neighbors rose up one morning and found that the farm was sold. They went to the farmer, and expressing their surprise, asked him why he had sold his farm; and he said, "a man came here last night who offered to buy my farm; I refused to sell it; but he took up a pen and paper, and before I knew it, he figured me out of my farm." (Laughter.)

Mr. CORNELL observed that he was willing enough the amendment should be made. He thought that if the school failed, as remarked by the gentleman last up, the legislature should have the control of these lands. The gentleman was mistaken in saying that this school was to be exclusively agricultural. Such was not the case; all the mechanical arts, and the various scientific matters would be taught in it.

Mr. N. PIERCE thought the object of the gentleman [Mr. McCLELLAND] was to get this establishment turned into a law school. (Laughter.) If he had started that at the beginning, he [Mr. P.] would have gone with him. He was sorry to see legal gentlemen opposing farmers having a little share in the education of the people. He did not think, if the experiment should fail, that there would be any great amount of property left—it would be mostly all used up, and nothing would remain but the farm and the buildings attached to it. He saw a number of gentlemen here who were very anxious about it. He did not feel anxious about it; all he wanted was, that the farmers should have a share of whatever education was going. He hoped gentlemen would come up and assist the friends of the measure.

Mr. McCLELLAND would be willing to leave these lands (22 sections) under the superintendence of farmers, if the gentleman would go with him. He did not suppose that any law school would flourish, if it were put under the control of politicians. But place the farming school in the hands of the farmers, and it might flourish. However, there were a great many political volunteers, even in this Convention itself, and he did not know that the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE] might not come under that category. [A laugh.]

Mr. BRITAIN hoped the amendment would be adopted. There was a feeling throughout the State to advance the cause of agricultural education. These lands would be safe in the hands of the legislature; if the experiment should be found to be impracticable, the funds could then be diverted to some other channel.

The question was then taken upon Mr. McCLELLAND's amendment, and was sustained.

The amendments reported from the committee of the whole were then severally concurred in.

Mr. SOULE proposed the following new section, to come in between sections three and four:

"Any school district neglecting to keep up and support a school for three months in each year, shall be deprived of its proportion of the income of the primary school fund, and of all funds arising from tax for the support of schools."

And the same was adopted.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to amend section 11, by striking out in the 9th line, the words "at least."

But the Convention refused to strike out.

Mr. WHIPPLE offered the following substitute for section four of the article:

"There shall be appointed by both branches of the legislature, in joint convention assembled, in the year 1852, eight regents of the University; two for the term of eight years, two for the term of six years, two for the term of four years, and two for the term of two years; and at each subsequent election two regents shall be elected in the manner aforesaid, who shall hold their office for the term of eight years."

Mr. W. said—The number of regents provided for in the article as it now stands, I think, is too small; because we all know that the board of regents perform their duties without any compensation—their labors are gratuitous. And it is very difficult, and will be found difficult perhaps in five cases out of seven, to obtain a full attendance at the board; and it may be very important, on occasions, that the board should be full. The regents reside in remote parts of the State, that is, at places distant from that at which the meeting is to be held. In fact, sir, I am unwilling to trust the great interests of the University to a less number of my fellow citizens than six. The interests are of too much magnitude to be trusted to the control of less than six men. I therefore propose that there shall be eight regents, under the impression that as a general rule they can obtain six at any called meeting of the board. And then, again, I am exceedingly anxious to multiply the number for another reason: if we select eight, (and I should prefer twelve,) your regents will be distributed over every part of the State, and the public will thus obtain a knowledge of the character of this institution; for the Convention will observe that the concerns of this University are to be placed in the hands of the regents. They will obtain very important knowledge in regard to this establishment, and the people among whom they live will become informed as to the nature of this institution, and will become interested in it.

As I said before, I should prefer twelve; six is too small. I know it has been said that a small board will effect more than a large one. That may be a very good rule; but I do not see the applicability of it to the case before us. I do not see how we can effect the object which we have in view, more effectually than by providing that there shall be eight regents.

The second branch of my proposition proposes that instead of electing the regents by the people at large, they shall be appointed by the Legislature in joint convention. My object is this, to place the University beyond all political influence. There is no gentleman, I suppose, in this Convention, disposed to put this institution within the grasp of either political party of the State, or to bring it under any improper influence. Now, it is well known that since the organization of that institution, the Governor and Senate have selected from the different parts of the State the most distinguished and worthy individuals to fill this office, and the happiest results have been had. The difficulty in electing the regents by general ticket, I take, is this: one party meets to nominate State officers, among others six regents of the University, or eight, if this amendment be adopted; the question then rises in my mind whether they will nominate all or a part, by one party. What will be the result? It may be that the regents will thus be thrown all in one portion of the State. I take it for granted that in electing regents, men may or may not be governed by party predilections. The result might be this: when the eastern part of the State was represented by six regents, the other portions of the State would be represented but by two.

I think that instead of leaving the appointment to the Governor and Senate, as heretofore, it would be safer in the hands of the Legislature in joint convention. It appears to me that by adopting this course, we will accomplish the object that we all have in view, with more certainty than if we left it open to the ordinary party contests of the day.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I would suggest to my friend from Berrien the propriety of having these regents appointed by the Governor and Legislature. It would be better than leaving the appointment with the Legislature alone; because, if left to them, some of the difficulties suggested might arise. I think it would be much better to leave it to the Governor, to be approved of by the Legislature in joint convention.

Mr. WHIPPLE had no objection to so amend his proposition; and the substitute was then amended as suggested.

Mr. BAGG—I am opposed to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE,] and the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Monroe. I am for having the people elect these men. I know of no good reason why the people cannot as well elect these regents as the Legislature. Sir, I believe the people have the good sense to make a proper selection in this matter. If there be any argument against the election of these officers by the people, it applies equally against their being appointed by the creatures of the people, the Legislature. I never desired to see them appointed by the Governor; but I prefer the substitute as modified, to the original proposition. However, I should desire to amend in this way: "there shall be elected at the first election after the ratification of this constitution, twelve regents."

The PRESIDENT—The amendment is not in order.

Mr. WALKER said he had no great feeling on this subject. It was considered by the committee that the board of regents, as heretofore organized, was too large, and that more efficiency would be introduced by reducing the number. Their object in fixing upon "six," was to insure a more direct responsibility on the part of the board. He believed, from knowing it was demanded that all officers should be elected by them, that those should also. He had no fear in leaving the election of the regents to the people, and so making them directly responsible to the public.

Mr. N. PIERCE observed that the government of the University was not such as it should be. With the large amount of funds which it had at its disposal, for the last fifteen years it graduated only about twelve students in the year. This institution did not educate one-half the number that other chartered institutions in this State did; and this resulted merely from the government. In the Albion Seminary they graduated about fifty this year. There was something wrong about all this. He made these remarks merely to set forth some information which he received last year, as a member of the legislature. He would much prefer that any sectarian religious society had care of this institution, than to have no one taught in it. They taught no one—their rules and course of study were good, but still they did not get pupils. The University was surrounded by difficulties that should be looked into.

Mr. CHURCH could not look with any complacency upon the idea of taking the regents of the University into the two great caucuses of the political parties of the State, every two years. There, no doubt, they would be used as a sort of small change. He knew what sort of people there were in State Conventions; and in settling between the different candidates of the State, the settlement for the smaller candidates, and the claims of one section of the State, would be made up in this way: "we will give you a regent if you go with us for treasurer." Such would be the case; they would certainly become "small change," if the plan of electing them by the people were carried out. He agreed with the delegate from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER,] as to the number of regents. He did not think it well to increase the number. But in view of the difficulty of collecting a small number from the different parts of the State, that fact would be sufficient to recommend the proposition of the delegate from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE.]

Mr. LEACH expressed himself as being opposed to the substitute. He thought that the question in regard to the election of officers by the people had been finally disposed of. The argument against the election of regents by the people, he considered, held equally against the election of any other officers whatever. Education demanded that these men should be protected from all sectarian and party influence. If the appointment were left to the Legislature, would not the regents be party men? He expected they would. If elected by a democratic Legislature, they would be democrats, and vice versa. He thought, from the history of the past, they would be political men—

Mr. WHIPPLE (interposing, and Mr. L. giving way)—I beg to contradict the gentleman. I have been a member of the board of regents—

Mr. LEACH—As a general thing—

Mr. WHIPPLE—Neither as a general or a particular thing.

Mr. LEACH would assert that as a general thing men nominated by the Legislature had been political men.

The question being upon the adoption of the substitute, [Mr. WHIPPLE's,] the same was taken by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, H. Bartow, Britain, Ammon Brown, Choate, Church, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Gale, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, McClelland, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Webster, Whipple, Williams, Woodman—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bagg, Barnard, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Comstock, Daniels, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gibson, Green, Harvey, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Mosher, N. Pierce, Prevost, Skinner, Soule, Town, Walker, Warden, President—28.

Mr. WHIPPLE submitted the following, to stand as a new section, (5;) and the same was agreed to:

“The regents elected pursuant to the provisions of the foregoing section, and their successors in office, shall continue to constitute the body corporate, known by the name and style of the “regents of the University of Michigan.”

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend section eleven by adding after the word “farm,” in the eighth line, the words “until otherwise appropriated by law.”

Which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to amend by inserting after “farm,” in sixth line, “and it shall be competent for the legislature to make the same a branch of the University for instruction in agriculture and the natural sciences connected therewith, and place the same under the supervision of the regents of the University.”

Mr. W. said—Though the Convention have refused to place the proposed school under the supervision of the regents, yet, as they have left the creation of the school itself to the discretion of the legislature, there can be no harm in leaving this subject also to their discretion. I only want the legislature to have the power to connect the school with the University, by ever so slight a tenure. Surely there can be no more fit repository of the management of the institution than the regents. They will be likely to be practical men, of wide experience, of integrity and public spirit.

But I wish it made a branch for the reasons stated before. An agricultural school would probably be placed under a farmer of great comprehensiveness of mind, and great practical skill, and a professor of agricultural chemistry, and such other teachers as may from time to time be required. There will necessarily be connected with the University, professors who have no very onerous duties, and who are employed but a portion of the year. It so happens that these were the very professors whose lectures and instructions would be invaluable to an agricultural school, which may be too poor to employ a separate corps. They would probably perform all the duties of both institutions for the same or very little additional compensation. The professor of anatomy and physiology could deliver a course of lectures, embracing that knowledge of general laws regulating health, life and growth, and the improvement and cultivation of both the animal and vegetable creation, and the preservation of the physical man of the students themselves. The professors of natural philosophy, geology, and natural history, could all be made valuable to the branch. The professor (if such shall be employed) of the application of science to the arts, and an illustration of the manner in which the wonderful discoveries and inventions of this wonderful age are put into daily practical use, would confer great benefits on the school by his occasional instructions. Now, if an agricultural school is ever organized, I wish to connect it by some tie that will enable it to avail itself of such valuable instruction, so nearly gratuitous as it must be, if these duties are imposed by the regents on the professors of the University.

This discretion can certainly be trusted to the legislature. I perceive it suits the temperament of the Convention to chant laudations to-day of the purity and wisdom of the legislature. To-morrow it may suit the temper of the times and the arguments in hand, to denounce and distrust it as corrupt. I should like to avail myself of this favorable moment to procure the adoption of this amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, (49th day,) August 6.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

No clergyman in attendance.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. FRALICK: of Riley Stilwell and thirty-five other citizens of Plymouth, Wayne county, praying that a clause may be inserted in the organic law of this State, whereby any convict who may be sentenced to the State penitentiary, for any term of years not during life, may have the privilege to choose any profession or trade he may think proper; so that the learned professions may share equally in all the benefits resulting from the system of prison labor.

Referred to the committee on the judicial department.

Mr. HANSCOM announced the receipt by the Secretary of a communication from the Postmaster of Lansing, by which it appeared the postage of the Convention amounted to $501 97.

Laid on the table.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. McCLELLAND called up his resolution of yestereay, relative to an adjournment, and modified the same by inserting "Thursday, the 15th inst."

And the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE,

Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of incorporating a provision in the constitution to promote the early sale and settlement of the unappropriated public lands now held by the United States, exempt from taxation within this State; the Legislature shall be authorized to take all necessary and proper steps to procure the conveyance of said lands to the State, whenever they can be obtained on just and advantageous terms; and whatever sum, if any, shall be realized from the sales of the land so acquired, after repaying to the State the amount of all advances made on account of the purchase, management, sale and settlement of the same, together with interest thereon, shall constitute a permanent fund for the benefit of education, and the support of such deaf, dumb, blind and insane persons as have not the means of supporting themselves.

The Convention having reached the order of unfinished business, resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Education."

Mr. SKINNER moved to amend the article by adding at the end of section 8: "and tuition shall be free and without charge in said institution."

Which motion was lost.

Mr. CORNELL proposed the following:

Resolved, That the article be recommitted to the committee on education, with instructions to strike out section 3, and insert as follows: "The Legislature shall, as soon as practicable, establish a system of primary schools, the tuition of which shall be free throughout the State, and provide for their support."

Mr. CORNELL said, from the discussion which had been had on the subject, and the various amendments offered, it was evident the article was not satisfactory; perhaps it went too much into detail. He, for one, was willing to leave the matter to the Legislature. He had more confidence in the future action of the Legislature than some delegates appeared to have.

Mr. N. PIERCE would ask if the proposition had not been over and over rejected by the Convention? To make a man take a pill against his will, is hard.

Mr. CORNELL—The proposition to leave the question to the Legislature has not, to my knowledge, been made before.

Mr. BAGG—The nearest to it is the proposition I made yesterday: that the Legislature shall have power to levy a tax for the support of primary schools. As the gentleman's proposition is something like mine, I shall support it. We are legislating here too much. If we cannot perfect it, let us not go into it at all, but leave it to the Legislature.

Mr. WALKER—We have had substantially the same proposition offered in committee of the whole, and on two occasions in the Convention. I have been surprised at the disposition of members of the Convention. Some get up and make propositions going more into detail than the article reported, and then go against all detail. I respect the gentleman's motives. I believe he is in favor of it. It will be the mere Utah left in the bill. The article proposes that the Legislature shall provide for a system of schools in which tuition shall be free for three months in the year. The rest of the bill is detail. They shall raise a tax not exceeding two mills on the dollar. On the first introduction of the bill, it excluded any portion of it being raised by a State tax; but as the Convention are willing that a portion shall be raised by a tax on the whole taxable property of the State, I concur with it; but I am unwilling that the minimum rate of time shall be shortened.

Mr. CORNELL—It leaves it unfettered. The Legislature can provide for free schools by a State tax, a county or a township tax. It leaves them to carry it out, and they will carry it out as soon as practicable.

A division of the question was had; and on the motion first to recommit, the yeas and nays were had, and the motion prevailed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Whipple, Whittemore, President—45.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Comstock, Harvey, Mowry, N. Pierce, Robertson, Soule, Warden, Webster, Williams, Woodman—18.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the proposed instructions by inserting after "State," the words "by which such schools shall be kept in each and every school district, for at least three months in each year."

Mr. CORNELL said, in a great many of the districts we have a school over five months in the year, and nearly free. He would leave it to the Legislature to do what they please—revolutions never go back. It is not likely that they will establish a less time than three months. He would leave it open for legislative action.

The amendment was lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, Beeson, J. Clark, Eaton, Leach, Morrison, Mowry, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Sturgis, Town, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Williams, Woodman—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Axford, Bagg, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lovell, McClelland, Mosher, Newberry, Orr, Prevost, Roberts, E. S. Robinson, Soule, Storey, Whittemore, President—39.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to amend the instructions by striking out "as soon as practicable," and inserting in lieu thereof, "within three years after the adoption of this constitution."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE was in favor of the article as it stood. With such an amendment as that offered by the gentleman from Jackson it would be of no more value than a piece of blank paper. The Legislature might see fit in one year or in fifty. The provision would be of no account whatever.

Mr. WOODMAN believed the system of free schools had been fully discussed, and he believed it was the opinion of the Convention that they should go into operation as soon as they can fix on details. By fixing the period of three years, after which they shall go into operation, the people can discuss the matter, and the details can be carried out by the Legislature.

Mr. CORNELL was opposed to the amendment. It should be left to the Legislature. Perhaps there would never be a Legislature consisting of a less number than the Convention consists of at the present time. Some wisdom may probably remain in the State, and may get into the Legislature after the Convention shall have adjourned. The members of the Legislature may be as much disposed to carry out the wishes of the people and sustain the best interests of the State, as the present Convention.

Mr. STOREY moved to strike out "three years," and insert "five years."

The yeas and nays were had, and the Convention refused to strike out, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, Axford, H. Bartow, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Crouse, Danforth, Fralick, Gibson, Lee, McLeod, Mowry, Newberry, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Storey, Sturgis, President—19.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Chandler, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Daniels, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Lovell, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Orr, N. Pierce, Robertson, Rix, Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Town, Wait, Warden, Webster, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams—43.

The question being upon Mr. WOODMAN's amendment,

Mr. BUSH said—It is impossible to say what effect this constitution will have upon the country. The Legislature may be as able to know the wants of the people as the members of the Convention. At present we are groping in the dark.

Mr. BAGG—We cannot know the state of the finances at that time. I believe free schools may be established in less than five years. In Detroit we have a free school throughout the year. I am in favor of them as soon as practicable. It is right—it maintains an equilibrium between the poor and the rich. There is no fear of the poor getting the advantage of the rich in this or any other State.

The Legislature will have a great fund of wisdom to draw upon. They will increase their stock of knowledge from our debates. After getting these steeped down will they not have wisdom, do you think?

The amendment did not prevail.

The question recurring on Mr. CORNELL's instructions,

Mr. WOODMAN said he considered them a dead letter, and he hoped the friends of education would consider them so.

Mr. CHURCH said there was no stronger friend of education on the floor than the delegate from Jackson, [Mr. CORNELL;] and no other proposition had been offered so salutary as the one under consideration. He did not know why gentlemen should get up and constitute themselves the only friends of education.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE was not disposed to put away certainty for uncertainty. The gentleman from Jackson might be a friend to free schools; but he (Mr. P.) thought their establishment would be very uncertain, if it were left with the Legislature to establish them as soon as practicable. Under such a provision he was apprehensive the gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] would not get his education before he was 60 years of age.

Mr. WOODMAN said the remarks of the gentleman from Kent were uncalled for. He had no intention of imputing anything wrong to the gentleman from Jackson, but he did not believe the people would be satisfied unless the matter was fixed by the Convention—that the Legislature shall carry it out, and not leave it indefinite.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to strike out the words "as soon as practicable."

Mr. CORNELL said if they knew all the circumstances of the State, he should be willing to go for it. He believed the Legislature would be as well able to judge of it as the Convention. Suppose we say it shall be done in a given time, and they obey the mandate, but cannot carry out the system in the detail they wish; would it not fail? Would not the people say it is a failure, and nothing more be done about it? They will be urged to do it, and will be as anxious to carry it out as we are.

Mr. WALKER—The effect will be that they may, if they choose, establish free schools. Now, if the Legislature can be left as unbiased by lobbies as the Convention, they will carry it out. But members who were in the Legislature when petitions were sent for the establishment of free schools in Detroit, know that the most violent opposition was got up there; and violent opposition will be got up, when it shall be attempted in the Legislature to establish free schools throughout the State. Men of capital, and men without families, will resist the attempt to carry out the system. I would ask (said Mr. W.) the Convention to reflect before they abandon the system of free schools.

Mr. COMSTOCK did not believe in that influence. Would it not be exerted on one side as well as the other? It should be left to the representatives fresh from the people. The agricultural school is left open to be attained as soon as it can be reached, and so it should be in this case.

Mr. CORNELL hoped the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] would decline a nomination for Congress, and that he would be returned to the Legislature, as he was such a warm friend of education.

Mr. CROUSE—Gentlemen seem to forget that we have free schools established through the State almost three months in the year. By the law, as it now stands, they may levy a tax on the district, which, with the money received from the school fund, will give a three months free school. Have they had free schools? No sir. The reason is because the money had to come from the pockets of the people. If the money could come from the school fund, every man would be in favor of it; but when they have to put their hands in their pockets and pay for it as they have done, they may not carry it out.

I am (said Mr. C.) for leaving it to the Legislature. If the people are prepared for it, the Legislature will make provision for it. If they are not, to establish it in the constitution, would render it odious to the people.

Mr. WOODMAN hoped the amendment of the gentleman would be adopted. The legislature have had this power and they have done nothing. The people expect we shall take action upon it. There is a feeling about it; the people expect the time to be fixed when free schools shall be established.

Mr. WILLIAMS said—I hope some positive features will be retained in this article. We have temporized on several matters, and introduced several provisions into the constitution already, which are perfectly unmeaning and futile. Let us retain one feature in this article that will possess some symptom of vitality.

If anything is demanded of this Convention, it is the establishment of a system of free schools. Now, what is a free school? It is a school where tuition shall be free to every child, no matter how ignorant and poor; no matter how secluded. The gentleman from Livingston, [Mr. CROUSE,] says we have a system of free schools already. Now, if I might use a common phrase of the day, I would say, "all but the free." Now, what are the facts? Does your system reach the poor and ignorant and ragged, who infest your villages? Not at all. It never will while your rate bill is posted before the faces of the parents. They will neither pay voluntarily, nor take their tuition as a matter of charity. These are the very classes whom we wish to reach. From these classes, if they remain uneducated and unprovided for, will your poor houses and prisons be replenished. As compared with the education and protection of these unfortunate children, the education of the rich is of small account. They are sure to be educated without any system at all.

There is another reason why the present system is not a free system. It does not reach the secluded and sparsely populated districts. It is much more important to reach these than the populous districts. It is true that in the large villages, under the present law, we can create schools essentially free, and make them perfectly efficient. Such is the case in Ypsilanti, Marshall, Centreville, and other villages; but, within five miles of each of those villages, there are doubtless districts that never have a school; or, if so, a perfectly thriftless and valueless one. Now, in order to have a free school, it should be free as regards tuition; and in every district of the State a school should be necessarily kept three months in the year. The gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] offered an amendment to these instructions, to the effect that the legislature should be compelled to adopt, as the basis of a system, that all schools should be maintained at least three months in each year. Deprive any system of this feature in a country like ours, and you knock all vitality out of it.

If we cannot insert some period of time within which the legislature shall be enjoined to establish a system, let us strike out the meaningless phrase, "as soon as practicable." Let us leave some little vitality in the proposition of the gentleman from Jackson, [Mr. CORNELL.] I differ entirely from the gentleman before me, [Mr. CHURCH.] He thinks this proposition just the thing. I regard it as perfect milk and water.

It is said, leave this matter to the legislature. Are we not required to lay down a basis for the legislature with distinctness and definiteness? Does not public opinion require that we act? Nothing is more imperative on this body, in my estimation, than this very duty which we are about to shirk. For one, I am heartily tired with the declaration that the legislature will be so wise and pure that questions ought therefore to be left afloat and undetermined. There were certain questions we were expected to act upon with decision and independence, having regard only to their merits, and no regard to any consideration but our duty to decide principles in the fundamental law. Among the institutions we ought to feel bound by public sentiment to provide for, is a system of free schools; the essential and vital features of which should be defined. The legislature have had power over this subject, and they have done nothing since a free school system was demanded. One fact is sufficient to knock in the head two arguments at once. The gentleman before me prompts me and says, "knock them sky high!" Yes, that is the way one fact will knock two arguments—"knock them sky high." It is said, first, that this Convention is not expected to act at all; and again, in the next breath, that the legislature must be vested with the whole control. Now, it is a fact, for the truth of which I appeal to the members of that legislature now on this floor, that the last legislature actually refused to make any provision for free schools, because it would become the duty of this Convention to do so.

Mr. FRALICK was of opinion that the Convention were attempting to do too much. Had they done what they were sent to do, and gone home, the people would have been better satisfied. This seemed an attempt to grant some new power to the people; a power which they at present have, and when they choose they will exercise it. To say you will compel them to have free schools, may break the whole system down. I live near the gentleman from Oakland, and there is no such movement in my town as he represents.

Mr. WOODMAN said, four men—distinguished professional men—two of them clergymen, in the town in which the gentleman [Mr. FRALICK] resided, had urged on him [Mr. W.] to do the best he could for the establishment of free schools.

Mr. FRALICK—Perhaps it may be so. I have had letters from home which say nothing about it. I am in favor of free schools; the system is carried out in our town. We have raised the full amount allowed by law. I have had no instructions, but I know that they only wish the present law amended. They wish the power of raising money in the districts taken away, and given to the townships, and raised by a general tax; and that will be done in time by the Legislature. To fix it in the constitution that a sum shall be raised specifically by law, is curious; because it is in the power of the Legislature at present. He [Mr. F.] had supposed the object of the Convention was, to put some restriction on the powers of the Legislature. He hoped the amendment of the gentleman from Jackson would be adopted; it would then be left in the hands of the people to carry out the free school system as they thought proper.

Mr. EATON hoped the amendment would prevail. He believed the people expected something to be done by the Convention towards establishing free schools, and something definite should be fixed. If left to the Legislature, they may never do it.

Mr. LEACH said he came here with the expectation that free schools would be established; but he believed the Convention would do nothing. The amendment of the gentleman from Jackson is nothing more than the provision in the old constitution. Free schools may not be established for ten or fifteen years. We are told that no petitions have been presented to the Convention. It was supposed the principle was so well understood, that there was no necessity for petitioning. It was supposed that every delegate coming here would advocate the measure. Now it is said we may not adopt the principle for three years, because we are not able to do it. One thing is certain, if we wish the children of the State to be instructed, the people of the State must be decided. They are the children of the State, and it is the duty of the State to educate them. Suppose we were to say that, for the next two or three years, we will not raise any thing for the support of government. They may as well say so on the ground of economy; for it is equally necessary that the children of the State should be educated, as the government to be supported.

In the Legislature of last winter, a proposition was made to raise two mills instead of one, for the support of schools. It was voted down, on the ground that, as the Convention was about to meet to revise the constitution, they would settle the whole matter. The friends of education and of free schools voted against it on that account. In villages and populous districts they have the power to raise a tax to carry on free schools; but how is it in the woods? Every man knows that they are not free there, and they cannot be under this law.

Mr. MOORE would suggest to the gentleman from Jackson to accept the proposition of his colleague. He saw no impropriety in striking out the words. The Legislature will have the power to carry it out as soon as practicable.

Mr. CROUSE—I would have submitted such a proposition, but it was urged that they would be obliged to do it the next session of the Legislature. I had no objection to leave it open, believing the Legislature would do it in one or two years. What do the arguments amount to? It is said we are called here to fix a system of free schools. Do not the people know we cannot do it? We may declare a principle, but we cannot go into detail; that is all we were asked to do. I believe the Legislature will carry it out as soon as if the time were fixed, and I would be willing to strike out the words "as soon as practicable," as suggested by the gentleman last up; but others would oppose it, because they believe it would make it obligatory on the next Legislature to do it.

Mr. MORRISON said he was desirous that it should be left obligatory on the Legislature to establish free schools. The gentleman from Jackson professes to favor the proposition in some shape; but the gentleman has a proposition of his own, and will not support any other. He [Mr. M.] had a proposition of his own, but as he could not get it in, he was disposed to take the next best. He deemed it to be in such a shape that nothing is left of it, except something that may lead the Legislature into difficulty on that subject.

The gentleman from St. Joseph says the Legislature will not carry it out. But will they not be as near to the people as we are? The sentiments, views and wishes of the people will be known to them. Fix a provision that they shall establish a law; how can you make them carry it out? It may be said they will be bound. Suppose they are; they may get up a law which the people will reject; and if the people are opposed to it, they would be apt to get up a system that the people would reject.

Mr. GALE said there appeared some inconsistency in the arguments of gentlemen. They tell us the people call on us to carry it out, and are anxious for it; yet they say the Legislature will not do it. There was a reason why they did not do it last winter, because the Convention was about to meet. They wished to let the matter alone last winter; but will not leave it alone now unless you limit them. What is the conclusion? It is that the people do not want it. If they give us any credit for our opinions, and we say they shall do it as soon as practicable, will they not do it?

As to the article, it is no more like the provision on the subject in the old constitution, than black is like white. The present constitution says they shall establish primary schools. This says those schools shall be free. Does any one wish to have it carried out sooner than is practicable?

One word in regard to the unanimous opinion of the people in favor of free schools. I claim, sir, to be a strong advocate of free schools at home, and no man there will deny it. It may be denied here by persons not so well acquainted with my views. A person may be sincerely in favor of free schools, and yet may be disposed to leave the matter to the Legislature.

The question was taken on the motion to strike out "as soon as practicable," and lost.

Upon instructing, as proposed by Mr. CORNELL, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Beardsley, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Kingsley, Lee, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Town, Whipple, Whittemore, President—45.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Barnard, H. Bartow, Britain, Eaton, Gardiner, Harvey, Leach, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Roberts, Robertson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Williams, Woodman—23.

So the article was recommitted with the instructions proposed.

By unanimous consent of the Convention, the section proposed by Mr. WHIPPLE yesterday, and adopted, was amended by striking out "1852," and inserting "1851."

On motion of Mr. FRALICK, the article entitled "Township Officers and Government" was taken from the table.

The question being upon concurring in the amendments made in committee,

Mr. WOODMAN moved to amend the substitute reported for section 1, by striking out "four," before "constables," and inserting "two;" but the amendment was lost.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to smend the same by striking out before "school inspector," the word "one," and inserting "two;" but the Convention refused to strike out.

Mr. GALE moved to amend by inserting after "school inspector," the words "two highway commissioners, and one overseer of the poor;" but the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GALE moved to amend by striking out "four," where it occurred relative to justices of the peace, and inserting "one."

Mr. CORNELL moved to amend by inserting "three."

A division was had, and the motion to strike out was lost.

Mr. CORNELL moved to strike out "not exceeding four constables;" but the amendment did not prevail.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to strike out "four constables."

Mr. P. said—We do not want any constables at all. We have abolished collection laws, we have exempted all property from execution, and abolished capital punishment. What do you want constables for? It will be like a man keeping a dog to worry his own sheep. We only want one constable and one justice of the peace, and the only business he will have to do will be to marry a few couples. I would call the attention of the Convention to the fact that we are not going to have any crimes—we are not going to collect anything—there will be no suits—we shall do it up in the way of love.

There is no use in it. It will only make four lazy men in every township. When a man has an office he will not work. I think gentlemen will see the propriety of it. More property is exempted from collection, by several millions, than the aggregate valuation made by the assessors in the State. We shall not need these officers, or judges, until the property of the State shall have increased.

The motion did not prevail.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped the substitute would not be adopted. It appeared to him that we should have a civil army to carry on our township and county government.

Mr. FRALICK was in favor of curtailing expenses in townships; but the expenses were not increased by the multiplication of a few small offices. The only difference would be one person would get more pay. If the number were limited, the business would be done by a better class of persons. He would not take action on this in the Convention. Adopt the substitute, and it leaves the present offices; and when the Legislature think fit they can abolish or alter them. He (Mr. F.) did not want to put any more clogs in the constitution.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE said this was the first occasion in which the gentleman [Mr. FRALICK] has opposed anything likely to curtail expense. The question is whether the township shall pay three dollars a day, or eight dollars a day. The business may as well be done by three officers, the supervisor, the collector and a commissioner of highways, as well as by eight officers. There are something like twenty-one officers in a township, exclusive of the overseers of highways. From three to five persons can do all the duties in a township.

Mr. FRALICK would have no objection to such a provision being adopted by legislative enactments. His objection was to placing it in the constitution. It has always been competent for the Legislature to act upon it. The election of constables, as regards the number, rests with the people; so of assessors. They can take action on it by a vote, on the morning of the township meeting. He would leave it to the Legislature; they would act in accordance with the wishes of the people on this matter.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to amend by inserting after the words "township clerk," the words "who shall be ex-officio school inspector."

And the same prevailed by yeas 32, nays 26.

Mr. FRALICK offered the following as a substitute for the one reported by the committee:

"All city, town and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, and of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof, as the legislature shall designate for that purpose. All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed, as the legislature may direct."

Which was not agreed to.

Mr. NEWBERRY moved to amend the substitute reported by the committee by inserting after "school inspector," the words "one highway commissioner;" which was lost.

Mr. CORNELL moved to amend by striking out "four," where it occurs relative to justices of the peace, and insert "two."

Mr. C. said—Gentlemen must be aware of the fact that it was difficult to get men to take the office of magistrate. There was but little business to do, not sufficient to induce persons to qualify. One or two justices would do all the business. If a less number were elected, we should have better men to perform the duties.

The amendment did not prevail.

Mr. GALE moved to strike out "one township treasurer;" which was not agreed to.

The substitute proposed by the committee was then concurred in.

The second amendment made in committee, being a new section to the article, was also concurred in.

The third amendment being under consideration,

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the same by inserting in the additional section proposed, after the word "left," as follows: "shall consist of one or more full United States surveyed townships, and;" and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ARZENO moved to add to the section proposed by the committee as follows:

"Provided, That no township in any county that shall have been organized for the term of twenty years previous to the adoption of this constitution, shall be divided without the consent of the majority of the votes thereof, expressed in a manner to be provided by law."

Mr. CORNELL moved to strike out "twenty," and insert "twelve."

Mr. McCLELLAND said—It appears to me the proposition ought to meet the approbation of the Convention. The object of the gentleman from Berrien is to prevent imposition taking place in newly organized counties; but if applied to old townships it will create difficulty. The boards of supervisors are large enough; if the townships are cut up, you will have larger boards than are necessary; in fact some of the boards in counties are now too large. It will apply to old counties. There are many counties in the State which will probably be cut up and divided into one-third more townships than they now have.

Mr. BRITAIN said the object was only to secure to the people their rights in new counties. Had he not seen the people robbed of their rights, he should not have thought of it. How are those generally formed? Why, sir, there is usually some little village where the business is done; perhaps there may be three or four in the same organization. Now, sir, will they not hold them as long as possible to do their township business there, and prevent them from enjoying their rights, by preventing the organization of school districts, and everything on which the prosperity of a new township depends.

As the bill now stands, it is more objectionable than ever. In the legislature you have no prejudices to contend with; but now, sir, you put it into the hands of the supervisors, who are interested in preventing those new organizations, for their own benefit. It is not a false picture—it is true to the life.

I have been acquainted with the organization of new counties since 1829; with every one west of Washtenaw. I cannot consent to go for this, and am desirous of recording my vote against it; as I believe it will retard the prosperity of new townships. You should give them power to lay out roads, and make a center in each new township to induce persons to settle among them.

Mr. DANIELS—I do not fully understand the question, but it appears to be obligatory on the board of supervisors; and another on the Legislature, that they should divide the townships. He had never seen any evils growing out of it.

Mr. BRITAIN—The gentleman says the language is positive. Will he point it to me?

Mr. CHURCH directed Mr. BRITAIN's attention to an amendment to section 12 of article entitled "County Government."

Mr. BRITAIN was aware of that; but it will be seen that they cannot go for a special law for themselves—they can only go to amend the law of the supervisors.

The gentleman says he has never seen any evils growing out of it. I (said Mr. B.) have seen the evils of it repeatedly. I have known instances where two hundred and fifty inhabitants could not get an organization, because the inhabitants of the older settled parts were opposed. I do not rise here because it is a privilege to get up and labor in this Convention. I get up under a sense of duty to my constituents. Sir, is it a privilege, I ask, or is it a right? Who can consider it a privilege, under the sarcasm of members, and the charges made out of doors that I have occupied four times the time that other persons have?

Mr. ALVORD—I do not rise to argue the question—I do not feel any particular interest in it; but I would answer the gentleman from Berrien, as he alludes to me—

Mr. BRITAIN—How does he know?

Mr. ALVORD—I expressed an opinion yesterday. I will only say that those remarks were intended to be general. I said that certain members had consumed a vast amount of the time of this Convention by constantly jumping up and boring us with loud sounding speeches upon every unimportant question, merely to entertain us with their peculiar views, and to be placed right before their constituents; that some gentlemen seemed, by their actions, to suppose it absolutely necessary that the marks of their superior wisdom should be placed on every part of the constitution; that each delegate upon this floor had an equal right to be heard, but, if all should occupy as much time as do some gentlemen, our labors would never be brought to a close. I think the Convention might possibly get along if some gentlemen should withhold the light of their "views"—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Wayne is out of order.

(Cries of "go on, go on.")

Mr. A. continued—If the gentleman from Berrien thinks my remarks yesterday applicable to himself, (and perhaps they are,) he may so apply them. I have a high opinion of that gentleman's views on most subjects; but his great desire to appear "right before the people," seems to have become a ruling passion, and misleads his better judgment.

All know that there has been a great waste of time in this Convention in speeches for buncombe. For one, I am heartily tired of it. It is time our labors were concluded. So say the press throughout the State, and so say the people who sent us here. They do not deal in buncombe themselves, and they still hold their servants responsible for any waste of their time, and money expended.

"When caps into the ring are thrown,

Which each one claims he makes his own."

The gentleman from Berrien should have remembered this old couplet, and saved himself from the ridiculous position in which he now stands by taking my remarks of yesterday to himself.

I think all the leading principles to be embraced in the amended constitution have been sufficiently examined and discussed; and all that now remains for us to do is to come at once to a direct vote upon all questions that come up, bring our labors to a close, and return to our homes.

Mr. DANIELS did not concur in the apprehension of the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN,] relative to injuries being done to townships; the power would be with the supervisors, and the supervisors will be within the reach of the people.

Mr. BRITAIN—I know it, but they may not be willing to do it; and I have given my reasons why they will not be willing.

"Twenty" was stricken out and "twelve" inserted, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The question being upon concurring in the section as amended, the yeas and nays were had thereon, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Beeson, Britain, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Chandler, Choate, Conner, Eaton, Gardiner, Green, Hascall, McClelland, Newberry, Robertson, Town, Whipple, Williams, Woodman—22.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Alvord, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Bush, Carr, Church, Comstock, Crouse, Daniels, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Lee, Lovell, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whittemore, President—39.

So the section reported by the committee, as amended, was non-concurred in.

The article was then ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. HART, four members were directed to be added to the committee on the schedule.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the communication of Mr. J. COATES, tendering his resignation, was taken from the table.

Mr. BRITAIN moved that Mr. COATES have leave to withdraw his communication; and leave was granted.

On motion of Mr. CROUSE, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The PRESIDENT called the Convention to order.

Mr. WALKER, from the committee on education, reported back the article entitled "Education," amended according to instructions.

Mr. CROUSE moved to amend the article by striking from the 10th section all after "improvement," in the 2nd line, to and inclusive of the word "farm," in the 8th line.

The amendment was negatived by yeas 18, nays 44.

Mr. EATON moved the previous question, and the same being demanded, the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being upon ordering the article to a third reading, the yeas and nays were had, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Church, Comstock, Conner, Eaton, Fralick, Green, Harvey, Hascall, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams—28.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Choate, Cornell, Crouse, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Hart, Kingsley, Leach, Lovell, McLeod, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Skinner, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Woodman, President—33.

So the article was not ordered to a third reading.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to reconsider the last vote.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE said—Mr. President, I trust that this bill will yet be perfected, so that it can be passed by a decided majority of this Convention. The system of free schools had the decided approbation of the Convention, at the commencement of its sitting; but a provision has been adopted which destroys that principle. I make this motion (said Mr. P.) to give an expression of my reasons for my vote.

The motion to reconsider prevailed; and the article was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT presented the petition of I. Follensbee and fifteen others, relative to a provision making it the duty of the Legislature to endeavor to obtain from the United States a cession of certain public lands; referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

On motion of Mr. MORRISON, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, on the resolution offered by Mr. MOORE, relative to the appointment of a board of commissioners to revise the rules, &c., of the courts of record in this State, &c., Mr. McCLELLAND in the chair.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, all after the word "resolved" was stricken out.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the committee rose, reported the resolution back, recommending that all after the resolving clause be stricken out.

On motion of Mr. WHIPPLE, the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. LEACH offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on supplies be instructed to report to the Convention to-morrow, the amount and kind of stationery purchased for the use of the Convention, and the price paid for the same.

Mr. HANSCOM made a verbal statement relative to the purchase of stationery for the use of the Convention, which had been put under the charge of the Secretary of the Convention, with whom also had been deposited the bills; which were open for the inspection of members. Mr. H. said the expenses of the Convention for stationery, incidental expenses and postage would be reduced over three-fourths below any other deliberative body, by the action of the committee on supplies.

Mr. WOODMAN moved that the report of the chairman of the committee on supplies be accepted.

Mr. LEACH hoped it would not be adopted. The report was not satisfactory to him. He was not alone in wishing to know what had been purchased and the prices paid.

Mr. WOODMAN thought the statement satisfactory as far as the chairman was concerned. If any delegate wanted further information, it could be obtained from the Secretary.

Mr. HANSCOM said he would submit a report in writing; and the motion was withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT announced the following additional members to the committee on the schedule: Messrs. McCLELLAND, WHIPPLE, WALKER, and WHITTEMORE.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the Convention refused to order to a third reading the resolutions reported by the select committee on the license laws.

Mr. BAGG moved a call of the Convention; but the call was not sustained.

The motion to reconsider was lost—yeas 31; nays 37.

Mr. WOODMAN offered the following:

Resolved, That the messengers of this Convention be allowed one and a half dollars per diem, for their services during the sitting of this Convention.

Mr. FRALICK asked the yeas and nays; and the same being ordered, the resolution prevailed—yeas 48; nays 11.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-arms be required to procure a quantity of unslaked lime, or chloride of lime, to be used in and about the representative hall, and the out-buildings connected therewith.

Mr. McLEOD moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. ALVORD offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on arrangement and phraseology be instructed to strike out from section five of the article on the Legislative Department, all after the word "district," in line three.

Mr. A. said he offered the resolution for the purpose of bringing the matter again under the consideration of the Convention. This section was highly objectionable to many members of the Convention, and he hoped it would not finally be adopted. In the first place, he did not believe the people expected that the Convention would adopt single representative districts. That they had given expression in favor of single senatorial districts he denied. By striking out the section, it would leave those counties which were entitled to two Senators, to elect them by general ticket in the county. In the county of Wayne, it would be found very inconvenient to district. It would be a privilege to elect by general ticket.

Mr. A. moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BAGG hoped his colleague would withdraw his motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. ALVORD withdrew with the understanding that he would renew it after his colleague had said what he had to say.

Mr. BAGG then said—Mr. President, this Convention well knows my mind upon this subject. They well know my whole energies of soul and body have been engaged, during our sitting here, to thwart the single district projects, of its friends, from first to last. It was reported by the legislative committee; debated day after day in committee of the whole; attempted to be reconsidered without effect while in that committee, under the rule, and attempted to be recommitted with instructions. The same process awaited its paramount importance in Convention; but there met the same fate as in committee of the whole, and finally took its several readings, was passed and sent to the committee on arrangement and proseology—the last resort of parliamentary law and usage, to which committee, both its friends and enemies, long since supposed it had gone to rest, never to be again disturbed by this body—utterly turfed beyond the hopes or fears of either—beyond the hope of resurrection. Yet, there were those here, that notwithstanding this article had been passed upon by a full Convention, before our ranks had been thinned by disease and other causes, to but little above a quorum, as at the present moment, who again attempt to resuscitate it. When was this guerilla warfare of legislation to cease? When this constant, interminable and eternal opposition of the minority to end? We had had it repeatedly in the same manner from other quarters, on other articles in the same condition. He had heard of such principles in deliberative bodies as decency, decorum, order and consistency! Was this Convention to terminate its deliberations in anarchy and confusion? He trusted not. His whole heart and soul, he repeated, had been with his colleague on this subject, and was there still, and probably ever would be. He knew the single district system, senatorial or otherwise, was not democratic, let it come from what source it might. Its establishment would revolutionize the banner State of democracy, and change it to the opposition. It was too late to repent when the devil had actually come. It was too late now to remedy the evil. The democratic press had caused the mischief. He knew when he was fairly whipped, and had too much honor and self-respect to combat it longer. He should bear the sacrifice with composure. He had never made anything out of politics; but, on the contrary, sunk thousands. It was not self-interest that governed him in his action on this or any other subject. These gentleman wish to refer these spent balls, these longed for morsels of interest, to the committee on arrangement and phraseology. Do gentlemen think that this committee have power to change general principles? Why, sir, their only use, authority and power, appertain to matters of form, instead of substance. That is their only duty. The gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. ALVORD,] is always croaking and harping about our slowness in getting through with our deliberations. No longer ago than yesterday he whined like a whipped spaniel about going home, either for buncombe or otherwise; and yet he is found in these guerilla ranks, impeding our progress from day to day, by moves and motions like this.

The CHAIR—The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. BAGG—On what ground?

The CHAIR—The gentleman is using personalities.

Mr. BAGG—It is not personal, if the President knew it—it is a simple comparison. Cannot I make a comparison?

[Cries of "go on, go on."]

Mr. BAGG resumed—He trusted the Convention would put an eternal quietus on this, as well as its kindred propositions. He was heartily sick of this interminable scramble, to see who should be foremost to exhume the carcass of any entombed negative principle, that had long since met its fate.

Mr. ALVORD said he offered the resolution in good faith, believing if it were laid on the table and brought up at some other time, it might be compromised. It was said by his colleague [Mr. BAGG] that they were whipped out. He (Mr. A.) believed they had been whipped unfairly. The Convention had decided on adopting single senatorial districts. We now (said Mr. A.) throw ourselves on the generosity of the Convention and ask that those large counties may be left to elect their senators by general ticket.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I question whether the resolution is in order. If it is then we are at sea again. The article has gone through its regular parliamentary course and has been concluded. I was opposed to single senatorial districts; but I ask if it would not be taking an unfair advantage of those gentlemen who felt a deep interest in the matter, and who have gone home under an impression that the question was settled, and that it would not be raised again. I raise the point of order, that a resolution, without going through the forms prescribed by the rules, directing a committee to substantially change any article passed by the Convention, cannot be entertained.

Mr. WHIPPLE—There seems to be a misunderstanding with regard to the powers with which the committee on arrangement and phraseology are clothed. The powers of that committee embrace two objects. One object is to give the various matters in the articles a proper arrangement; and if the phraseology is improper, simply to correct it. But they have no more power to change the meaning than any other member of the Convention. The very name of the committee implies its duties; they have no power to change the sense of any part of any article.

Mr. CHURCH—I ask what became of the two-thirds rule in the old Convention?

Mr. WHIPPLE—The committee reported a change, and asked the consent of the Convention, as the present committee may do. I think the committee on phraseology have no right to make any change except in phraseology.

Mr. HASCALL—Can they not change a section?

Mr. WHIPPLE—I think not, sir. Each article goes through the parliamentary course of proceedings. Three days are allowed by the rules for reconsideration. After that it is entirely beyond the reach of the Convention. Can it be said that when you cannot reconsider an article that a member can get round it by moving that the committee on phraseology be instructed to amend? Why, sir, if that were allowed, we should remain here till doomsday. There is not one article that was unanimously concurred in, and members may get up and offer resolutions for amendment according to their own views.

I concur with the gentleman who has offered the resolution, in his views with regard to the senatorial districts; but the Convention have decided differently, and I would never get up and move an amendment after the deliberate sense of the Convention has been had, as the sole effect will be to occupy the time, and delay the adjournment.

Mr. ALVORD—I did not rise in rebellion, but as a suppliant; as my friend [Dr. BAGGE] says we have been whipped. I hoped gentlemen would exercise some mercy. Believing that great inconvenience will arise from a division of counties into single senatorial districts, I had hoped that gentlemen would have reconsidered the matter.

Mr. McLEOD—So far as the impolicy of pursuing this course is concerned, I entirely agree with the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND.] But so far as the technical question is concerned, I am not prepared to coincide with his views. According to my views, the committee would have no right to originate a change, except it would be justified by the original terms of the article. But we know it is common in parliamentary practice to refer to committees who have no natural connection with the subject. I consider this committee on phraseology one of the most important in the Convention. So it has been considered by the members of the Convention, as they have appointed the strongest men in the Convention upon this committee. They are not mere clerks, but have a general supervisory power to bring the several articles which have been passed before the Convention, into proper shape and order. I think (said Mr. McL.) it is entirely within the power of the Convention to give them instruction. Still a great inconvenience may arise from gentlemen proceeding in this mode; but it is incident to the forms of legislation. If it is abused it must be corrected by the good sense of the Convention.

Mr. McCLELLAND said—Under parliamentary rules, a bill is read a first and second time, and after being perfected, goes through its several stages, to the committee on enrollment. Suppose a person objected to some part of the bill, and had stated his objection in all the stages in which it was open to amendment. He would ask if he could get up and offer to instruct the committee on enrollment? The mode of correcting an article must be by the rules, step by step, as in the case of a bill.

Mr. McLEOD said the argument of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELL-

LAND,] was correct, as far as it was applicable; but the Convention had no such committee.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The committee on arrangement and phraseology stand in the place of the committee on enrollment in a legislative body. Suppose the committee on enrollment find the language of a bill entirely different from what was understood by the body which passed it; they cannot change it. They do not bring in a resolution, but come and ask the unanimous consent of the body. If that consent is not obtained, they must introduce an amendment to the bill, which must go through its regular forms. I agree with the gentleman as to the powers of the committee on phraseology. It is their duty not only to correct every improper phraseology, but to look at the meaning the Convention intended to convey. If it does not convey the intention of the body, they recommend a change to the Convention.

Mr. McLEOD—Then the Convention have control over an article after its final passage.

Mr. McCLELLAND—They have. But the idea is this: they cannot alter any passage or measure because they think it would not be salutary. The idea intended to be conveyed by the Convention, is what they should aim at; and if any alteration is necessary to carry that out, then they may make it, but it must be with the consent of the Convention. The committee on enrollment do the same thing. When a bill is in their hands, no person can get up and offer a resolution to change any portion of it.

Mr. HASCALL—Then the Convention will have its hands tied up.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The rules can be suspended by a two-thirds vote; and if there should be any thing obviously wrong, the Convention will suspend the rules, as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT stated it to be his opinion that the resolution was out of order, and could not be entertained. If any member, after an article had passed, could offer a resolution to make a substantial change, it would lead to much inconvenience. It does not put the article out of the hands of the Convention. The Convention can suspend its rules. If the committee report any substantial alterations, the Convention must adopt that course, if not acceded to by unanimous consent.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved that the article entitled "Education," be taken from the table and recommitted to the committee on education.

Mr. CHURCH—I am opposed to recommitment. It may go again through the hands of the committee and be reported back, and patch work made of it. While there is so much difference of opinion on the subject in the Convention, the recommendation of that committee will have no more influence on this body than the motion of an individual. The clause in the article in regard to free schools came before the Convention with the unanimous recommendation of the committee, yet it did not stand the first shot. The article has been so long before the committee that I hope it will not be recommitted.

Mr. N. PIERCE hoped that it would be recommitted, that some arrangement might be made by which it would pass.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE wished to make an effort to harmonize on the article, so that it would not be lost. He thought the committee might devise something to harmonize the Convention.

Mr. CHURCH would ask how the gentleman could attain the object more through the committee than by any other way? It was an object the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] had much at heart; and he [Mr. C.] was disposed to facilitate it as much as possible.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD regretted that the labors of the committee on Education had not been more successful; perhaps the President might have been unfortunate in the selection of that committee; but he [Mr. B.] was not disposed to make any remarks on the allusions made by the gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] to that committee. The measure of the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] was a laudable one. It was the object of the friends of education to make a final effort, that the bill might be perfected so as to meet the sanction of the Convention.

Mr. GREEN inquired if the committee had not a resolution before them in relation to free schools? He believed the people in his section of country did not expect any such thing. They wish the Convention to express an opinion, but to leave it to the Legislature to carry it out.

Mr. COMSTOCK—My colleague expresses the views of the people in my section of country correctly. They are in favor of free schools, but they would leave it to the Legislature to carry out the details.

The motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE prevailed.

Mr. CHURCH, from the committee on miscellaneous provisions, reported back sundry resolutions, from which they asked to be and were discharged.

Also, a petition referred to that committee, praying for the incorporation of a provision in the constitution prohibiting ministers of the gospel from holding any office of honor or profit in the State; reporting adverse to the prayer of the petitioners.

The report was accepted and the committee discharged.

Mr. CHURCH, from the same committee, reported

ARTICLE —.

Sec. 8. All commissions, issued to persons holding office under the provisions of this constitution, shall be in the name and by the authority of the people of the State of Michigan, sealed with the great seal of the State, signed by the Governor, and countersigned by the Secretary of State.

Which was read the first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered printed.

Mr. J. CLARK offered the following, which was laid upon the table:

Resolved, That the committee on arrangement and phraseology report to this Convention any and all changes made by them in the articles, when reported by them to the Convention.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH,

Resolved, That the committee on the governmental and judicial policy of the upper peninsula, &c., and the committee upon the mode of revising the constitution, be and the same are hereby instructed to report forthwith to this Convention upon the subjects severally and especially committed to them.

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, (50th day,) August 7.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. BEESON: of George Goodman, W. H. McComber and 147 others, praying the incorporation by the Convention of a clause in the constitution prohibiting the collection of all debts of a less amount than one hundred dollars, if contracted after the adoption of the constitution. Referred to the committee on the legislative department.

REPORTS.

Mr. HANSCOM submitted the following:

Pursuant to the instructions of the Convention, the committee on supplies and expenditures respectfully report: That they have purchased the amount and kind of stationery specifically stated and set forth in the bills now in the hands of the Secretary of the Convention, numbered from one to five inclusive, and made a part of this report; that bills for some small amounts purchased in this village, have not as yet been presented and filed; that one considerable item of expense incurred consisted of purchases of appropriate materials to carry out the resolution of the Convention upon the melancholy announcement of the death of General Taylor, late President of the United States. The committee respectfully refer the Convention to the proceedings of the 5th and 19th of June.

On the last named day the chairman of your committee proposed to the Convention the following resolutions, in obedience to the wishes of the committee:

Resolved, That from and after this day, the post master of this village be not authorized to charge to the Convention or State any postage on any mailable matter, sent or mailed by members or officers of the Convention, and that the Secretary notify the post master accordingly.

Resolved, That from and after this date there be printed for the use of the Convention but 240 copies of the journal.

The passage of the resolutions had the effect to reduce the daily current and incidental expenses of the Convention to an amount varying from thirty-five to fifty dollars.

The committee also suggest, that by reason of the system of reporting, adopted by order of the Convention, an increased quantity of stationery has been necessarily required; and that for the purpose of making that branch of duties as effectually performed as practicable, and at the urgent request of the reporters, your committee purchased twelve reporter's pens, with gold points, at a cost of one dollar each. One-half have been already placed in the hands of the reporters and secretaries of the Convention. The balance, in conjunction with a large amount of the stationery purchased—ink, sand, wax, wafers, envelopes, &c., &c., will be on hand and unused, and by the Secretary of this Convention, delivered over to the Secretary of State for the use of the State.

A comparison of the current and incidental expenses of this Convention (aside from pay of members) with former Constitutional Conventions or legislative bodies in this State, number of members and officers and length of session considered, show, as your committee believe, a reduction of nearly two-thirds, and a consequent saving, to the amount of several thousands of dollars, to the tax payers of the State.

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the bills be read.

The bills of stationery were accordingly read.

Mr. GALE moved that the bills just read be printed upon the journal.

Mr. BUSH hoped the gentleman would give his reasons.

Mr. GALE did not know why it should not go upon the journal. He wanted it for reference, to look over the bills at his leisure.

Mr. ROBERTSON thought that the journal was a record of our daily proceedings. What this had to do upon the journal he did not know. Was it to send it down to posterity? If the gentleman wants a printed copy, let him make a motion of the kind, so that he can send it to his constituents.

Mr. GALE—I can take care of my own constituents, without any help from the gentleman from Macomb.

Mr. McLEOD—Posterity may be much gratified at hearing the price of red tape, sand and sealing wax.

Mr. GALE—There are some who care nothing about expenses—who do not stop at red tape and sealing wax. I hope it will be printed.

Mr. CORNELL—I hope the gentleman will have no objection to having it printed in a separate report. That would be a more consistent course. I hope he will take that method.

Mr. GALE—I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WALKER, from the committee on education, reported back the article entitled "Education," with the following amendments thereto:

1. Strike out section 3, and substitute therefor: "The Legislature shall, within five years from the adoption of this constitution, provide for and establish a system of common schools. Such schools shall be kept without charge for tuition for at least three months in each year, in every school district in the State."

2. Also insert in section 5, at the end of line 3: "With the privilege of speaking, but not of voting."

3. Also strike out in section 10, line 3, the words "with a model farm in connection therewith;" and in lines 6 and 8, the words "and farm."

Mr. BRITAIN moved to lay the report on the table; but the motion was lost.

The question being on concurring in the substitute reported by the committee for section 3,

Mr. J. D. PIERCE inquired if the word "free" was in the amendment.

Mr. WALKER said he believed not.

Mr. BRITAIN hoped it would be laid upon the table at present, so that it might be examined more carefully.

Mr. ALVORD moved to amend the same by striking out the words "within five years."

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALKER—I wish to state that it is not worded so as to express the peculiar views of the committee, but because it is thought to embody the deliberate opinion of a majority of the Convention. I shall be compelled to vote against it, although originally in favor of it. If struck out, it may defeat the bill.

The motion was lost—yeas 6, nays 61.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to add to the substitute, "and all instruction in said schools shall be conducted in the English language;" which was accepted by the chairman, on the part of the committee on education, and the addition was so made.

Mr. FRALICK offered the following substitute for the one proposed by the committee, which was not agreed to:

"The Legislature shall provide for a system of primary schools, by which a school shall be kept and supported in each school district, at least three months in every year; and any school district neglecting to keep up and support such school, may be deprived of its equal proportion of the interest of the public fund. And the Legislature may provide for levying a tax on the taxable property of the several townships and cities of this State, for the support of said schools."

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to amend the proposition of the committee by striking out "for at least three months in each year."

But the Convention refused to strike out; and the substitute reported by the committee for section three was then concurred in.

The second amendment was also concurred in; yeas 41, nays 29.

Mr. BAGG inquired if a substitute would be in order for section four.

Mr. WHIPPLE rose to a point of order. He believed that there was a substitute already under consideration.

Mr. BAGG offered the following substitute for section four:

"There shall be elected at the first general election for judges in this State after the ratification of this constitution, twelve regents of the University; four for the term of six years, four for the term of four years, and four for two years; and at each subsequent election for judges, there shall be four regents of the University elected, who shall hold their office for the term of six years."

Mr. B. hoped the substitute just offered by himself would prevail. His democratic feelings would not permit him to vote for the section as it stood. Every officer to be elected under this new constitution, is to be elected by the people direct. He could not consent that this only blot and blemish, savoring of federalism, should be permitted to remain. Gentlemen agreed that the regents of this institution should be placed beyond the operation and effects of party, and therefore should be elected by the Legislature. Would this remove the objection? Would the Legislature be any less free from the machinery of party? Certainly not. That arena was as liable to be affected by party as the general election by the people themselves. The substitute proposed to elect the regents of the University at the same time and in the same manner as the circuit judges. Were the regents of the University of more consequence than your judges of the Supreme Court? Was not the judiciary at the very base of your government? Did not these judges adjudicate on the whole, ultimately? If so, was not what was applicable to one applicable to the other? He could see no difference.

The article now proposed to elect the judges in the spring, so as to keep them out of the general political scramble in the fall. Why not elect the same number of regents, one in each circuit, at the same time and in the same manner? The substitute now offered proposed so to do. He hoped it would prevail. We were in a progressive age—in a progressive democratic age. He could well remember the days of federalism—the days of the council of revision, and other aristocratic features of our government, which had long since gone by the board, from this spirit of progression. It illy becomes this Convention, sitting here in the place of the people themselves, to debar them from voting for every officer to be elected under the government direct. He did not distrust the people. He would now appeal to the democratic portion of this Convention to sustain the substitute. He had no fears of the result.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I fully agree with the gentleman. I believe the whigs, on this point, are fully as democratic. I believe that they wish this principle incorporated in the constitution, that there shall be no officer so sacred but that he shall be elected by the people. It is generally understood that all officers shall be so elected; and I hope that decided action will be taken, and that the yeas and nays will be called.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend, so as to make the professors of the University elective by the people.

On the suggestion of Mr. CHURCH, Mr. BAGG modified his substitute so as to read:

"There shall be elected in each judicial circuit, at the time of the election of the judge of said circuit, a regent of the University, whose term of office shall be the same as that of said judge; and the regents then elected shall constitute the board of regents of the University of Michigan."

Mr. BAGG said he was sorry to see the amendment offered to the substitute at all, and much less by the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND.] It was not evidently offered in good faith, but to kill the substitute. It was like the embrace of the night-mare, to hug it to death. He trusted there was too much good sense in the Convention to entertain it for a moment. He was well aware that the present circuit judges, to a man, were in favor of the present Circuit Court system. He was also well aware that the regents of the University wished the regents to be elected by the Legislature or the Governor, or by some other power, removed one step from the people. He had been labored with, not only on this subject, but on another connected with the interests of this institution, to wit: to take from the Legislature the power to Legislate at all on the University or its lands, and bestow it upon the regents. But these arguments had no effect upon his mind.

The gentleman had given us his experience as a regent of the University, to prove that the regents were operated upon by no other influences than honest motives and good intentions. No one doubted this; and although the gentleman had, in addition to his experience as a regent of the University, a much larger experience in legislative and congressional matters, it did not follow that his judgment on this or other subjects was better than those of less experience. At any rate, if he were honest in this amendment, his democracy was running low-wines, and could not be followed by those of better judgment. There was a proper point for this Convention in detail to stop at. He was sure the Convention would vote down the amendment, and let the substitute stand on its merits. "One thing at least he had not looked for from that quarter, and that was a distrust of the people themselves. What would come next, he knew not, but was prepared for almost any thing, from any quarter. He trusted the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I regret exceedingly that the gentleman from Wayne has thought it necessary to offer this substitute. I have ever taken a deep interest in the University, and I can call upon gentlemen on this floor to bear testimony that I have done all in my power to sustain it, and I submit to the Convention whether party has any thing, or should have any thing, to do with it? This is a serious matter, and I am opposed to involving it in politics, at all. We cannot avoid mingling it with politics, even if we elect them in the spring. You may, to a certain extent, but you cannot altogether; for a bargain can be as well made to last from fall until spring, as from spring until fall; and it cannot be avoided; for you must change human nature before you can change the party tactics of the day. The people of the State of Michigan are as competent to elect professors as they are regents. I was a regent, once, and I confess that I am to a great extent ignorant of the duties of the office. I am not at present a competent judge of their precise qualifications. I consider myself a better judge of the qualifications of a professor than I am of a regent; and that the people of this State are more deeply interested in the character of the professors, than they are in that of the regents.

The people are competent to judge of the qualifications that are necessary for a professor in the University. I can refer to the history of other States to sustain my opinion. One institution in Virginia, which is now under private auspices, was at one time a State University; and it was sustained by one of the greatest names that ever blazed in the history of our country. Thomas Jefferson tasked every power of his mind to sustain it; but with his talent and intellect, and with the full patronage of the State of Virginia, it utterly failed. It was resuscitated under the influence of private persons, probably a corporation, but not a State institution; it has no connection with the State, except perhaps obtaining occasional help in the shape of a gratuity from the State, and it has risen to be one of the best and the most distinguished institutions of the South. They now number three or four hundred students in that University.

Mr. CLARK—I am sorry to see such a proposition come from my worthy friend from Monroe, that the professors should be elected by the people. I am satisfied that our University should not be placed upon the same level with political institutions. We should look to a higher source; select the best men that we can find, so that they may sustain the institution.

The University can only be sustained by the weight of moral influence which you bring to bear upon it; if you sink it down to the political arena, it must inevitably fail. As this is our only institution of the kind, I hope the Convention will use every effort to place it on a proper footing, that we may have the free benefits that were designed to flow from it, and which will certainly be lost if the professors of the University are to scramble into office through the influences brought to bear upon elections.

I am prepared to go as far as the gentleman from Wayne, in the assertion of democratic principles; but I consider the broad arguments of the gentlemen from Wayne and Lenawee as exceedingly questionable. It is not democracy or whiggery that we want in this case. It is or should be apart from all these influences. I hope that it will be left to the Legislature, that they may be enabled to take suitable action and sustain the institution.

Mr. KINGSLEY—From the fact that I live near the University, I shall say but little on the subject, but be guided by the opinions of others, as the members from various quarters can probably fully represent public sentiment. I am of opinion, however, that it would be the best plan to agree with the report of the committee. There are some objections to the regents being elected, as political action should be excluded, and I think it would give better satisfaction to the people of the State. I feel a deep interest in the University, and I am aware that there has been a feeling of prejudice against it, which I hope will soon pass away. It belongs to the whole State, and I hope the whole State will feel an interest in sustaining it.

Mr. BAGG wished to make a few remarks. The regents want to be independent of the Legislature. They want to manage the financial part. I am sorry that in this age of progression, we should look backward. I am sorry to see the gentleman from St. Clair follow the lead of the gentleman from Monroe. We elect our judges by the people; if the principle is wrong, how can that be defended? Yet, we know that none here wish or think of a change; and yet the judges are of more importance to the people of the State than the regents of the University, the judiciary being the base and foundation of our whole commonwealth.

We are told by our opponents that they want to keep them pure—kept out of the political arena. Well, sir, will that be effected by permitting them to be chosen by the Legislature. Does not the Legislature partake of the nature of those who elected them? Neither will there be a scramble, for the substitute proposes that they shall be elected at the same time and the same number as the judges of the circuits. I hope that every officer appointed by this constitution will be elected by the people.

Mr. DANFORTH—I hope the substitute will not pass, for we ought to remove this from political strife. If we elect them, we shall elect them with the same spirit that we elect our judges and other officers. I came from a country where we have had some experience on this subject—the State of Massachusetts. When William's College was under the care of the State, it had but very few students; I think not more than seven. But left to private enterprise, it now numbers two hundred students.

We should be very cautious how we act in this matter; and I think the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe is preferable, as I believe the professors are more liable to the people than the regents. I am (although a strong party man) in favor of it being left to the Executive, that it may be as much as possible kept aloof from the political action of the people of the State. I hope the gentleman from Lenawee will see that his proposition is wrong.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I deprecate bringing this matter in the political field for the purpose of making it a mere party question, or treated upon grounds purely political. If the election takes place in each judicial circuit, will there not in all probability be a fair representation of all parties in the State? Will one party have the rule in every judicial district? I think not; but that by election the people, as a whole, will be represented. The judges will be elected by the people, and I see no reason why the regents should not be likewise elected. I see no reason why the people should be deprived of this right under this constitution. I wish this left to the people, that there may be a fair representation of the people; that the people may be more interested in the matter.

I hope that this substitute will prevail. I think that every inhabitant will be interested in it, for all feel an interest in the education of their children. Will you refuse to so trust the people—say they are not competent? I hope not. I shall blush to go home and say to my constituents that they were not capable of electing an officer of this kind.

Mr. McCLELLAND then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. STOREY moved the previous question; and the same being demanded, and the main question being ordered to be now put, the substitute proposed by Mr. BAGG for section four of the article, was agreed to—yeas 44, nays 26.

The article was then ordered to a third reading.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. TOWN offered the following; which,

On motion of Mr. ARZENO, was indefinitely postponed:

Resolved, That the members and officers of this Convention be required to pay postage on all mailable matter received by them hereafter.

On motion of Mr. GARDINER,

Resolved, That Mr. MARTIN MAHON be appointed a reporter of this Convention, from and after the 1st instant.

The article entitled "Township Officers and Government" was read a third time, when

Mr. FRALICK moved to indefinitely postpone the same; which was not agreed to—yeas 23, nays 44.

And on the question, shall the article now pass, the yeas and nays were had, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Anderson, Axford, Bagg, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Daniels, Eaton, Gardiner, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Lovell, McClelland, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Robertson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whittemore, Williams—42.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Barnard, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, J. Clark, Crouse, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Lee, Mosher, Prevost, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Town, Whipple, President—27.

So the article was passed; and under the rule referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

The article entitled "Education" was read a third time by its title, and the question being shall the article pass?

Mr. CROUSE said—I would inquire how much salt spring land we have, how much remains unsold, and what amount of money is to be appropriated for the support of an agricultural school?

Mr. WALKER—The information was given by the gentleman from St. Joseph, the other day. The Auditor General said there was not the full amount. There is no direct appropriation by this section; it merely permits the legislature to appropriate. It is not at present in existence; but can by them be appropriated.

Mr. CROUSE—If the money is used for other purposes, is it intended to draw the amount from some other fund to replace it?

Mr. WILLIAMS gave the same explanation that he gave the other day, respecting the amount, probable value, &c., of the salt spring lands.

The yeas and nays were then had, and resulted as follows;

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lovell, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Warden, Whittemore, Williams—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Asahel Brown, Bush, J. Clark, Danforth, Gale, Green, Lee, Newberry, Skinner, Webster, Whipple, President—12.

So the article was passed, and under the rule referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the committee of the whole were discharged from the consideration of the articles entitled "Judicial Department;" and the one reported by the committee on the judiciary, through Mr. CHURCH, and numbered 28, was taken up for consideration.

Section one having been read,

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the words "inferior local," were stricken therefrom, and "municipal" inserted.

Section two being under consideration,

Mr. BRITAIN moved to strike therefrom, in line five, the word "separate," and all after "constitution," in the same line.

Mr. BEARDSLEY did not understand the object of the amendment.

Mr. BRITAIN—The object is to render the Legislature competent at the end of six years to make what kind of a Supreme Court they choose.

Which was rejected; yeas 30 nays, 34.

Mr. CHURCH—I wish to change my vote. I misapprehended the question, and I may be misrepresented.

Mr. CORNELL was under a similar misapprehension.

By consent of the Convention, the word

"two," in the sixth line, was stricken out, and "three" inserted; also, the word "final" was inserted before the word "decision," in the third line; and all after the word "be," in the ninth line, was stricken out, and the words "eight years" inserted.

On motion of Mr. KINGSLEY, the section was amended by inserting after the word "necessary," in the fourth line, the words "after six years."

Mr. BRITAIN moved to strike out all after the word "constitution," in the fifth line, to and inclusive of the word "State," in the sixth line, and insert in lieu thereof, "to be elected in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe."

Mr. CHURCH—I am opposed to the proposition for the reason that induced me to offer a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe. Although an ardent friend of a separate Supreme Court, yet I am convinced that the other system will prevail, temporarily at least. I therefore desired that the substitute of the gentleman from Monroe, if passed, should be so in the form most acceptable to the friends of the separate court system, and valuable to the people at large. The great trouble has been that the Legislature left the broad path of the constitution: they made and unmade courts, and it led to a deal of trouble. If the change should be made, I should like to have a separate court, of a distinct character. If the Legislature act upon the matter, they should not indulge in all kinds of wild schemes, but should have a plain specific plan to pursue. Leave the Legislature nothing to do but bring into action a court, the form and character of which is fixed. Therefore, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Berrien. Some reference has been made to this bill. I am afraid that this bill is a kind of bastard; it is the son of no father, to use the language of the law; I do not know who has it in charge. At the request of the committee I reported it, but I am no friend to it. Those who are in favor of this judicial system can probably take care of it during the discussion on its merits, which it must meet in this body. I make this remark because if we have to swallow the dose, I want the thickest kind of sugar coating upon it. I am opposed to giving the Legislature an opportunity to do as they choose; for if they take up the matter of a separate Supreme Court, it may be full of absurdities. The last subject that I would trust the Legislature with, would be a reform in the judiciary.

Mr. BRITAIN—I do not propose to make an argument; but I cannot help remarking that the cry with some gentlemen, when I was endeavoring to secure the people's rights, was, "oh, leave it to the Legislature."

The Legislature is the same to me all days; not one day to have full power, the next day not to be trusted. I have always treated it with confidence, and I felt that I was entitled to do so from long acquaintance with it. I want to secure to the people such a court as the people want. How do we know that the people will want a separate Supreme Court elected by general ticket? Does the gentleman from Kent know that the people will want it? If they do, will they not obtain it through the Legislature? They may want one plan, or they may want another; we can not tell which they would prefer. It may be refused by this Convention; but that is no evidence that it is not right. I have presented amendments which have been rejected at the time, but which have afterwards become the law of the land. I might instance the exemption law of 1837. If gentlemen are willing that the people may have a separate Supreme Court, they ought to be willing that the people may have it as they wish.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out the section, (2,) and substitute the following in lieu thereof:

"The Supreme Court shall consist of three judges, two of whom shall form a quorum; and the concurrence of two shall be necessary to every decision. And the Legislature shall have power, after the year 1855, to provide by law for the election of an additional judge of said Supreme Court; and also to provide that the concurrence of three of said judges shall be necessary to every final decision. And the Legislature may also provide that each of the judges of the Supreme Court shall be authorized and required to hold one term of the Circuit Courts in each and every year in any of the counties of the State, in which more than two terms of such circuit shall be annually held. The final decisions of the judges shall be in writing, and signed by those concurring; and a judge dissenting from a decision, shall give the reason for such dissent in writing under his signature."

Mr. B. said—The proposed amendment will probably bring up a struggle between the friends of the two systems; but it may as well be here as after. After it is ascertained which system is preferred, but little further discussion will be necessary. It will be remembered that the majority was very small for the Circuit Court system, and it can hardly be expected that whatever system prevails, it can do so by a large majority. I feel more confidence in offering this amendment in learning from recent intelligence that the people are wedded to a separate court system. I believe it is almost the unanimous sentiment of the people of Wayne, Macomb and Oakland. Other counties, I believe, through their delegates, have expressed themselves against it. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I am always happy to define my position. I am always ready to show my hand. Under no circumstances will I dodge any question. I am in favor of an independent Supreme Court, for various reasons. I am sorry that I was not here during the discussion, for I might have received some new light. I hope that the substitute of the gentleman from Macomb will prevail.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I am in favor of the Circuit Court system, but I want the legal gentlemen to examine the bill thoroughly, and see if it is right. The gentleman from Kent says that the bill came in without a father; that it will not have much support. We have waited a long time without the bill being reported. If it is improper, it should be changed. He says that the majority is small; but it has been repeatedly tried, and I am willing to vote for it again.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I have looked at the article since it has been printed, and it contains some provisions which I do not approve, although they can easily be remedied by the Convention. The question has been fully discussed, and not alluding to myself at all, it has been ably argued upon both sides. All the arguments have been heard by the members, and as I wish them to be all present, I move a call of the House.

The same being ordered, there were absent without leave, Messrs. BARNARD, J. CLARK, CROUSE, LEE, McLEOD and MOSHER.

On motion of Mr. BAGG, the Sergeant-at-arms was dispatched to secure the attendance of Messrs. CLARK, CROUSE, LEE, McLEOD and MOSHER.

Mr. CORNELL—As the business of the Convention is at a stand, while the Sergeant-at-arms is bringing in the absentees, I wish to say a very few words. The objects for which courts were instituted are well known. They are instituted to explain the laws and protect the interests of citizens. The less litigation that arises in a community, the more peace and happiness there will be. The more distinct courts there are, the more litigation there will be, and consequently more difficulty among the community. What effect shall we produce, if we change our system to an independent court? Will there not be more likelihood of litigation—more appeals to an independent body in a distinct court, than there would be if the Supreme Court were composed of the circuit judges?

Mr. CHURCH—What does the gentleman mean, questions of law or of fact?

Mr. CORNELL—I do not know whether the gentleman wants to convince me, or not. I presume that I understand the question. I meant to speak so plain that common folks could understand me. It has been said that there are judicial sympathies. If we acknowledge it, we impeach the integrity of the court. I am willing to admit that they are men of integrity. It has been said that they would decide better by the independent court system. Is it not a fact that the best judges we ever had were trained in the Circuit Court? The best reporters we ever had were also trained under the Circuit Court system. The President, I see, shakes his head. I differ from him. It is according to my experience. If the people want a change, they can effect it. I am not going to inflict a speech upon this Convention. I think that the Circuit Court system will be the best for the people at present. They will not be so apt to appeal; and if they do appeal, the same men can give as just a decision as other men; but I suppose that I might talk for an hour and do no good.

Mr. WALKER—Much may be said in favor of a nisi prius system, especially when it is adopted in a well settled, compact population. At the same time if our State was densely populated, there would be an objection at the present time to adopting the system, for this reason: that it has been tried in this State, and condemned. The people have rejected it, and as far as I am acquainted with their sentiments, they have an invincible repugnance to returning back to the old system.

But, waiving that point, if we had here to decide between an independent court system and a nisi prius court system, complete in all its parts, we might hesitate; but we have under consideration a system, by what name I do not rightly know how to term it. By referring to the various sections, gentlemen will find that it cannot be named—it is a mixture of incongruities—it is a slander upon the nisi prius system, which has merits; this is neither one thing nor the other.

If we had the two systems, circuit court and independent court, fairly before us, I might doubt which to choose; but when a system like this is endeavored to be thrust down our throats, I must vote against it; and any arguments that might be drawn from the workings of the nisi prius system, would be inapplicable, as applied to this.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—I wish the gentleman had given us something besides denunciation. I regret to see him use language of that kind upon this floor. The gentleman was in the minority of those in committee who were in favor of a Circuit Court system. If he has seen fit to change his convictions, he should not use language like this.

The CHAIR said what had passed in committee was out of order here.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—I did not propose to refer to what passed in committee, but I referred to his first votes.

It was the intention of the framers of this bill to meet the views of a majority of this Convention, so that we might harmonize in our views upon this question. I am not aware that the gentleman from Macomb has assigned any particular objection to it, so I shall not go into a discussion upon its merits. Every one must see the propriety of the adoption of this section. There is not a multiplicity of officers; it assigns duties to a judge who is known as a judicial officer; provides for the discharge of duties by that officer. It provides that such other judges may be added as may be deemed expedient by the Legislature; provides for the local duties by the local judge, such as may be deemed necessary and convenient for the people.

As I have spoken on the subject, I will further say that it is not without a proper parentage. It has the sanction of that portion of the committee who were in favor of a Circuit Court system. It embraces the features that would have been reported by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. Crary,] if he had not been at the time, unfortunately, sick. So that as far as parentage is concerned, it has the sanction of that portion of the committee.

Mr. BAGG—I shall only mention one point—its having no father. Whether it has one or not, I do not know. I rather think it looks like a mongrel, as if it had a variety of fathers. It looks to me like the hybrid class; and they never can generate. The gentleman from Jackson [Mr. Cornell] says that the less litigation there is, the better; consequently the court that will give us the least law will be the best. So the Circuit Court will be the best, because it gives us less litigation, as there would be fewer appeals than there would be if we had an independent court.

Mr. CORNELL—I said the more distinct the systems, the more litigation there would be.

Mr. BAGG hoped the gentleman would give us his point. He said there was more order in the Circuit Court.

Mr. CORNELL—I said the greater the number of courts—

Mr. BAGG—I believe the gentleman has rather modified his position since I took the floor. You may have order in an independent court, and you can have order in a Circuit Court; but by compelling them to mix together, you destroy that order, and I am therefore opposed to the system. If a man feels aggrieved in a justice's court, he can carry it up to the Supreme Court. That is not denied by the gentleman from Jackson. But if he only carries it up to the Circuit Court, according to his principle that the circuit judges shall review their decisions as supreme judges, should not the justices help the circuit judges to review the decisions they gave in the justices' court? I think this is a fair inference from his arguments.

Mr. CHAPEL—I ask the indulgence of this Convention for a few moments. I have not had the pleasure of hearing what the distinguished members have had to say upon this subject, which I regret, as I might have had some new light upon the question. I have a different view from a majority of this Convention on this subject; so I think it my duty to explain the reasons why I shall vote against the bill. I look upon this constitution as standing on the edge of a precipice, and advancing to destruction, for the reason that a majority here have decided against an independent Supreme Court, and decided in favor of returning to the old system which was rejected by the people, and gave way to the County Courts, which were instituted in its place.

The County Courts have become unpopular, because they did not keep up the proper influence of a court. It did not bring in influential men to make it become popular. But with regard to the present system proposed, it is my belief, and I have taken some pains to ascertain the fact, that nine-tenths of the people of Oakland and Macomb are in favor of an independent Supreme Court. I called upon H. L. Stevens, of Pontiac. He told me that although he was in favor of a Circuit Court, yet he had no doubt that nine-tenths of the people of Oakland were opposed to it, and in favor of an independent Supreme Court.

I am in favor not only of striking out this section, but the whole bill. There are other sections that are obnoxious. I perceive that it only allows five judges to preside over five districts, to do all the business of the districts, and likewise to form the Supreme Court. Every body must see that it is impossible that these five judges can discharge all the duties, and sustain the proper dignity of a court. Five district judges would be occupied all the time in attending to the district duties; while, by the present system, they will have to leave their district duties to go and attend upon the Supreme Court bench.

They will have to bundle up their papers, and leave the business of the District Court in confusion. It has been done, and it has led to great complaint of the system.

The 16th section provides that the Legislature may institute some thirty judges, independent of the circuit judges, who are to occupy a sort of middle ground. I am afraid that they would not keep up the dignity that should attend a court. We demand that the supreme bench should be placed upon higher ground; we say that the people have repudiated the Circuit Court system, and we assert that an independent court will better satisfy the mind of the people.

Mr. McCLELLAND—We have had a full discussion of the matter. We have now had a speech from the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. CHAPEL.] I am willing to rest the question upon its merits.

The absentees appearing,

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The motion to strike out section two, and substitute as proposed by Mr. ROBERTSON, was lost—yeas 33, nays 36.

Section four having been read,

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, it was amended by striking out "said circuit judges," and inserting the word "law."

Section five being under consideration,

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, it was amended by striking out, in the first line, the words "shall have power," and inserting in lieu thereof, "it shall be the duty of."

Mr. WHITTEMORE moved further to amend the same by adding thereto, as follows:

"And testimony in cases in equity shall be taken in like manner as in cases at law; and the office of master in chancery is hereby prohibited."

Mr. WHIPPLE—The testimony in equity cases is exceedingly voluminous. Let us take a case in equity as in law. The parties that appear in cases of this kind are numerous; sometimes above the number of fifty. When they appear before the court, their testimony will have to be taken down in writing, because upon an appeal to the Supreme Court it must be heard upon its merits. The expense of taking down testimony will be great, and frequently parties will find it much less if it is taken down in the immediate vicinity of the place where they reside. I would suggest that the power should be left discretionary with the Legislature.

Mr. WHITTEMORE—I do not discover any difficulty. I do not see that the expense will be more in one case than the other. By the course proposed, parties will be brought into court.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I move to add, "by consent of parties."

Mr. WHITE—I think that one case can as well be tried in an open court as another. There is certainly a benefit in having the witnesses brought before the court; which cannot be done if the proceedings are taken before a master in chancery. I think that the witnesses would be fewer, and by that means it would save expense. It would undoubtedly inflict more labor upon the court, as the testimony will have to be all taken down in writing; but I do not think that a sufficient objection, as I consider it would tend to throw a safeguard around the citizen.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I agree with the gentleman from Oakland, for I see no reason why it should not be placed upon the same ground as common law proceedings. I would submit to the gentleman from Berrien, in a question in chancery, involving fraud, (and many cases do involve fraud,) whether the weight of the testimony would not in many cases depend upon the character and appearance of the witness. How can you arrive at this knowledge by his testimony reduced to writing? It is impossible, for the testimony of the most worthless, reduced to writing, has the same force as the testimony of the most upright and honest man that you can find; while taken in open court, the testimony of one man would probably not be entertained one moment, when conflicting with that of another. I am in favor of the latter clause, for I consider that a great deal of business which should properly be done by a sheriff is performed by a master in chancery. In many counties the emoluments from the office of sheriff are so small that men of sufficient qualifications will not take the office.

I have another objection. I have known masters in chancery taken from one end of the State to the other to receive testimony.

I have known in my own county persons bring their masters in chancery with them, although they lived at a considerable distance. Why is this done? The master in chancery does give a character to the testimony which it might not otherwise possess at all; and if the master is disposed to give a particular direction to the testimony of any witness, he can do so without any fear of detection. I see no difficulty in this amendment. In certain cases the parties can take the testimony out of court, and have testimony taken before a magistrate, or some competent person. I am therefore in favor of the amendment.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I fully agree with the gentleman from Monroe, that we can, by taking testimony in open court, prevent any collusion with the master in chancery, and have a better knowledge of the standing and credibility of the witnesses, and I think that, as a general rule, testimony in equity had better be taken in open court. But when both parties are willing to go before a justice of the peace, I think that this Convention has no right to control their action.

I do not care whether the office of master in chancery is in existence or not. If both parties assent to taking the testimony privately, they should be allowed so to do. I wish to make justice as cheap as possible; and there are many cases of revolting characters, which if taken in an open court will affect public morals. It had better be taken in the private rooms of a master in chancery.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. WHITTEMORE] will not prevail. While I agree with him and the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] that in many, perhaps most, cases the testimony in equity causes might very properly be taken in open court, yet I agree with the Chief Justice that it would be often highly improper, and in other cases entirely inexpedient. I would much prefer that the whole matter should be left to the wisdom of the Legislature. Even now, by statute, a party in a chancery suit has a right to claim an examination in open court, and this is sometimes done in cases where there is little testimony to be taken. But in how few instances do the parties claim this privilege, even when it is attended with less expense to them? I should hope the matter could be left as it is.

One of the benefits derived from the system of legal reform proposed by Denton and Allen, at the time that the present beautiful and harmonious fabric of County Courts was erected, is this reform now standing upon your statute books. There is no danger that the Legislature will recede from it. But are gentlemen prepared to say that all testimony in equity causes should be taken in open court? There are some suits brought on the chancery side of our Circuit Courts, as has been mentioned by the Chief Justice, in which it is exceedingly improper that the evidence should be given before a multitude of spectators. I allude to applications for divorce on account of adultery. True, the gentleman from Monroe says that at common law we have trials that introduce the same sort of evidence, and the same class of facts. I admit it. But I hold it to be wise to avoid all unnecessary indecencies in our judicial proceedings, which pander to a corrupt and vitiated taste. If we cannot avoid this in crim. con. cases, at common law, and criminal trials at the bar, let us, at least, keep clear of it as much as possible. And, sir, I do not speak unadvisedly when I say such examinations pander to a vitiated taste, and have an influence deleterious to public morals. I appeal to every man here upon this floor, who has attended courts, to bear me out in saying that the scenes witnessed in our courts during the trial of prosecutions for rape, furnish ample testimony in support of this position. The court rooms on such occasions are crowded to overflowing with eager listeners to the disgusting details.

But this is not all, sir. The testimony in chancery is sometimes so voluminous that if you preserve any of the features of equity practice, you impose an intolerable burden upon your judges, or some other officer connected with the court, and take up time uselessly which might better be disposed of in hearing causes. In the vast majority of cases, which consist of a dry detail of facts, the evidence might be taken before a Master, or some other officer designated, with entire safety to the parties, and much more to their satisfaction. But this is not all: if you leave it to the Legislature, they will give suitors an option, so that in those cases involving fraud, so frequently only to be reached in chancery, when it may be important that a witness should be examined in open court, the suitor would so elect. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Monroe, and my friend from Oakland, that in such investigations it is of infinite importance that not only the words, but the manner and looks of the witness, should be scanned. That then the purposes of justice require it—and I would be the last to place any impediment in the way of him who seeks in this way to attain a fair trial upon the merits—still, even then, unless the distinction between law and equity practice is entirely abolished, you do not provide a full remedy. For, on an appeal to the court of review, the pleadings and depositions only go up, and the suspicions and damning appearances in the witness himself, are there entirely lost. The reviewing court would only see the depositions, and might, and often would, come to a very different conclusion from the judge who tried the same at the circuit. In fact, we cannot attain complete justice in all cases by any mere human means. I have heard nothing yet which would induce me to vote to place this provision in the constitution.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—Would not the proposed system be less expensive?

Mr. ROBERTSON—Well, sir, I have not given that point much consideration, but I should think, on a hasty view, that if all testimony in equity cases were to be taken in open court, it would be very much more expensive to the people. Perhaps it might be cheaper for the suitors. I said before, the testimony on the equity side was sometimes very voluminous; if that was taken, as proposed, in the same manner as at common law, while a cause was going on, sometimes for a whole week, jurors, witnesses, parties, and all the officers of the court, would be kept waiting at a great expense. And the testimony, after all, might as well be taken before some other person during vacation, and submitted to the court, who could then in his room examine it and make up his decree.

It would evidently cost more to the people at large; and I will at all times protect them by my vote. I would much rather the parties themselves would pay the expenses, although in some cases it may be very hard upon them.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT, and a quorum being present, resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Judicial Department.

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. WHITTEMORE to section five, the same was agreed to—yeas 38, nays 25.

Mr. GALE moved to amend the same section by inserting after "Circuit Courts," "but in no case shall they deprive any citizen of the privilege of practising in said courts."

Upon this the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GALE—I wish to make a remark or two; I do not mean to make a speech. This profession of law is the only class that have the privilege of making their own rules—of saying who shall or who shall not practice in their courts. The practice of medicine, that is fully as important, is not subject to this restriction; the practice of divinity is not so restricted. Any man may give either medicine or gospel and collect his dues. I have no objection to this; I think that each should stand upon his own merits. I want the lawyers to stand upon the same platform with the priests and the doctors. A man's property is no better than his life or his soul. We allow a man to tamper with both soul and body, but not with property. I therefore hope the amendment will prevail.

And the amendment was agreed to—yeas 47, nays 20.

Mr. WHITTEMORE moved further to amend by adding to the section as follows:

"And the Legislature shall, as far as practicable, abolish all distinction between law and equity proceedings."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out "as far as practicable;" which was lost—yeas 21, nays 46.

Mr. WHITTEMORE's amendment was then agreed to.

Sec. 6 having been read,

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend the same by striking out the words "reside after election," and insert the words "be elected by the qualified electors thereof."

And the same prevailed.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend section 7 by striking out the words "of this State," in line 3 of said section, and by inserting the words "of said circuit;" which was agreed to.

Section 8 being under consideration,

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out, in the second line, the words "and not prohibited by law;" but the amendment was lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend section 9 by striking out of lines 2 and 3 the word "and shall hold no other office of trust or profit during the term for which they are elected," and insert, "and shall be ineligible to any other than a judicial office during the term for which they are elected, and for one year thereafter."

Mr. R. said—I make this motion with the assurance that I have the people of the State of Michigan agreeing with my views. I am positive with regard to the fact, because they have voted with regard to this very measure. An amendment to the constitution was proposed, disqualifying judicial officers from other offices of trust and profit, during the term for which they were elected and for one year thereafter, which was adopted by a large majority. There has been a difficulty in knowing what was the sentiment and wish of the people. There can be no doubt about this, because it is but recently that the expression of the people was heard upon this subject.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I move to amend the amendment by striking out "and for one year thereafter." However the people of the State of Michigan may have voted with reference this subject, I think that the sober, second thought will convince them of the propriety of having it withdrawn.

Mr. ROBERTSON—The gentleman who represents the hard-fisted yeomanry, must be conscious that an immense majority of the people voted in favor of the measure which he wishes to strike out. Has there been any change of public sentiment? We have no evidence of that change. Are we to retrograde? I call upon him to give us good reasons why we should do so. It is but lately that the people have made the change. The people wish the judicial tribunal to be kept pure; and it has been suggested that the Supreme Judges regarded their office as a stepping stone to that of Governor; therefore they wished that it should be stopped; and yet, when it is known to be in accordance with their wishes, the gentleman from Oakland says they shall not have it.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I do not know that I can give reasons to satisfy the mind of the gentleman from Macomb, but I think I can satisfy any unprejudiced mind that that clause should be stricken out. I would inquire first, if any thing was gained in the way of reform by inserting that clause? I think not; and I therefore see no reason why the Supreme Judges should have this mark set upon them; that they should be deprived of the privilege of being elected to any office for one year after their judicial term has expired. I think that if it is confined to the term for which they are elected, it will be quite sufficient.

With regard to the argument of the gentleman from Macomb, respecting the voice of the people of Michigan, they were obliged to vote for the whole; in order to gain the first, they were obliged to vote for the last. Had it been presented separately, the overwhelming majority might not have been found. These are the reasons that operate upon my mind. I am not aware that they have made the office a stepping stone to other offices, and I wish the clause stricken out.

Mr. BAGG—Had the gentleman been in the State of Michigan as long as some others, he would not have made the speech that he has. The people have got the impression that the Circuit and the Supreme Judges have been the means of working a great deal of the political machinery of the State. We have endeavored to keep them apart from politics as much as possible. We elect them in the spring solely upon that account.

I have closely watched the workings of the judges of the land, and I am satisfied that they have considerable influence with the choice of governors and senators of the United States. I think it is right that they should be disqualified for one year thereafter; they are but men; they have our passions and our infirmities. They are likewise ambitious, and their hope is to rise to the highest round of the political ladder.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH's amendment was then lost—yeas 28, nays 37.

The amendment offered by Mr. ROBERTSON was then agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend section ten by inserting after the word "decision," in first line, as follows:

"The decisions made by the Supreme Court shall be in writing, and signed by the judges concurring therein; and any judge dissenting therefrom shall give the reasons of such dissent in writing under his signature; and said opinion shall be filed in the office of the clerk of said Supreme Court."

And the same was agreed to.

Mr. BAGG moved to amend section 11, by inserting after "purposes," in the second line, "and in counties containing 20,000 inhabitants, a Circuit Court shall be held four times in each year."

Mr. J. CLARK moved to strike out "20,000," and insert in its stead "10,000."

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to strike out "20,000," and insert "15,000."

Mr. J. CLARK—The gentleman cannot be acquainted with the judicial business done in St. Clair county. There are but few counties in which there is so much business required to be done, and yet the population will probably not reach 10,000. I was in favor of making it 9,000 so as to reach our county, as it will be impossible for one circuit judge to perform the business with four sessions per year. It is a lumber country, full of litigation; and except something like justice is done us, I shall feel it my duty to take no further part in the proceedings of this Convention.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I wonder that gentlemen cannot attend to the section. We are disposed to think we have all the wisdom of the world in this Convention. The Legislature can increase the number of the courts, and I would rather leave it to the Legislature. They have the power to compel the judges to hold circuits in any county as often as business requires them to be held; and I consider it should be left to them; not put in the Constitution. Anything except dollars and public lands, I am willing to leave to the Legislature. I will, however, withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CHURCH—If the gentleman from

Monroe withdraws his motion, the question is upon the amendment to the amendment; and I am in favor of the proposition. Each bill contains such a provision as this, except the bill of the gentleman from Oakland, which provides that not less than three terms of the court shall be held, when the population is fifteen thousand. I wish to have this fixed in the constitution, so that there can be no doubt about it.

I hope that the circuit judges will not be removed from the circuit to attend to the protracted session of the Supreme Court. If that is decided upon, the number of the circuit judges must be increased. We wish to avoid delays; we wish to take the questions as they rise. The best time to try a law suit is as soon as possible. Delays are injurious in every point of view. Parties are driven to a compromise inconsistent with their rights, when there is wealth on the one hand and poverty on the other; and the people will only be satisfied with a system that gives them frequent sessions of the Circuit Court. There are no places in which the judges should go less than twice a year; and where the population reaches 10,000, they should be compelled to hold four terms per year.

Mr. McCLELLAND—My friend from Kent must recollect that he has been opposed to it throughout. We do not expect him to support it.

Mr. S. CLARK—Experience has shown that it is impossible to manage the judicial business of our country with the Circuit Court system. One week is generally lost preparing to do business. Witnesses come 100 miles, and at a great expense; while frequently not more than one case has been tried during the whole term, in consequence of the protracted suits that grow out of the lumbering business of the county.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The county of St. Clair is an exception to the general rule. The county of Macomb has a population larger than St. Clair, and the litigation is much less in the former county. The Legislature might provide for an additional number of terms for that county.

Mr. BAGG—Some gentlemen seem to play upon a board painted "black" and "white." Sometimes they cry "black," and sometimes "white." When they want a thing themselves they must have it fixed in the constitution. When they do not, they cry, "leave it to the Legislature." We want it settled. We do not want it to be left to the alterations and decisions of the Legislature.

Mr. BRITAIN—The people do not care so much whether the business is managed by a Circuit Court or a County Court, but they ask that the business shall be done expeditiously. I hope that this Convention will secure to them the benefit of speedy justice without one great objection; that is the expense that has heretofore attended it. In my county the county judge gets $600 per year. If we make eight districts we shall still have to put six of the smaller counties in one district. If we make six judges, a great saving will be effected, although the duties of the circuit judge will be arduous.

The State should be so districted that justice should be extended to every man's door, and then it will be cheaper than the County Court system. By so districting the State that each judge may employ his whole time in his business, the ends of justice will be answered for half the money, if you have even to elect ten judges; but I think that eight can do the business. I was glad to see the decision of the delegate from St. Clair. The gentleman from Monroe says the Legislature will do what is right. How has it been before; and what assurance have we that they will do so hereafter? We have two means of judging: by what has taken place; secondly, the condition of things.

The Legislature assembles, and the gentleman from St. Clair prays for an increase of the circuit terms. What does he find? Do the judges who have been elected want their business increased? Will they be anxious to hold six terms, when they may consider that the county can get along with two? They will not; they will want to get along with as few as possible. The Legislature will enquire of the judges; and who knows better than the judges, or has more influence with the Legislature? They may make the Legislature believe that it is all folly to make an increase of terms; that the business will soon be closed up.

Business men tell me that it is as necessary to close up the business as promptly and as cheaply in the new counties as the old counties; and I am assured that the county I represent will not be satisfied with less than four terms every year. My colleague wanted but one term in the small counties. That is not the wish of his constituents. I never heard one expression of the kind from a western man. I hope that business will be done promptly, and that every county with 10,000 inhabitants will have four terms of the court every year; that the Legislature, out of deference to the judges, may not withhold justice from the counties.

Mr. CHURCH—I am a friend to the separate court system, but this is the wish of a majority of the Convention. I have, however, supported the amendment in good faith, in the endeavor to make this as acceptable as I can to my constituents; and if the gentleman from Monroe supposes that I am endeavoring to destroy his system, or am actuated by a feeling of hostility to it, he is mistaken.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Not at all.

Mr. CHURCH—For this would be rather expensive to set right. The remarks of the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] are correct: it is not so much matter whether we call it Circuit Court or County Court, but we want a court four times a year; but few would say they wanted it twice a year.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I did not believe that the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] by his speeches and votes, was actuated by a feeling of hostility to the bill; but I did regret to hear him give a name to the bill that was obnoxious to the friends of the measure.

Mr. CHURCH—I did not, however, mean to destroy the bill.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—Some counties need two terms, some four terms, some may need more; let the Legislature determine the exigencies of each case.

Mr. J. CLARK—If the gentleman will except the county of St. Clair—

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—They may keep open court all the year, if they choose, in St. Clair.

Mr. J. CLARK—They will need it. What chance, I would ask, would a whig have of receiving attention at the hands of a democratic body, or what would a democrat receive at the hands of a whig? Yet that will be our position. We shall, by the single district system, be whig beyond redemption. We cannot expect henceforth to send a democrat to the legislative body; and while we have a voice upon this floor, we beg of you to secure to us our rights; place them so that they cannot be abused, by placing the safeguards in the constitution itself. Do I ask too much? I appeal to every legal gentleman here. It is well known to them that the legal business of St. Clair far surpasses that of the counties of Macomb, Lapeer, and others of the same or more population than St. Clair. We do not want to be left to the care of the Legislature. We do not want this interminable delay; but we do want and we do insist that this Convention will secure to us our rights.

Mr. WALKER—I hope the amendment will be made; for the expense of keeping witnesses in attendance on the court, again compelling their attendance if the cases are not disposed of, will in my opinion be more than enough to pay the expenses of the court, if frequent terms of the court were held. I wish to have this placed in the constitution, for the Legislature will not be able to grant increased numbers of terms with the proposed judicial force, if four terms of the court are required to be held in each county when the population reaches 10,000; and I should like to see inserted a provision that the number of judges may be increased when required by the business of the counties; for it has ever been a complaint against the Circuit Court system, that there were not frequent terms enough to carry on the proper business of the counties.

When a case has to wait, some of the witnesses may be wanting when it is called. It is frequently productive of hardships; and I should prefer, to the delay that has been experienced, to appoint even twelve judges for the State.

The amendment to the amendment prevailed; yeas 47, nays 15.

Mr. BAGG'S amendment was then agreed to.

Section 16 being under consideration, Mr. McCLELLAND moved to strike it out and substitute the following:

"Sec 16. The Legislature may provide by law for the election of one or more persons in each organized county, who may be vested with such judicial power as the Legislature may prescribe, not exceeding those of a judge of the Circuit Court at chambers."

Mr. McC. said it was the same as contained in article 27, section 19. We considered it proper that one such officer, at least, was absolutely necessary in each county, to save travelling an unnecessary distance to have the judicial business performed, that could otherwise only be performed by a judge.

A division of the question was had, and the motion to strike out the section was first put and carried.

On motion of Mr. BAGG, the proposition of Mr. McCLELLAND was amended by adding thereto, "in counties having a population of less than ten thousand inhabitants, by the last preceding enumeration provided for in this constitution, these powers may be devolved upon the judge of probate."

The substitute for section 16, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to amend section 17 by striking out "four," in the 1st line, and inserting "two."

Mr. CHURCH—The question has been presented before for the consideration of the Convention, and it has been invariably decided that four justices should be retained. I have no strong feeling on this subject, but as the justices will have a limited criminal jurisdiction, I think that it is convenient to have four justices in a town. If we elect but two justices, and one is sick and the other is absent, justice will be brought to a stand still; and while there are four elected, the business is chiefly done by one. It is a great convenience to the inhabitants, and it can be no detriment if the usual number are required to be elected.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE said that the townships might elect four if they chose; it would be the duty of the town to elect two, and more if it was required.

Mr. SKINNER offered the following as a substitute for the section:

"There shall be two justices of the peace in each organized township. They shall be elected by the qualified electors of the township, and shall hold their offices for four years, and until their successors are elected and qualified. They shall have such criminal and civil jurisdiction, and perform such duties as may be prescribed by law. At the first election in any township, they shall be classified by law in such manner that one justice shall be elected biennially in each township thereafter. The Legislature may increase the number of justices in cities and in townships having over ——— inhabitants."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE withdrew his amendment.

Mr. EATON—I am opposed to it. This Convention have decided this matter again and again.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I would ask the delegate from Wayne if this is not a different proposition from those that were decided upon.

Mr. EATON—I cannot see the difference; and I propose to amend it so as to correspond with an article that we have already passed. This Convention has held different language in the article entitled "Township Officers." I cannot see the propriety of this amendment, when a different construction of what was meant must be inferred from the language used in other articles.

Mr. SKINNER—It does not clash.

Mr. BBITAIN—I think it is the best plan to elect four justices of the peace. Some who are elected do not expect to do much business; but some matters that they can attend to as well as others, for instance the acknowledgment of deeds, are a convenience to the inhabitants. I have seen a justice in the country a great convenience when the village justice was sick, while the election of four costs no more. I therefore hope the number will not be reduced.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the section was amended by inserting between "be" and "from," in the first line, the words "not exceeding."

The question recurring on the substitute offered by Mr. SKINNER, it was rejected.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the words "and probate" were stricken out of the first line of section 19, and the words "and for the election of judges of probate courts, on the first Monday of April, 1853," were inserted after "1851," in the second line.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, section 19 was further amended by striking therefrom, in line 1, the words "judges of the supreme court."

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, all after "and," in the second line, to and inclusive of the word "court," in the third line, was stricken out.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the words "an election shall be held" were inserted after "thereafter," in the third line.

Mr. GALE moved to amend the section by striking out of line 4, the word "fourth," and inserting in its stead, "second;" but the amendment was not agreed to.

The article having been gone through with by sections, and being open for general amendment,

Mr. J. CLARK offered the following to stand as section 21:

"Any male citizen of the age of twenty-one years, of good moral character, and who possesses the requisite qualifications of learning and ability, shall be entitled to admission to practice in all the courts of this State."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out "male citizen," and insert "person."

Which was accepted by Mr. CLARK.

The proposition as modified was then rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved the following as an additional section to the article:

"The Legislature shall have power to establish courts of conciliation, with powers and duties prescribed by law."

And the same was agreed to, by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, Morrison, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, President—58.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Danforth, Mowry, Newberry, Van Valkenburgh—5.

Mr. CHURCH offered the following substitute for section 20:

"Whenever a judge shall remove beyond the limits of the circuit for which he was elected, and whenever a justice of the peace shall remove from the township in which he was elected, or who, by a change in the boundaries of said township, shall be placed without the same, they shall be deemed to have vacated their respective offices."

Mr. ALVORD moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

The substitute proposed by Mr. CHURCH was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the vote was reconsidered by which an amendment was made to section 19, fixing the time for the election of judges of probate in April, 1853.

The amendment was then withdrawn, and the following was inserted in its stead:

"And the election of judges of probate, on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November, 1852."

On motion of Mr. GALE, the vote adopting the amendment proposed by him to section five, was reconsidered.

The amendment was then withdrawn, and

Mr. GALE offered the following as an additional section to the article:

"Every person of the age of twenty-one years, of good moral character, shall have the right to practice in any court in this State."

And the same was adopted.

On motion of Mr. RIX ROBINSON, section five of the article was amended as follows:

Insert in second line, after the words "Circuit Courts," "and simplify the same so far as practicable."

On motion of Mr. J. CLARK, the Convention then adjourned.

THURSDAY, (51st day,) August 8.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. CHURCH: of George Coggeshall and 37 others, citizens of Kent county, praying for the insertion in the constitution of a provision directing the Legislature to procure a cession from the United States of the unsold public lands within

REPORTS.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the committee on the government and judicial policy of the upper peninsula, submitted

ARTICLE —.

Of Upper Peninsula of Michigan.

Sec. 2. That the boundaries defined in the preceding section shall constitute a senatorial district, and be entitled at all times to at least one Senator in the Senate of the State.

The treasurers of the counties of Houghton, Schoolcraft, Marquette and Ontonagon, on the receipt of the said ————— per cent, shall pay the same over to the several township treasurers, within which any of the said mining companies are at work; and which said moneys when so paid over, shall be used for county, township and highway purposes, and in pursuance of the revised statutes of 1846, regulating the expenditure of the same.

Sec. 8. The Auditor General of the State shall collect from and of the said mining companies now incorporated, or to be hereafter incorporated, yearly, the one per cent; which said tax, when so collected, shall be in full and in lieu of all taxes to be paid to the State, and ————— of the same shall within ninety days thereafter, be paid over to the treasurers of the counties herein named, for the purposes aforesaid.

Sec. 9. The charters of the several mining companies may be modified by the Legislature, in regard to the term limited for subscribing to stock, and in relation to the quantity of land which a company shall hold; but the capital shall not be increased, nor the time for the existence of charters extended.

Which was read the first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered printed.

The article was accompanied by a written report, which was laid on the table and ordered printed.

The Convention having reached the order of unfinished business, took up the article entitled "Judicial Department."

Mr. SKINNER proposed to amend section 1 as follows:

Insert in the first line, after the words "probate court," the following: "As many district justice courts in each organized county as the supervisors thereof shall, in pursuance to law, establish judicial districts therein, not exceeding the number of representative districts."

Mr. SKINNER—Mr. President, I have given my support to the judiciary system in the article before us, because I thought it the cheapest, and, on the whole, the best. But, in my opinion, sir, neither this system, nor the other—I mean what gentlemen call the "independent Supreme Court system"—without some additions and modifications, will meet the wants and wishes of the people. It is true, as gentlemen have said, that judiciary reform is called for and expected; but these systems, in their present shape, do not, in my opinion, furnish the reforms demanded. What, then, do the people want? I will say in the general they want something practical; something adapted to their circumstances; something by which the disputes and difficulties arising among them can be cheaply and speedily settled. Give them this, and they will be satisfied; but give them a system that does not accomplish these ends, and they will not be satisfied, however beautiful in theory, or splendid in operation, it may be.

If the system now before us be adopted, without addition or alteration, we shall be thrown back about where we were when the present County Court system commenced; and I see nothing to prevent a recurrence of the evils then suffered, to prevent which our County Courts were established. What, then, were the crying evils complained of? Delay, expense. Our Circuit Courts could not then do the business that came before them in due season. It accumulated on their hands. Suitors, discouraged by delay, and disheartened by expense, were frequently induced either to abandon their suits, or to settle them upon unjust and unequal terms, rather than wait the tardy actions of the court for a trial. What will prevent a recurrence of these evils? We shall have more judges, it is true; but shall we not have more business, also, for them to do? Gentlemen should bear in mind that all the chancery business is now to be done by the Circuit Courts, and that we are going to compel them to take all the testimony in open court, as in trials at law. None of this immense chancery labor was done by our old Circuit Courts, and yet they were overrun with business. How, then, will they now, with two or three additional judges only, be enabled to clear their dockets? Increase your judges, say gentlemen, till they can do the business. Yes, you may increase them till they are as numerous as justices of the peace; but will you not then have an expensive system? Each of your judges must have a salary of twelve or fifteen hundred dollars; and, besides, will you not, by this means, have an unwieldy Supreme Court? True, the business can be done by this system, if you increase the number of your judges sufficiently; but is this the best mode of doing it? Cannot a portion of it, and a pretty large portion, be done much quicker and cheaper, and just as well, by some inferior tribunal, if one is provided? And if it can, is it not our duty to provide one?

Is it necessary or expedient to throw all the business above the present jurisdiction of justices of the peace, in the first instance, into the Circuit Courts? I do not believe it is. Why compel a suitor, who wishes to collect a note or account of two or three hundred dollars, living perhaps in a remote part of the county, to go to the county seat to do it? Why make him wait three, six, nine or twelve months, and perhaps more, before he can get judgment? Why make him so much travel and expense—in going to the county seat, taking and keeping his witnesses there day after day, and frequently term after term—when all this could be done at home just as well, nine times in ten, in one-fourth of the time, and for one-tenth of the expense? Here, sir, is the judiciary reform which I think the people want, and which I should be glad to let them have.

I know the court contemplated by my amendment will not suit a certain class. It looks very small to them. It is almost below even their contempt. They, of course, would not preside in, or practice before, a tribunal so humble; but it would, nevertheless, in my opinion, suit the people generally, and it is for them, as I suppose, that we are making a constitution.

It will not be proper in the constitution to go into detail; but if the Convention will allow me, I will explain what I mean by what is called in my amendment a District Justice Court, and what kind of a court I would have it. Well, sir, I would have the supervisors of each organized county authorized by law to establish as many judicial districts therein as the wants and convenience of the people, in their opinion, require, not exceeding the number of representative districts; in each of which I would have a district justice, elected for a term of five years, who shall be ex officio a justice of the peace, and also have exclusive jurisdiction above a justice to the amount of five hundred dollars, and concurrent jurisdiction with the Circuit Court to one thousand dollars, in all that class of cases that are now tried by justices of the peace, with the right of appeal in all cases. In forming these judicial districts, regard should be had to the condition and situation of a county, without attempting to get, in all cases, an exactly equal number of inhabitants. There are villages, or other centres of business, in almost all the counties, where the mercantile and mechanical business is mostly done; where, perhaps, there is a post office, mill, &c., and where, in short, the people meet to transact most of their business of various kinds. Take, for instance, the county in which I reside. There are five villages of considerable size scattered over the county, where the people of the adjacent neighborhoods meet to do their business—about as many, I suppose, as we should have representative districts. Now the judicial districts might conveniently be so arranged that one of these business centres would be in each district.

In the new counties, perhaps, they would not need more than a single district. The supervisors would know well the wants and wishes of the people in this respect, and would undoubtedly provide for them. At the end of each judicial term of five years, which would be as often as the census would be taken, these districts might be changed, enlarged or diminished, as might be requisite or convenient; or abandoned, if this court should be found unnecessary or useless.

The mode of doing business in this court I would have the same as in justices' courts. I would have process issued and made returnable in the same time; dockets kept in the same manner, and fees the same.

Can there be any very great objection to such a court? It will cost the public nothing. Those who dance will pay the music; or, in other words, those who employ the courts will pay them. If they do no good, they will certainly do no great injury. They will be like homœopathic doses, in this respect. Are gentlemen afraid that competent men cannot be found, or, if found, will not accept of such an office for such fees as justices have? I think they are mistaken. I don't suppose that men of great legal attainments can be obtained for every district; but, sir, I think that men of good sound common sense can be found, who, with the experience they will soon have, will be competent. It is experience that qualifies men for this as well as any other business. Why is it, sir, that you find competent justices in cities and villages, and generally nowhere else? Are they not made competent by experience? And is it difficult to find good and competent men, who are willing in such places to accept such offices? Not at all. The amount of business gives, in the shape of fees, what in the aggregate would amount to a handsome salary. I was told, sir, that the county judge in the county where I reside was very unwilling to accept of a nomination for the office of county judge, because he thought he could not afford to give up the office of justice, which he then held, for that of judge. His fees, probably, would be much more than his salary as judge; although the latter would be near or quite a thousand dollars. Well, sir, if the office of justice of the peace is in some cases so lucrative, with the amount of business that would probably be thrown into this district court, should it be established, I think there would be no difficulty in getting good and competent men to take the office—such as would generally give satisfaction. If, however, a party should be dissatisfied with a decision in this court, he can, by appeal, carry up his suit and have a new trial in a higher court, with very little more expense, and no more delay, than if it had been there commenced.

Sir, the advantages of such a court would, in my opinion, be many and great. It would bring justice home to every man's door, or sufficiently near for convenience. It would afford an opportunity to have a jury of the vicinage. We should probably hear no more complaint about delay and expense. It would be a cheap court, a speedy court, and ever open. It would greatly relieve our Circuit Courts, so that they would be enabled to clear their dockets in season. It would be a suitable and proper court for the trial of small crimes, and would be a safe substitute for grand juries to examine high offences, and bind over or commit, as might be necessary. It would be emphatically the people's court—just what they require. It would, in my opinion, give more satisfaction to the people than all the other judiciary reforms that have been suggested. Indeed, they will not long be satisfied without it, or something like it. Gentlemen may ridicule it as much as they please; if adopted, it will please the people; and if so, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. BAGG said—Although, when the gentleman from Washtenaw [Mr. SKINNER] had shadowed forth this new court, composed of a high justice or little judge, while debating the abolition of the grand jury, he was opposed to it, he should now vote for it. While this Convention was full, and we were not so dwindled down in numbers by disease and other causes, we had in this body a majority for what is called the separate or independent court. But now, for want of numbers, the tables are turned, and we are to have fastened upon us, these mongrel Circuit and Supreme Court systems, jumbled together into one. It was well known to this Convention that he had, by his voice and vote, endeavored to establish a separate Supreme Court, because it would be a system on which we could build. It would have order. The circuit system, as now adopted, was destitute of that "heaven's first law;" but this substitute would contribute to give the system order, and he should vote for it. He now felt bound to help perfect the mongrel court; and what would assist it so much, as this "poney judge?" Should this substitute prevail, he should move an amendment to have this little judge sit in bane in the Circuit Court, and review his decisions in the same manner that the circuit judges did theirs in bane, in the Supreme Court. This would embellish it with nature's first law. Again, we had commenced running the race of popularity, by making the supervisors perform not only a great share of legislation in the State, but conferred upon the Legislature power to give them more. We had also made them the Supreme Court of the State—the court of last resort. It was no more than right, while we were analyzing the government, and piecing out an item here and there, to give an increased morsel to the justices of the peace. We should not forget to give one constable in the district, the appellation of High Constable, to render the system perfect in all its parts; and then by oiling the machinery of its parts by self-interest, it would all go down well together. One other argument to recommend this modern democratic divisibility of spoil, in the small way, was, that instead of such a central village as Ann Arbor monopolizing all the judicial pap of the county, other little villages like Ypsilanti and Saline could catch many of the crumbs that fell from the judicial table. He thought that with this section super-added, the system of the chief justice of the State, and the member from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] would be complete. It had been said by the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] that it was an illegitimate child, having no father; but it was sufficient for him to know that these gentlemen had consented to stand as god-fathers and sponsors for the darling; and, of course the State, with such gentlemen for responsibility, could not be in danger. He hoped the substitute would prevail; it was all that was wanted to make the court one of order, of system and perfection.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to amend the foregoing by adding thereto, "and justices' courts are hereby abolished."

Which was not agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. SKINNER was then agreed to by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, Burns, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, Cornell, Crouse, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Leach, Lovell, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, N. Pierce, Prevost, Rix

Robinson, Skinner, Sturgis, Town, Wait, Webster, Whittemore, Williams—35.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Comstock, Conner, Gibson, Harvey, Kingsley, Lee, McClelland, Newberry, J. D. Pierce, Robertson, Soule, Storey, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, President—30.

Mr. HANSCOM offered as a substitute for the entire article, the article introduced by himself on the 5th inst., (see page 759,) modified so as to read, "in counties having a population of 10,000," in sections 13 and 16, instead of "15,000," as originally offered.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved the following as an additional section to the substitute:

"The Legislature shall have power to establish courts of conciliation, with powers and duties prescribed by law."

And the same was accepted by the mover.

Mr. GALE moved the following additional section to the substitute:

"Every person of the age of twenty-one years, of good moral character, shall have the right to practice in any court in this State."

Mr. MCCLELLAND moved the previous question on the article, and the same being demanded, and the question being, shall the main question be now put? the yeas and nays were ordered thereon, when,

On motion of Mr. ALVORD, a call of the Convention was ordered; and Messrs. McLEOD and ROBERTS were absent without leave; when the Sergeant-at-arms was dispatched to procure the attendance of the absentees.

Mr. CHAPEL moved the Convention adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn—yeas 10, nays 58.

The PRESIDENT announced the appearance of Mr. ROBERTS within the bar, and the confinement of Mr. McLEOD to his room on account of indisposition.

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The question being, shall the main question be now put? it was so ordered—yeas 39, nays 30.

The additional section proposed to the substitute by Mr. GALE was then agreed to.

The question now being on the adoption of the substitute proposed by Mr. HANSCOM for the entire article, the same was rejected by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Axford, Bagg, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Crouse, Daniels, Fralick, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Lee, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Whittemore, Williams, President—29.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Choate, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, Leach, Lovell, McClelland, Mosher, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Town, Wait, Warden, Webster, Whipple—41.

Upon ordering the article to a third reading, the yeas and nays were had, and the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Choate, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Daniels, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, Leach, McClelland, Mosher, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Webster, Whipple—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Axford, Bagg, Chandler, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Crouse, Fralick, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Lee, Lovell, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, Roberts, Sturgis, Walker, Whittemore, Williams, President—25.

So the article entitled "Judicial Department" was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. LEACH, the Convention was resolved into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. DANFORTH in the chair.

The committee took up for consideration the article "Miscellaneous Provisions."

Section one was read and passed over without amendment.

Sec. 2. Lands now flowed, and unimproved lands which may hereafter be flowed by the erection of mill dams, shall be paid for in the manner to be provided by law; and the actual value of the land flowed shall be determined by a jury of freeholders; and such value, and the expenses of determining the same, shall be paid by the party erecting the dam.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to add to section two:

“Provided, That the lands of any person shall not be flowed or used without the consent of the owner thereof.”

Mr. P. said—I see much difficulty in this section. I live on the side of a river, and I am opposed to having that river flowed up to my house, to the injury of my family. To destroy a man's farm and a man's family for the maintenance of a mill dam, is not right.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I would inform the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. N. PIERCE,] that it only contemplates unimproved lands.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I don't care for the land; I don't want the water flowed up to my door.

Mr. WILLIAMS—In all laws we must look to the interests of the whole community, not to the inconvenience of the few. If the Convention of 1835 had adopted such a provision as this in our constitution, an immense amount of money would have been saved, litigation averted, and ill feeling avoided. If we do not lay down some fundamental rule for the settlement of these cases, litigation will be endless, illimitable. In the present state of things, a malicious person may get possession of a few acres of flowed land, and the prosperity of a whole community depend on his caprice. “The greater the pig, the greater the mischief.” The difficulties involve the innocent as well as the guilty. I live in a village whose thrift depends mainly on manufacturing industry. If an ugly, malicious person could get possession of twenty acres of land under the mill pond, he could stop the wheels of industry, paralyze the energies, and impair the prosperity of the place. He could destroy, or at least injure the value of the property of a thousand people, and, what is worse, cut off a market for the agricultural people around. Fortunately, no such mischief can be incurred by us; but I do know of villages almost destroyed by the fact that, dog-in-the-manger like, men hold the entire property of a community between their thumb and finger.

When the State was first settled, farmers squatted on their lands; men of small capital, urged by solicitations of neighbors and friends, invested their limited means in the erection of dams and mills. Land apparently valueless was flowed, generally belonging to the government. Sometimes, by reason of errors, private lands were flowed. It was an obvious way to eke out slender means, to leave the flowed lands to be paid from earnings. Almost invariably the experiments proved disastrous, and all over the oldest settled parts of the State, men were found who would seize these flowed government lands, and lie in wait for opportunities to bleed their victims. On the breaking of dams they would procure injunctions and stop the mills. It is said these are private matters. It may be so, but this species of litigation, for the prompt settlement of which some just mode is sought, has a disastrous, withering effect on the public. In fact, oftentimes the injury to the vicinity is more fatal than to the belligerent parties themselves. There is scarcely a man among us who does not know, within the sphere of his observation, of cases of the kind I describe; instances of extreme cruelty and hardship, causing animosity, distress and ruin.

It is not for the present, only, that some method of settling these questions should be adopted. Looking to the future, it is still more important. If I mistake not the signs of the times, the day is not remote when the public lands will be gratuitously distributed in limited quantities to actual settlers. But nine millions of our whole area are already located. Twenty-five millions remain to be disposed of. Now, I want to lay down some fundamental law by which the relative rights and duties in this regard, of the millions who shall occupy this domain, shall be determined. We could confer on them no greater blessing than by taking warning from the bitter experience of the present generation, anticipate their difficulties, and avert from them the litigation and trouble, and loss, the present population must incur. Leave it to chance, and the man who gets his land as a boon may use it to embarrass all around him. He may show his gratitude to Providence—he may thank the government for their kindness by seizing and preventing the use of the element designed for the use of all. For one, I want to see some fundamental law now established, so that when any one of the future millions inhabiting both of our peninsulas, puts his spade into the earth, he may know exactly on what terms and conditions he does so.

I know it is said this is an infringement on private rights. We have set abundant precedents in this constitution, already. We have provided that inaccessible private property may be reached by obtaining a road over the land of another. Rail roads are authorized by general laws, and municipal corporations can take private property for general use. We must take the world as we find it. The troubles exist, and, some day, remedies must be found. A general remedy is here sought, which shall do harm to none, and benefit all. Such a provision, then, is demanded by every consideration of justice, policy and wisdom. Justice, as regards the present; policy, as regards the future.

The air, the water, and the earth, are given to mankind for their inheritance and enjoyment. The earth cannot become subject to a tenantry in common, but water approaches the air in its character. No man owns the running stream. I contend that no man should use this great gift of nature to the detriment of others. By its use, man's energies are multiplied and his comforts increased. A man in the accidental possession of the banks of a stream, which he neglects to use himself, should not be allowed to deprive others of its use above or below him, when compensation is provided, and no positive and direct wrong is inflicted.

Formerly the object of laws was more the protection of property. It is now more the protection of the individual man. The man must be protected first; the community of men next, and property last. Where the rights of property conflict with the rights of the individual, or the rights of the aggregate community, the former must yield; and whoever grasps a small part of the great common inheritance, and uses it in such manner as to prevent the development and welfare of the whole community, should be compelled to yield. It is no part of the duty of a wise government to render the whole family of man the victim of one; and to encourage one man to become a dog-in-the-manger towards his fellows.

The time may come when our population treads fast on the means of support. Their energies can be mightily increased by converting to purposes of industry all the water power of both peninsulas. In water power lies the capacity which enables one man to do the labor of many. Whoever by labor produces most, is a benefactor. He who uses the element in industrial pursuits, is a benefactor; and whoever prevents its use, is a curse. I said that if the Convention of 1835 had adopted some general rule to quiet this subject, they would have saved hundreds of thousands. If we do not do it at this time, we shall voluntarily suffer millions to be squandered hereafter, litigation to be perpetuated, and strife and contention to continue on this subject; all of which it is our duty to avert.

Mr. WHITTEMORE would add "unimproved lands now flowed."

Mr. WILLIAMS—There may be individual cases which it is difficult to provide for. It is the aggregate result that must be contemplated in a law or constitutional provision. At the worst, the injured party must obtain the full value, and all the damages. No wrong is done. On the other hand the instances are far more numerous, of men, from mere malice, obtaining small pieces of flowed land from malice. The result is, sometimes, to say nothing of ill blood and animosity—the result is waste and destruction of valuable property, in law suits. I know of property rendered useless, and dismantled and abandoned, in consequence of such troubles. In such cases the neighborhood suffers more than the parties in conflict. What more just to the parties themselves—what more just to the public—than to compel them to adopt a tribunal of a jury of free-holders to settle such serious difficulties? Gentlemen place the whole subject in the light, that the person flowed must be the innocent party. My experience convinces me that his antagonist is the innocent party in four cases out of five. Allow them to be equally innocent, equally responsible for blame. The community has its own interests to protect, adversely to both, and ought to take care of its welfare.

There are many other considerations I should like to present, but the committee are impatient and I will desist.

Mr. MORRISON said, in regard to the proposition of his colleague, [Mr. N. PIERCE,] if it were adopted, the matter would be left precisely as it stood before. By consent of parties, lands can be flowed now; but it is desirable, if it be possible, to obviate the difficulties which have heretofore been experienced. There are hundreds of cases where parties have erected dams without being able to ascertain exactly the extent of land which would be flowed; in which they have had to pay ten times the value of the damage.

If some equitable mode of settling the damages could be fixed in the constitution, it would result in a great saving of expense. Suits have been carried on to the ruin of parties, especially to those commencing the suit, who are generally ruined before they get through.

Mr. N. PIERCE—No man has a right to take my land, any more than I have to take his mill; yet it would be considered an outrage to take his mill, and have the damages assessed; but it would be no more so than his overflowing my land.

A man should not build a mill on a sandy foundation; he should know whom he is going to injure. One complaint against the gentlemen of the class my friend has described, is that they kill the people—that a mill dam is a damage to life—that sickness and mortality surround it. Should such a thing be protected? It is one of the most wicked things ever offered: to allow one man to take another man's property, and build up a pond to destroy his health and that of his family. If you think that moral, then has morality got to a pitch I never heard of before.

Mr. MORRISON—This is a question that has nothing to do with sickness. If a mill dam produces sickness, or becomes a nuisance, it can be provided for as other nuisances are. If the health of the inhabitants is jeopardized, it should be taken down.

We provide that corporations may be formed for the construction of plank roads and other purposes, by which we can ride through the gentleman's improved lands. Is it of more advantage to have a plank road than a mill? The advantages arising to the public from the erection of mills are equal to any other improvement in the State; yet not a mill can be built or a dam erected without overflowing lands.

Mr. CHAPEL hoped the amendment offered by the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE] would not be adopted. The gentleman was a great stickler for justice and other reforms; yet nothing would be found more beneficial to the community than the provision in the second section relating to mill dams. He [Mr. C.] resided in a level country, where it was almost impossible to get a water power without overflowing to a considerable extent; and yet mills are indispensable. At Lapeer they have a pond overflowing some 3,000 acres. It consists of a lake and extensive marshes, with here and there an island. Any person can go to the land office and enter a lot, and if the dam goes down, can prevent its erection. Such may be the consequence to those who have spent their fortunes, and toiled in a new country; and under the system of justice prescribed by the gentleman from Calhoun, they can have no redress or compensation.

At an early date, a mill was built at Canandaigua, in Oakland county, by which the whole of the neighboring district has been benefitted. It overflowed a marsh around a lake; the land around the lake was entered; after a time, the dam went down, and the land became bare of water; they immediately took out an injunction to keep the dam down; thus destroying the property accumulated by a life of hard labor. Is that the gentleman's justice, that would gratify a malignant person by making a bankrupt of another?

The present state of the law is really a great hardship when the vast interest is considered which is affected by it. The farmer, the agriculturist, is as much interested in it as the miller; as property invested in this manner enhances the value of their products. Many have erected mills at great expense, flowing back on wild lands; a person, from malice or some improper motive, may enter the lands, though flowed, knowing that a time may come when they may be bare, when they would slap in an injunction.

Mr. GALE expressed himself opposed to the amendment, and in favor of the section as it stood. Mill property was of much public benefit, and ought to be sustained. Wherever property was injured by overflowing, compensation should be made; but it should not be left in the power of one man to control the property of another. It ought to be fixed so that enmity could not step in and overrule justice. A public benefit should not be taken from the community at the caprice of an individual. If you take twelve freeholders, will they decide anything unjustly? Certainly not. They will have the same interests at stake.

In case of a mill dam making a place sickly, there is another remedy; it then assumes another character. The object of the section is only to allow the taking of a man's property which may be made a public benefit, as in the case of a highway.

The amendment did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the following was added to section 2: "but no person shall be permitted by flowing to injure any other improved water power."

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the words "and damages done" were added to line 2, and "damages" was inserted in 3d line, after the word "value."

On motion of Mr. CORNELL, the word "erecting" was stricken out of line 4, and "maintaining" inserted.

Mr. CORNELL moved to strike out "unimproved," in line 1; which did not prevail.

Mr. GALE moved to insert after "paid," in line 4, the words "or tendered;" which was afterwards withdrawn.

Mr. NEWBERRY moved to strike out section 2; but the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. DANIELS moved to strike out section 4, which reads:

"No mechanical trade shall hereafter be taught to convicts in the State prison of this State, except the manufacture of those articles of which the chief supply for home consumption is imported from other States or countries."

Mr. BRITAIN trusted the committee would duly consider the section before they decided on striking it out. It may be that in counties remote from the State prison, persons may not see or feel the necessity of retaining the section; but there are many considerations that should influence the votes on this question, in which the interests of the State were to a considerable extent involved.

Mr. N. PIERCE—If they will remove the prison to Marshall, we will not ask the State to stop the labor of the convicts. I have examined the prison, and I do not find an article manufactured there in which the market is overdone. Every thing sold there is surplus production. I do not believe it lowers the value of wagons one cent. It does not injure the working-men of Jackson one dollar in 365 days. If this motion prevails, I wish they would add a miscellaneous provision to remove the prison to Calhoun county. It is so much value added to the State, without injury to any one. Fifteen times as many wagons are brought into the State from other States as are made in the State prison at Jackson, and those made there do not lower the price one cent.

Mr. MORRISON did not agree with his colleague [Mr. N. PIERCE] in regard to moving the State prison to Marshall. He was satisfied that the mechanics of Calhoun county complained of the competition of the State prison labor, and had petitioned the Legislature in '49 and '50 on the subject. Mechanics say they can get those wagons up for fifteen dollars less at the State prison, than they can be afforded by the regular wagon makers. A man there will make a pair of boots in a day, for which the contractor pays 28 or 30 cents; a regular mechanic cannot make them for less than one dollar. No honest mechanic can manufacture them at that price.

Mr. N. PIERCE—Does not the gentleman [Mr. MORRISON] buy boots and shoes from the State of New York?

Mr. MORRISON—No sir; I can buy them from the contractor of the state prison cheaper than I can get them from the State of New York. What is the object of establishing the State prison? Is it not for the punishment of crime? Are we to put them there to compete with the innocent mechanic? They should be employed in such a manner as not to interfere with honest labor. We ought to consider the good of the whole, and especially ought we to protect honest industry.

Mr. STOREY—This section was a provision in the revised statutes of 1846. It was placed there, after considerable agitation among the people, and after the whole subject had been very thoroughly discussed in both branches of the Legislature, as the settled policy of the State in regard to prison labor. Two years after, sir, it was repealed; and how was it repealed? I will tell you, sir. It was repealed, as I believe, through the influence and for the benefit of interested contractors at the prison. The repeal bill did not pass the House until the last night of the session, and then, sir, it was smuggled through. I doubt whether one-half the members knew what the bill was when it passed. We had three members in the House at the time from Jackson county, and though it be not very complimentary to say it, it is nevertheless true, that neither of them were aware of the passage of the repeal bill; and yet one of them made it his particular business to watch it. I state this to show in what manner, and for what purposes, the section in question was repealed. The repeal was a fraud, and interested contractors reaped the benefit of it.

And what was the consequence of the repeal of this section? It was, sir, that the then existing contracts were extended some five years, at the low and inadequate prices previously paid; when, had the section been allowed to stand, and a re-letting of the labor of all the convicts taken place at the expiration of the existing contracts, an advance of from 40 to 60 per cent. upon the former receipts from contractors might have been realized by the State.

Now, sir, there is no fear that the adoption of this section in the constitution will operate injuriously to the State. I believe, rather, that in a financial point of view, it will be a beneficial measure. I believe that under it an advance of not less than sixty per cent will be had upon the prices now paid for labor in the prison at the next letting of the contracts. I believe that under it, in two years, the prison will be a self-supporting institution. I have no doubt of it, sir. The most profitable contract now existing is one which does not interfere with mechanical trades in the State; and it is my own judgment that, hereafter, those will be most profitable which do not thus interfere.

But, sir, whether the prison will support itself or not, is a question of minor importance, when compared with the great considerations of RIGHT and WRONG, involved. In my view, the State has no right to erect a monopoly which will interfere with the single-handed industry of any class of her citizens. Every class of labor is entitled to the protection of the State, rather than to be brought into competition with her. Such competition is unfair, unjust and ruinous. No class can stand up under it. It operates as a blight and a mill-dew, sir. Far better would it be, and much more in consonance with equality, and justice, sir, to levy a tax upon all the property of the whole State to support the public prison, than that a single class of citizens should be made to support it, and that a laboring class. And, sir, were it necessary to levy such a tax, (and I am glad to say it is not; for, as I said before, I believe the prison will be able to support itself,) instead of carrying on those branches of business which interfere with individual mechanics, it would be good State policy to do so. What class of people do more to build up your cities and villages? Who add more to the wealth and to the taxable property of your State than the mechanics? Next to the farming interest, sir, the mechanic is of the most value to the State. He is indispensable. He is one of the great spokes in the wheel—aye, sir, he is one of the wheels itself—upon which we all roll on to prosperity and greatness. What folly, then, to pursue any course of policy which has a tendency to keep this class of citizens out of our State, or to drive away any portion of those who are already here.

There has been a large number of petitions, very numerous signed, sent up here from different portions of the State, asking a constitutional provision upon this subject. I think these petitioners know as well what is wanted by the mechanics of the State as the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. N. PIERCE,] who preceded me. I know very many mechanics who are fully the equals of that gentleman in intelligence, and perhaps his superiors in many other respects, who understand this question practically as well as theoretically; and, sir, they demand relief, and will continue to demand it until they obtain it.

And, sir, before I sit down, I have simply this to say: that if this Convention, of its own volition, does not settle this question, a spirit is rising in the State which will settle it. If the present policy is persisted in, if a class is continued to be singled out and oppressed, that class, by their votes, will redress themselves. There is no mistake about it, sir. The evil must be corrected; and the sooner it is done, the better. New York went through the excitement of a contest of this kind, and the result was that she had to change the whole direction of her prison labor; and she lost nothing by it.

The motion to strike out the section prevailed.

Section 5 was then read:

Sec. 5. All rivers and streams of water in this State, in all places where the same have been meandered and returned as navigable by the surveyors of the United States, are hereby declared navigable to such an extent that no dam, bridge, or other obstruction may be made in or over the same without authority, granted by the authority of the Supreme Court, under a general law to be enacted by the Legislature of this State.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following as a substitute for section 5:

"No navigable stream in this State shall be either bridged or dammed without authority from the board of supervisors of the proper county, under the provisions of existing laws. No such law shall prejudice the right of individuals to the free navigation of such streams, or preclude the State from the further improvement of the navigation of such stream."

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped the amendment would not prevail. It would lead to endless litigation. No act, either of the Legislature, or of the board of supervisors, can alter the supreme law of the land. The Supreme Court will know whether an act conflicts with the rights of private persons or the public, or the ordinance of '87. The Supreme Court should decide the matter in the first instance.

Mr. CHURCH said it was provided that no damming or bridging of streams should be effected without due notice being given to the parties interested, so that a fair hearing might be had in respect to their rights, and a proper decision had. Having that in view, the committee were of opinion that the Supreme Court would be the most proper tribunal to decide in each case. The court will sit in every district; at one session, notice might be given to all parties concerned; at the next, objections could be made and answered, and the decision of the Supreme Court could then be made as to the propriety of bridging or damming, as would, most probably, be satisfactory. To obtain a careful examination of the rights of parties, and a well considered decision, the committee were of opinion that the Supreme Court would be the most proper tribunal. Perhaps some little more expense might be incurred in the beginning, but afterwards, that expense may be avoided. A decision by the board of supervisors might be made without a proper understanding of the rights of parties, so that litigation would spring up.

[Mr. C. referred to bridges built across the Grand River, under an act of the Legislature.] Owners of steamboats have come forward and said if they are not taken down, or some arrangement made so that steamboats can pass, they will enter proceedings against them, as they are entitled to have the navigation free, under the provisions of the ordinance of '87. Had due notice been given to parties, the proprietors of steamboats and others interested in having the stream free of obstructions, would have presented themselves, and the rights of parties would have been protected, while the interests of the public had been promoted, and no opportunity afforded or place left open for dispute. It would be far preferable to have safe and deliberate decision, though it might be attended with a little more expense in the out-set, than a cheap and hasty one, which would let in interminable litigation.

Mr. WHIPPLE would suggest the propriety of confining the authority of supervisors to the erection of bridges. The public are interested in the construction of mills, but they are deeply interested that the streams are not permanently obstructed by the erection of dams. The subject of mill-dams had better be left to some responsible court. To protect the interests of the public, under the ordinance of '87, he thought the power should be reserved to the Circuit or Supreme Court.

Mr. CHAPEL said he did not see the force of the argument of the chief justice, [Mr. WHIPPLE.] A law may be passed regulating the matter, authorizing them to require a lock to be built where rafts or boats are required to pass. Mill-dams, constructed according to law, improve the navigation, where a lock is constructed to let boats and rafts pass; and yet the waste water may be valuable for impelling machinery.

I am opposed [said Mr. C.] to bringing everything the people do into the courts. This is decidedly a matter which should be settled by the constitution; some distinct board should be established, or some principle fixed to facilitate the erection of dams on some safe basis. He believed men would be found on the boards of supervisors, as competent to determine and decide on the propriety of erecting a dam, as two or three judges on the bench. He believed judges as likely to be influenced by feelings of partiality as others. He wanted something fixed and settled.

Mr. WHIPPLE said the court was not so likely to be interested in the locality; besides, a man erecting a dam in one county might interfere with the rights of those in another county. He thought the power would be best left with the Circuit or Supreme Court; but he made no motion on this subject; he left it in the hands of his colleague, who he knew was disposed to do what was right.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE proposed to add to the amendment, "except as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. WILLIAMS—The gentleman from Macomb [Mr. CHAPEL] wants to know when he builds a dam, if he is secure in the right.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—May not the decision of the court be overruled?

Mr. WILLIAMS—I will answer that question. I recollect a case in which the Legislature authorized the building of a dam. The right was contested and brought into court. The counsel thought the act of the Legislature of so little account, that he did not condescend to read it. It would be altogether improper to authorize the supervisors to do what the courts may reverse. Dams ought not to be erected without the authority of law. If streams are navigable, (and the question has to be tried as a question of fact, whether the stream be navigable,) all that a person has to do is, to ascertain whether a stream be navigable; if it is not, the Legislature can authorize the building of a dam, and it will be safe. I live (said Mr. W.) on a stream that runs through two States, and we have felt the inconvenience of those unconstitutional laws. They have built three or four bridges across the St. Joseph river in the State of Indiana, and two dams of the very worst description. If you give this power to supervisors, they can reduce the value of every foot of land in the county above them. Every foot of land in St. Joseph county is injured by obstructions on the river St. Joseph, as it passes through Indiana.

If supervisors are allowed to put bridges and dams across rivers, their authority for so doing will be of no weight; the question of right will be taken to the courts; it will necessarily lead to litigation and increased expense. The gentleman from Macomb says he wants to know his right when a dam is erected. That he cannot know by leaving the matter discretionary with the boards of supervisors. The law anticipated from the Legislature must be a general law, embracing all the rights belonging to individuals and the public. Under such a general law, let the Supreme Court decide when locks shall be put in or not, as well as their proper dimensions and construction, so that navigation may not be impeded.

As to the expense, it had better be incurred in the outset, than left in such a shape as to be liable to an indefinite amount of expense in litigation afterwards. We find men besieging the Legislature every session, for special acts, and when obtained they are mere waste paper. The State bears the expense of this legislation, and the cost to the individual obtaining it is far more than would be incurred by an application to the Supreme Court.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE would ask the Chief Justice [Mr. WHIPPLE] what is meant by a navigable stream? Whether, if a stream has been declared meandered, and you can pass down it with a birch bark canoe, is it considered navigable?

Mr. WHIPPLE—It is always a question of fact whether a stream is navigable or not.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said he was not very much versed in this question of dams and bridges; but some power must decide, and he thought the Supreme Court the better tribunal to settle the matter. He thought no influence could be brought to operate on the Supreme Court, but which was likely to operate with greater force on the boards of supervisors. The gentleman from Macomb [Mr. CHAPPEL] seemed to have some antipathy to this court. His feelings were, perhaps, influenced by some past experience. Some one says:

"No one can feel the halter draw
With good opinion of the law."

The supervisors have local feelings and interests to subserve, which the court has not. He should, therefore, consider the court the best tribunal in which to place the authority.

Mr. BRITAIN said, whenever the amendment offered by the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] was disposed of, he would give his reasons for his proposition.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BRITAIN said he would state his reasons why section 5 should be struck out. He [Mr. B.] had all his life been engaged about navigable streams and rivers, and he could state that the returns of surveyors of streams meandered, was no evidence that they were navigable streams. He had been extensively engaged in surveying, and had meandered streams for miles into the interior, when he had no instructions to do so, and for which he was not paid; his object was the good of the country. Under the provisions of this bill they would be made navigable.

His next objection was to giving to the Supreme Court what he considered legislative powers. Why are the powers of government divided? Is it not that applications of this kind may go to the Legislature; and if they grant privileges which the fundamental law of the land does not grant, they may go to the courts? What does this do? It makes the courts legislative. Are there no rights but what are involved in present interests that should be considered? Under this provision, dams may be erected where no person living in the State has an interest; yet may not persons coming in a few years afterwards have rights under the constitution of the United States; and others higher up the stream have their rights jeopardized?

My substitute (said Mr. B.) proposes that no navigable stream shall be bridged or dammed except by authority of the board of supervisors, under existing laws. It applies to navigable streams; not to a stream merely surveyed as such.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Then you give to the board of supervisors judicial powers.

Mr. BRITAIN—Who can exercise those powers better than a board of supervisors? We will suppose a case: by putting up a dam they can make a business point at Niles; but this will require the concurrence of the supervisors; but will the board of supervisors concur? No sir; they are from all parts of the county, and it would be much easier to obtain an order from the Supreme Court, than from the board of supervisors. But suppose the application succeeds, and the board of supervisors authorize a dam to be erected across the river at Niles, will they not look to the interests of the people generally, and require the parties to put in a lock for the facilities of navigation? If so, it accomplishes the purpose. Who are likely to know best whether there should be a lock, the court or the board of supervisors?

I am aware that my friend from St. Joseph [Mr. WILLIAMS] is alive to the protection of his rights; but are they not guarded under this substitute in every possible way?

Mr. B. would say one word on the general principle. He conceived the constitution of the United States to be the measure of the authority of Congress. He would call attention to article second, section eight, of the Constitution: which gives Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States. Under that clause they annulled the grant by the State of New York to an exclusive right of navigating the Hudson river by steam vessels. They claim the right to regulate the thoroughfares through the States among the several States—not merely between the States. The import of this provision has been mistaken by several statesmen; it was so by Mr. Calhoun, who considered it as applying to commerce between one State and another. It has no application to commerce with foreign states, because they are not among us; and with respect to them different language is used. It is between them and us, as all thoroughfares are between them and us. It must be admitted that Congress has control over all our navigable waters among the States, and it is the duty of the general government to protect them; and the State of Michigan cannot deprive me of my right to raft lumber or transport produce on any navigable stream, by authorizing the construction of a dam across it.

The amendment I propose [said Mr. B.] provides for all that is necessary. If the board of supervisors do wrong, those injured can find redress in the courts.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the committee rose, reported progress and asked leave to sit again, which was granted.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT, and a quorum being present, was resolved into a committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Miscellaneous Provisions," Mr. DANFORTH in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of Mr. BRITAIN'S substitute for section 5.

On motion of Mr. SOULE, the word "supreme" was stricken out of section 5, line 4, and "circuit" inserted.

Mr. BRITAIN'S substitute was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. FRALICK, the committee rose, reported the article back with the amendments, asked the concurrence of the Convention therein, and to be discharged from its further consideration.

The first, second and third amendments made in committee were concurred in.

The 4th amendment (an addition to section 2) being under consideration,

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend the same by striking out the word "improved."

Mr. BUSH said it appeared to him that the question was not fully understood. It had been contended by those in favor of the amendment, that such a provision should be inserted in the constitution; that the public good required it. But did public good require that where there were two water powers on a stream, that the man building first should destroy the other by drowning it? Would that be for the benefit of the public?

He [Mr. B.] had supposed the object was to prevent vexatious suits, and to protect water power; but it was obvious that if the amendment were adopted, and the section incorporated in the constitution, that one person owning a mill privilege on the lower part of a stream, might drown another out who had a privilege higher up the stream. This would destroy competition, which is always of benefit to the public.

Mr. COMSTOCK said he supposed the object of the amendment was to prevent litigation. It would be seen that if the motion should prevail, that a person may be precluded from building a dam by a man pretending to have a water power higher up the stream, and thus the benefit that would arise to the community from the water power, be lost. The article was properly guarded, and would secure the advantages derivable from water power to the community. By securing the rights of individuals and the public from litigation, it would stimulate persons to erect machinery and invest capital, and evidently tend to promote the public interests.

Mr. BUSH had supposed that if a measure so manifestly unjust, was understood, no gentleman would sustain it. We know (said Mr. B.) that the millers on this floor, who are so desirous to protect the public interests by a provision of this kind, established as the fundamental law, will be able to break down competition so beneficial to the community. No one will deny that a mill benefits the public; but the object in erecting a mill is private gain. The interest of the public is an incident. Shall we protect the interests of the public by increasing monopolies? Would the gentleman from Lenawee [Mr. Comstock] say it was for the interest of the community, if he had three feet fall in a stream, and I ten, to raise his dam ten feet? To destroy my competition, he might build at the head of his fall? He says a person might pretend to have a fall; but it must depend on the facts of the case. He could not establish it on such a pretence. No public interest could be promoted by allowing such a species of fraud as might be perpetrated under this provision to be practiced on the community.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I would like to say a few words in reply to some imputations thrown out by the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH.] He charges the millers who happen to be here with having interests at stake—

Mr. BUSH—I made no charge against the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS—Well, but you left the inference to be made that the gentleman from Lenawee [Mr. COMSTOCK] and myself were interested.

Mr. BUSH—I have no doubt of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS—If you will assert it directly, I will give you such a reply as the case deserves. I have not a cent at stake in any flowed lands. I never mean to have. I can be involved in no controversy, and I can be affected in no wise by such a provision as contemplated, except adversely. Wild lands might be flowed in spite of me, in which I am or may be interested. I should then obtain value and damages, and no injury would be done me. In anticipation of a possible difficulty, I once secured land in order to be safe from trouble. I took care not to burn my fingers. The interest I take in this subject is prompted by the deep and abiding conviction in my own mind, that the energies of communities are frittered away, and their substance sucked out by vampires—by courts—by litigants, heated to an intense degree of animosity.

But, to return to the gentleman from Ingham. He talks about the audacity of millers. He is the last man who should talk about the selfishness or audacity of other men. He probably forgets his votes and action. When questions were before this Convention, in the settlement of which he was locally interested, I remember well when he rose to advocate his case, a smile of derision was visible in countenances, all over—

(Here the President called the speaker to order.)

When the gentleman from Ingham was personal, he was suffered to go on. But, never mind, I will say no more, except that I would commend the gentleman's attention to a couple of lines from Burns:

"O wad some power the giftie gie' us,
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

Mr. STURGIS said he held a water power in Eaton county which he did not at present wish to use, and he was willing to allow the person who built first on the stream to have the benefit, as it would be advantageous to the neighboring community.

Mr. MORRISON withdrew his proposition to strike out the word "improved," and offered the following as a substitute for the amendment made in committee:

"This provision shall not apply to cases where, by flowing lands, any other water power shall be injured."

Mr. M. said he did not view the question in the same light as the gentleman from Lenawee, [Mr. COMSTOCK.] By adopting the substitute, those cases would be left as they were before. Considerable difficulty surrounded the subject; but there should be some settlement made of the vexed question of flowing lands.

Mr. BRITAIN said there was some propriety in the position taken by the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH;] but it was common for persons to buy up water powers and hold them without improvement till they could sell them for a high price. Would the gentleman from Ingham countenance that? Though these persons do what they do legally, they must be considered the greatest oppressors to new settlements.

The question is, shall we encourage a new settlement in the use of its water power, or the interest of those who go ahead and grasp for their own benefit, the water power on streams without improving them? He believed every neighborhood ought to have the privilege of improving the water power for its own benefit; it would only be carrying out the provision of the constitution; it would only be taking private property for public use. It has been asked what is public property in a rail road, and answered that the public had the use; that the company were compelled to carry our freight at stipulated rates. Is it not so with mills? They are controlled in their business by law. If you prescribe by law that they shall do business in turn, and fix the toll they shall receive, beyond which they cannot go, are they not for the public use, and do they not carry with them the greatest possible benefit to new settlements?

Mr. BUSH said he hoped the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] would go for the amendment of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. MORRISON.] It would be an easy matter for a person building before there was a settlement, to procure all the facilities. It must be conceded that, without the amendment, the act would be of doubtful authority. He believed that the provision, though stamped in the constitution, would be void. He would ask if it was for the public good, where there were two water powers, that the first making an effort to improve should have the power to do away with all competition from the other? Would that be for the interests of the community?

The gentleman must know that when a neighborhood is desirous of having improvements made, rights may be easily acquired; but to place an article in the constitution, authorizing one person to take the property of another, was a monstrous proposition. He had been a member of many Legislatures, and had heard many propositions, but an effort was never made to carry the principle as far as that. He was willing to protect all persons in possession of that class of property mentioned by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. CHAPEL;] but there should be some reserve; individual rights demanded it—the right every one has to control his individual property. He hoped some modification would be adopted by which vexatious suits might be put an end to, without destroying that competition which was certainly of advantage to the public.

The amendment offered by Mr. MORRISON was adopted—yeas 35, nays 25.

The fourth amendment was then concurred in.

The fifth amendment, striking out section four of the article, being under consideration,

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to amend the same by inserting as section four, the following:

"Sec. 4. The Legislature of this State shall have the power of erecting a State prison, or removing the present prison, with the convicts therein, to the mineral country in the Upper Peninsula of this State, near lake Superior, for the purpose of working the mines and minerals in that district of the State."

Mr. P. said he had noticed for the last few years, applications to the Legislature from the county of Jackson, for prohibiting the labor of convicts in the State prison; and it seemed to him that they might work in the mineral region with a great deal of use, convenience and prosperity, though he could not see that the labor of convicts in the prison at Jackson, reduced the value of mechanical labor. The principal employment in the prison was to make wagons; but he [Mr. P.] could buy wagons cheaper brought in from other States; great numbers were imported; and so it was of boots; great quantities are brought in from Massachusetts; and while that was the case he could not see any injurious effect the employment of the convicts could have upon our mechanics; but as the people of Jackson county were dissatisfied, he thought the prison might be removed to the upper peninsula with propriety. He hoped the proposition would be seriously considered.

Mr. STOREY—It is an object, Mr. President, to make the State prison support itself; but this is not the object for which prisons are instituted and maintained. I had always supposed that there were two great objects sought by the systems of prisons in this country—first, the punishment of crime, and second, the reformation of the criminal. But in this State, these two last objects seem to have been lost sight of. It seems to be no consideration with some that the State prison is a public benefit, inasmuch that its walls form an effectual barrier between the rogue, the highwayman, or the murderer, and the honest portion of community. It seems to be no consideration with many, that an hundred and thirty villains and vagabonds are kept so safely and securely, that the property of the honest citizen cannot be molested by them. No! If the words "State prison" are spoken, there is an immediate dismal howl raised by those in office and out of office of "expense, expense," just as if it could be expected that a State prison can go on the principle of a wind-mill.

Mr. President, there has been a good deal of money paid out of the treasury on account of the prison of this State, from the time it was first located; but not as much, by any means, as has been made to appear in certain public documents. Still, the expenses have been larger than they need to have been. In the first place, the plan upon which the establishment was commenced, was better fitted for a State with two millions of inhabitants, than one of the size of Michigan at the present time, or what she is likely to be for a century hence. Why, sir, when the buildings are all finished, as originally contemplated, they will be capable of holding seven or eight hundred prisoners. And when will Michigan have so many? The plan was agreed upon, and the building of the prison commenced in a time of speculation, when everything went on "the big auger" principle; and who wonders the treasury bled?

But, Mr. President, no prison in the Union is conducted more economically, or at less cost for ordinary support, than our own. During the last year a very valuable building has been erected, at some cost to be sure; but I will venture to say that there cannot be found in the State a building of so much value put up for so little money. There are now nearly completed all the buildings that will be wanted for prison purposes for many years to come; and hereafter all the income of the establishment can be turned directly to its ordinary support. When the present contracts shall expire, and new lettings shall be had, there will be so great an advance in contract prices, that I have not a doubt the prison will be able to maintain itself. This much, sir, in regard to "expense," about which we have heard so much.

I said this morning that the most profitable contract at the prison is one which least interferes with mechanical trades in the State. This is true. And I have no doubt the gentleman having that contract would be glad to-day to get every convict in the prison at an advance of 50 or 60 per cent. on present rates. It will be the easiest thing in the world to turn the labor of the convicts into profitable channels; the manufacture of a thousand articles which will not affect our own mechanics.

There is, sir, a moral question of some magnitude involved here. The convicts are taught trades in the prison, and when they go out they are very likely to seek employment in shops where a like business as they have learned is carried on. If they have reformed, and become honest men, this is all well. But, if not—if they are still foul with crime, what is the effect upon those they come in contact with—the journeymen and apprentices that fill the workshops of our cities and villages? Sir, it is at least degrading to the honest mechanic; and, in some cases, the contamination is fatal. The State, in this view of the subject, becomes the nursery for the annual growth of fifty or one hundred convict mechanics, who are sent out to sow the seeds of crime among a class of honest men. Is this right?

This is not a new question, Mr. President. As early as 1843, the democratic State Convention passed a resolution in favor of legislative action on this subject. This was the Convention which nominated Governor Barry the second time he was elected. On the meeting of the succeeding Legislature, such had been the exhibitions of public feeling, that the Executive in his annual message made a favorable recommendation upon the subject, suggesting the propriety of legislative action. The question did engage the attention of the Legislature. In the Senate, the committee on the State prison made a very elaborate report, examining somewhat largely the subject in its different bearings. The argument in this report is so copious, and so well adapted to the present moment, that, by permission of the Convention, I will read some extracts.

(Mr. S. read extracts from the report, which were not furnished to the reporter.)

I am not sure, Mr. President, whether any favorable action was had by the Legislature of that year, (1844,) but it was in consequence of a continuance of agitation that the section which was stricken out by the committee of the whole, this morning, was finally incorporated in the revised statutes of 1846. It was placed there after much discussion in both houses, of that year, and, as I said this morning, was deemed to be the settled policy of the State, in regard to convict labor. How the section came to be repealed, I informed the Convention this morning.

It is the dictate of good policy, no less than of true wisdom, to settle this vexed question now. If it is not settled, it will enter into the politics of the State; and every gentleman knows how desirable it is to avoid these collateral questions in politics.

There are petitions here from six counties, and some eight hundred petitioners. Last winter the Legislature had more petitions on this subject than on any other; and if nothing is done by us here, the next Legislature will probably be flooded by them. I may be asked, why not leave the whole subject to the Legislature, and why put this section in the constitution? Simply for the reason that I would place the provision beyond the power of repeal through the efforts of interested contractors or other persons. This much, surely, is due to the great mechanical interests of the State. I would prevent the recurrence of such a fraud as secured the repeal of this section from the revised statutes. Why, sir, I venture to say that the repeal of this section, and the extension of the contracts under it, have been an injury to the State of not less than ten thousand dollars; for all the convicts are now out at contract, at fifty per cent less than they would command in market to-day.

The eyes of the mechanics of the State are upon this Convention. They hope, they expect that something will be done to break the force of a State monopoly upon their individual pursuits. I trust they will not be disappointed. When the question is taken, I shall ask for the ayes and noes.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said it appeared that some action of this kind was demanded from the Convention, and the reasons offered by the gentleman from Jackson [Mr. STORER] should influence the delegates. It was for the benefit of a most industrious class of our fellow-citizens, with whose labor the labor of the convicts comes in competition. Another reason is the moral influence exerted by sending our prisoners out to mix with the apprentices and workmen in the shops of our mechanics, which produces an immoral influence.

The Legislature of the State of New York was besieged in this way, till a new prison was built in the northern part of the State; and the prisoners are now laboring in iron works. The principal part of the business in the Sing Sing and Auburn prisons is carried on so as not to interfere with the labor of the mechanics in that region. It seems to me (said Mr. VAN V.) that there should be something done to prevent that question from being mixed up with the politics of the State. It has been said that the ordinary support of the prison has drawn on the treasury of the State. That will be avoided if the prisoners hereafter support the prison; that is all that should be required. With respect to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. N. PIERCE,] he [Mr. VAN V.] thought the upper peninsula ought to come down to the State prison, rather than the State prison go there.

Mr. CORNELL hoped the section would remain as originally reported by the committee. It was the duty of the State to manage the prison so as to be no expense on the treasury, but it could not be supposed that any prison in its infancy could do so and pay for the building. The principal expense has been for the building. This expense will not occur hereafter; and it was anticipated, and he hoped it would be the fact, that the labor of the prisoners will be sufficient for their support. He was led to infer, from what some gentlemen had stated in the Convention, that it was through mismanagement that the State had been involved, which did not arise from its location. It was the wish of the people that the competition between the labor of the prisoners and the mechanics in the village and neighborhood, should be avoided; and as some business might be carried on in the prison which would not interfere, it would be better to leave the section as it stood. He hoped the Convention would not concur with the committee of the whole in striking out.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD said—I trust, Mr. President, that the Convention will not concur in the amendment made in committee of the whole, by striking out the 4th section of the article now under consideration. And in doing so, I believe I speak the sentiments, not only of my immediate constituents, but the sentiments of a large majority of the people of this State. It was said by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. N. PIERCE,] when the subject was under consideration in committee of the whole, that the objections to the present system were confined to a particular class, and that class a few mechanics in the village of Jackson. I regret that my worthy friend is not better informed upon this subject. If he had given ordinary attention to the business of this Convention, he would have observed that petitions from several counties remote from the prison, numerous signed, have been presented and referred; and the committee to whom they were referred have, very wisely and justly, as I think, reported, in accordance with the prayer of those petitioners, the section now under consideration. By referring to the petitions upon this subject presented here, I find them to be from the counties of St. Joseph, Branch, Livingston, Kent and Lenawee, besides those presented from Jackson. All urge with earnestness upon this Convention the necessity of changing the present system of convict labor. In reply to the remark made by the gentleman from Calhoun, to which I have referred, I will only say I hold in my hand a petition signed by one hundred and ten inhabitants of Lenawee county. With many of these petitioners I am personally acquainted. I recognize among them the names of gentlemen of the highest respectability and intelligence, representing almost all the varieties of professions, occupations and trades carried on in that county, and yet these petitioners live more remote from the State Prison than the gentleman from Calhoun himself. Sir, it is not a question in which the mechanics of Jackson village or county only are interested, but, as has been very properly said by the petitioners from Lenawee, "all labor is more or less effected by the present system of convict labor."

There is another fact connected with these petitions, to which I wish to call the attention of the Convention. There is no one subject upon which this Convention has been petitioned from as many different counties in the State, and with the same unanimity as this subject of convict labor. Upon the subject of temperance we have had numerous petitions, but the petitioners have by no means agreed as to the proper action to be taken by this Convention. By the petitions now before me, nearly 800 persons have asked in emphatic language for some provision in the constitution we are now framing, by which convict labor shall be prevented from coming in competition with the honest, industrious and meritorious mechanic.

Sir, there is another view of this question, which is urged upon our attention by the petitioners. It is said that the present system of educating convicts in all the different mechanical trades, and then sending them forth to mingle with the mechanics of our State, exerts a powerful influence for evil upon the morals of the community; and I will take this occasion to remark that, in my opinion, the philosophizing in which some gentlemen saw fit to indulge, on a recent occasion, in regard to this reform of the character and morals of convicts in the State prison, is all philosophy, and nothing else. It is not true in point of fact. You will rarely find a young man of correct principles, who has ambition to stand well in society, who is willing to work side by side with a convict from the State prison. He feels, and justly, too, that there is contamination in the association. There is a truth as venerable as the moral law, and as true as it is venerable: if you would preserve the morals of a community, the associations of the youth of that community must be pure.

Now, sir, with these petitions before us, are we to be told that these objections exist only in the minds of a few mechanics in the village of Jackson? Is it assumed that the constituents of my friend from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] have acted beyond their sphere? that they have no interest in the question?—that no notion of State policy induced 209 citizens of that county to petition this Convention for action on this subject? And yet this must be assumed by the gentleman, if, as he says, a few in the village of Jackson only are interested. Sir, the position is a bad one, and not sustained by fact or argument. The truth is, these petitioners, however remote from the prison, feel, as well as my own constituents, the paralyzing influence of convict labor.

Sir, if we would do justice to this large, respectable and most useful class of the community, and, at the same time, consult the welfare and interest of the State, we will retain this provision in the constitution. My colleague [Mr. STOREY] has very properly alluded to the action of the Legislature upon this subject. It is well known to every gentleman upon this floor that some action was demanded by a large portion of the people of the State. Petitions, numerous signed, in all parts of the State, were crowded upon the Legislature. The result was the passage of a law in accordance with the prayer of the petitions.

My colleague has given here a history of the repeal of that act. It is enough to say that it could not have been accomplished in any other way.

But, Mr. President, these petitioners have said that all labor was affected by the present system of convict labor. This is undoubtedly so, as it prevents the enterprising, hard-working and intelligent mechanic from settling among us, and making our State his home. All classes are interested; and that community consults its own true interest, when it gives proper encouragement to all varieties of mechanical operatives at home. It is to the productive hand of labor that we are indebted for whatever of wealth and greatness we, as a people, possess; then do not paralyze its energies by sapping the foundation of its success.

Sir, what would my economical friend from Calhoun do without a blacksmith, a wagon-maker and other mechanics in his neighborhood; how would he get his plow or his wagon repaired?

Mr. N. PIERCE—I would do it myself.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—Then the gentleman is an exception to the rule. Most farmers wish to encourage in their vicinity every kind of mechanical labor. The delegate from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE] has said a man cannot purchase a wagon for one cent less than can be purchased elsewhere; that they are manufactured in other States and sent here and sold for less money than the price paid for prison wagons. I hazard the assertion that the gentleman cannot purchase a wagon, of the same quality, and of as good materials, manufactured in or out of this State, at as low a price by ten dollars, as the contractor of the prison can afford them; and why? It is because the contractor hires his labour at thirty-three cents per day, including board and shop rent. Now, sir, can a mechanic, under the most favorable circumstances, compete with this trade? His material cost the same price; he must rent or own a shop; he must board his hands; and when he has done this, his expenses have equalled those of the prison contractor, and yet, sir, he has his laborers to pay. And this is the actual difference between the cost of the article to the contractor of the prison, and the man who attempts to carry on the business in competition with him. The actual difference in costs cannot be less than from fifteen to twenty dollars. With such a monopoly against him, how can the mechanic live? However energetic, industrious and frugal he may be, he must sink into poverty and want.

Sir, I wish to ask my agricultural friend from Calhoun, [Mr. N. PIERCE,] if he have the monopoly of the labor of a large number of hands, at thirty-three cents per day, when the regular rate of wages was one dollar; if he could not sell wheat and other grains, much cheaper than his neighbors?

Mr. N. PIERCE—I am a mechanic, and can furnish wagons for sixty dollars, as good as they sell at the State prison for sixty-five.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—I was not aware that the gentleman was a mechanic. I supposed he was a farmer, and I believe he so reports himself in the manual. But whether one or the other, I must be permitted to doubt whether he would be able to turn out such a wagon as is manufactured at the prison for sixty-five dollars. But, under the supposition I have named, would he not be able to monopolize, as far as monopoly could exist in agriculture, to the extent, at least, of his ability to produce; could he not undersell his neighbor, and still make more money on the capital invested? Suppose, however, his last statement to be correct. If we have to pay more for a wagon—more than we should if this system was changed—for whose benefit is it continued? Is it for the benefit of the people? Most certainly not, if the gentleman is correct. It is for the benefit of a few contractors, and to the great injury of that class of mechanics. Change this system, and a fair and wholesome competition will spring up. Mechanics will be encouraged, capital will be invested; all the improvements in machinery, in aid of mechanical labor, will be introduced; and as by our encouragement they prosper, in the same ratio will be the prosperity of our State.

But, sir, the question presents itself, can it be so conducted as not to come in competition with labor outside the prison, without enjoining an expense to the State? How is it done in other States? I will only speak of what I know, and that is of the prisons of New York. In the prisons of that State the manufacture of carpets, most kinds of cutlery, edge tools, hames, combs and brushes, are all carried on to a great extent. And this change has been made within a few years, after being loudly called for by the people. We have no complaints since the adoption of the present policy. Articles now manufactured in these prisons do not come in competition with the labor of their own citizens, but of other States and countries. Cannot we safely follow the example? This, sir, is what your petitioners have asked at our hands. If any thing in this constitution is designed to operate beneficially upon the interest of the whole State, and I will add for the benefit of the hardest working and poorest paid classes of the State, the Convention will retain this clause in the article now under consideration.

Mr. N. PIERCE—It does seem to me, sir, that the sympathy of the delegates from Jackson is great. I really pity the mechanics of Jackson. The actual work and materials of a wagon cost fifty or fifty-five dollars; what more is got is like raising wheat by a farmer over six shillings a bushel. The gentleman need not tell me that a wagon need cost sixty-five dollars. The iron does not cost more than twenty dollars. It is keeping up the agitation of those that ask and receive. It is necessary that the convicts should work; it is good for their health, and it keeps them from mischief. Most of the mechanical property is bought out of the State; it is not made in the State; but it is brought in for the express purpose of speculation. Of boots and shoes of every description, four-fifths are made out of the State. Importation is the rule. More wagons are brought into the State than are made in the State, and there are none in the market. The mechanics do not suffer.

I pity the Jackson folks. They have had fifteen thousand dollars a year in cash, from the treasury, and yet they say it is injurious to them. We have a part of the State in the mining region worth $100,000. You can take the convicts up there, where they will not injure any body. By employing them there they will pay the State debt in a little time, and relieve the people of Jackson. I hope they will keep the section struck out. If they do not like my section, I hope they will put in another. I went into the State prison as I came here and saw their work. I saw some good work; but I could buy similar articles for less money elsewhere. The competition is all the other way. I am convinced there are mechanics there, and more would be there if they had their due. When they come out they should have their dues, too. I would as soon have a convict come into my neighborhood and do blacksmithing as any other.

I think I am a good judge of mechanical business. I have worked at three trades. I sympathize with the people of Jackson. I shall do my best to get the State prison from them; it is a nuisance, and theirs is a nice place. If we can get the use of the convicts in the mines, it will be useful to the State, and relieve the poor mechanics—by-the-by, they get better wages than I do—but they will be entirely relieved. I think it is worthy of consideration. The more I look at it, the more I am convinced it is the interest of the State to establish the State prison in the upper peninsula, in the mining district. The purity of some parts of the lower peninsula is so great it is improper to have prisoners there. I hope it will be done. If we had those one hundred and thirty men there we should raise copper and iron enough to pay our State debt. We can do it and relieve the mechanics from a great burden and great distress.

Mr. STOREY would say one word only on the matter of competition. He knew, in those branches of business in which they are engaged, particularly boots and wagons, the mechanics in Jackson cannot compete with them—they have ceased work—they are driven from their shops. This was the fact there.

Mr. FRALICK hoped the action of the committee would not be concurred in, and that the section would be retained. He thought it right and just. It was asked for by a large share of our citizens, and was a right which we should not deny them. He regretted to witness the opposition of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. N. PIERCE.] Some illusion seemed to have come over that gentleman's mind, which he [Mr. F.] hoped would be soon dispelled. It was a duty the Convention owed to a large class, to protect them from competition with convict labor. The labor in the State prison might be so regulated as not to come into competition with them.

Mr. DANIELS moved the previous question; but the call was not sustained.

The question first being upon concurring in striking out the section, (4,) the same was non-concurred in, yeas 25, nays 35.

The substitute for section 5, reported by the committee, being under consideration, on motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the original section was amended by striking out "supreme," and inserting "circuit."

Upon concurring with the proposition of the committee, a division of the question was had, and the vote upon striking out the section stood yeas 36, nays 20.

So the Convention concurred in striking out.

The question being upon concurring in the substitute, the same was concurred in, yeas 29, nays 27.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to adjourn. But the Convention refused to adjourn.

The article, "Miscellaneous Provisions," being open for general amendment,

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike out section 2.

Mr. HART moved to adjourn.

When, by consent, Mr. McCLELLAND moved to reconsider the resolution adopted relative to the adjournment. And the motion was laid upon the table.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted limiting the time of speaking to five minutes. And the motion was laid upon the table.

The Convention then adjourned.

FRIDAY, (52d day) August 9.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

REMONSTRANCE.

By the PRESIDENT: of the Mayor, Recorder and Aldermen of the city of Detroit, against the incorporation of a provision in the constitution, prohibiting the Legislature from giving to any city or village the power of granting licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors, &c. Referred to the committee on the legislative department.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to recommit the article entitled "Judicial Department" [No. 28] to a committee of one, with the following instructions:

Strike out of section 1 the following words: "As many district justices' courts in each organized county as the supervisors thereof shall, in pursuance of law, establish judicial districts therein, not exceeding the number of representative districts."

Amend section 17 by striking out in line 3, these words: "They shall have such criminal and civil jurisdiction," and insert as follows: "They shall have civil jurisdiction to the amount of three hundred dollars; and concurrent jurisdiction to the amount of five hundred dollars, and such criminal jurisdiction."

Mr. CHURCH moved to lay the motion and article upon the table. He made the motion to test the propriety of moving to recommit that article at this stage of the business of the Convention.

The question upon laying on the table was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted yeas 22, nays 44.

Upon Mr. PIERCE's proposition a division was had, and the motion to recommit prevailed—yeas 43, nays 25.

The instructions proposed being under consideration,

Mr. WALKER said that he desired to amend the instructions presented by the gentleman from Calhoun, (Mr. J. D. PIERCE.) He proposed to amend by adding this: To strike out the 4th section and insert in lieu, "The supreme court shall hold at least one term annually in each judicial circuit, at such time and place as may be designated by said court; and the Legislature may provide for the holding of two terms in each or either of the said circuits in each and every year."

Very good reasons he believed might be urged for the adoption of this amendment. He was aware that it had not been the practice heretofore to have terms of the Supreme Court held, except in very distant parts of the State. Such was not the operation of the same system which the majority had decided upon in the New England States. As well as he recollected, the court sat in nearly every county in those States. He knew that the Supreme Court held at least one term in every county in Vermont. So it was, he believed, in Massachusetts, Connecticut and other States. There were advantages to be derived from that system which would be apparent to any one who gave the matter a moment's reflection. Heretofore we had but four points at which a term of the Supreme Court was held. What was the effect? To give the greater part of the legal business to the lawyers residing at those points, and to make the expense of litigation to citizens of other counties extremely onerous. Macomb county was in the district in which the Supreme Court was held at Detroit, and whenever any business went up from that county, the attorney would be obliged to spend four months, perhaps, in Detroit, to attend to the business, or transfer it to some resident attorney, so that the result was either to neglect his own business at home, or transfer the business with its profits to some Detroit lawyer.

He did not know that his plan would be compatible with the system intended to be adopted here, without an increase in the number of judges; but he knew, at all events, that it would be acceptable to the people at large. With an independent judiciary, there would be no difficulty whatever in extending these advantages to the several counties. With the circuit system, there might be a difficulty, unless the force upon the Supreme bench was increased. He conceived there were weighty reasons in favor of his proposition, and he hoped it would be soundly considered in all its bearings. He had not offered it for the purpose of defeating the bill in any shape, but would have offered it as an amendment to the independent system reported by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] if that had been adopted.

Mr. McCLELLAND remarked, that by turning to section four of the article, it would be seen that the Legislature had full power over this subject, except that they could not reduce the number of terms to be held in the State below the number specified. There was no prohibitory clause in the article—the Legislature could do as they pleased. He believed if we imposed such duties on the judges as the gentleman proposed, we might as well give up both systems. If the judges went into one county, they must go into all. If they went into the large counties, they must go into the small. The system had been tried in several States, and universally failed, except where the judges had but very little duty to perform on circuit.

Mr. CHURCH—I move to further amend the instructions. With the permission of the Chair I will read my proposition before sending it up. I move to amend by striking out section two, and inserting instead of it, one which shall contain the following provisions:

“1. The Supreme Court shall consist of four judges, two of whom shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State, and hold office six years. The other two judges of said court shall be the two circuit judges having the shortest term of service.

“2. There shall be six circuit court judges, elected by the qualified electors of each circuit, to hold office for six years; such judges to be classified so that two of them will be elected biennially.

“3. At the first election under this constitution, there shall be elected four Supreme Court judges, two of whom shall hold office only two years.”

I propose to make a remark or two on these instructions.

[The amendment was then sent to the chair and read.]

The PRESIDENT—Is the Chair to understand the proposition as an amendment to the instructions offered by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER?]

Mr. CHURCH—Yes sir. I have proposed these instructions to the committee for these reasons; to which I ask for a minute, the attention of the Convention. It is evident, although the last three or four votes taken on this subject may be construed differently, that as between the independent Supreme Court and the Circuit Court system, the Convention is nearly equally divided. It must be evident to gentlemen of this Convention that whichever of these systems be adopted, it can command but a very small majority on this floor; and it will leave a large minority dissatisfied with the action of this body on the most important subject that has been committed to it. It has been remarked before, that this constitution which we are framing will present “porcupine quills” enough to insure it a warm reception; and if it go forth with the failure of the attainment of reform, in one of the most important particulars, stamped upon its face, the danger of its defeat will be greatly increased. I have listened to the discussion upon the merits of each system; and if there be any sincerity in the remarks made here by the friends of both systems—if they meant what they said when they argued upon this subject—the proposition ought to command the support of gentlemen of both sides.

I propose to this Convention, sir, a plan by which the acknowledged merits of both systems can be secured, and by which the evils which the opponents of either system contended were inseparably attached to them, would be avoided. What are its provisions? It provides, in the first place, for a Supreme Court, and for the creation of a number of circuit judges. How is the Supreme Court to be composed? It is composed of four members, two of whom shall be permanent members of the court, elected for the term of six years, by the people at large. Therefore, sitting in the Supreme Court for that long period, they must become learned judges and able lawyers. With whom are they to be associated? With two circuit judges, who will come up from the circuit bench and sit with them; men who have been qualified for that position by four years' service as circuit judges. Because, it will be perceived, that this proposition provides for the creation of six circuit judges, and such a classification of them that there will be an election for two of them every two years. Then, when a man sits in a circuit four years, and has but two years to serve, he will go up to the Supreme Court and sit there. You will then have two men sitting there, prepared by four years' service on the circuit bench, and after that they will go away, making place for the next two, in the same manner.

I speak now with reference to the Supreme Court especially. You will have a court with all the advantages of this circuit system. You will have men sitting there for the patient investigation of all matters of law, and two men sitting with them, after four years' service on the circuit, as I have said before—practical men, experienced in matters of law and fact.

This is a modification of the New York system, applied to this State with reference to the amount of business and its extent. I ask of the Convention to give it an impartial consideration, and to endeavor to keep it separated from any connection with the two parties arrayed in battle here, and without reference to the leaders of these parties, seeking their own aggrandizement. I ask of them to put themselves above all party considerations, and acknowledge no leaders in this matter, but to have an "eye single" to the best interests of the State. I think that, upon the whole, gentlemen will see that the system embodied in this proposition is the one most calculated to attain the best interests of the people. I ask that the plan be sent to a committee, and I have no doubt but that the sober second thought of the Convention will approve of it.

A slight conversational discussion then ensued; after which,

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the previous question was ordered.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays upon the amendment offered by Mr. CHURCH, and was lost—yeas 31, nays 41.

Mr. WALKER's amendment was then rejected—yeas 29, nays 43.

And the question recurring on the proposition of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, a division of the question was had.

The first branch of the instructions was agreed to—yeas 50, nays 22.

And the remainder of the proposed instructions were also agreed to—yeas 44, nays 27.

The PRESIDENT, under the resolution, referred the article to Mr. J. D. PIERCE, who forthwith reported the same back to the Convention, amended agreeably to the same.

Mr. McCLELLAND called up his motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution limiting the time of speaking to five minutes was adopted.

And the question being upon reconsideration, the yeas and nays were had, and the motion prevailed—yeas 36, nays 32.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to indefinitely postpone the resolution; but the motion did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the resolution was amended by striking out "by leave of the Convention or committee."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to strike out "five" and insert "ten."

A division of the question was had, and the Convention refused to strike out.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution as amended, the same was agreed to by a two-thirds vote, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, Leach, Lee, McClelland, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Town, Walker, Webster, White, Whipple, Williams—51.

NAYS—Messrs. J. Bartow, Beeson, Burns, J. Clark, Gardiner, Lovell, McLeod, Morrison, Roberts, Robertson, Storey, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Whittemore, President—15.

The PRESIDENT called Mr. BRITAIN to the chair.

The article entitled "Judicial Department" was read a third time by its title.

The CHAIR then stated the question as being upon the passage of the article.

Mr. GOODWIN said he did not know if he should be able to state so briefly the reasons which would induce him to vote against the passage of the article, as to confine his remarks within the space allotted him. But he desired to advert to some matters connected with the subject, which had not been previously adverted to. In regard to his general views, he had already presented them in the committee of the whole. There were some other propositions, however, to which he desired to call attention, and which seemed to him to afford good reasons why the article should not pass. The first one was in relation to the mode of electing the judges. Section 6 provided that the State should be divided into eight judicial districts, one judge to be elected in each district, and four of the judges so elected was to constitute a quorum of the Supreme Court. So that in fact the judges of the court of last resort would be elected in these separate districts. He considered that the judges of that court should be elected by the people at large. He conscientiously believed that by electing the judges in that manner, the interests of the people and the administration of justice would be best subserved. He had previously presented his views in relation to the judicial system that he thought ought to be adopted. However, the Convention had seen fit to overrule him. Where a judge was the judge merely of a district, the plan of election provided in the article would be right. But by the judicial system which the Convention adopted, the judges were not only the judges of the districts in which they sat, but were also judges for the State at large—they forming the court of last resort. To his mind, then, the propriety of their being elected by the people at large was perfectly obvious. How would it be if we were to say the Attorney General or State Treasurer should be elected by a district? Gentlemen no doubt would say it was wrong. The same reasoning therefore applies to the election of judges by districts. He might dwell upon the local influence which would result from this plan; the influence upon the judges when their terms of office terminated or were about to terminate, or when about being elected. He would pass however from that, without entering into detail.

There was another matter that struck him. Circuit Courts were required to hold four terms in every county containing 10,000 inhabitants. He had frequently urged that where there was an amount of judicial business to be done, there should be a sufficient number of terms holden to transact it. But would eight judges be sufficient to do all that business, and to sit four terms a year in counties so situated? It appeared to him that eight would not be enough.

Again, the second section of the article provided that the circuit judges (eight) should constitute the Supreme Court, four to constitute a quorum, and the concurrence of three necessary to a final decision. If the entire number sat, it would indeed become a very cumbrous court. Besides, the rendition of decisions would be slow, for the reason that the judges being elected by districts, the greater part of their time would be occupied in their district business, so that their attention would in part be distracted from the Supreme Court.

business to that of their districts. Four judges sitting in the Supreme Court constituted a quorum, the other four judges being on circuit. Well, these four judges in the Supreme Court went on and made their decision, while the rest of the judges were away. At the succeeding term of the Supreme Court we would have some of the judges who had been on circuit during the previous term, and one or two perhaps of those who sat that term. This it appeared to him would have a bad effect in regard to satisfaction in the decisions of the Supreme Court. Suppose the four judges who sat there should differ in regard to a question similar to one which had been decided at a previous term; what would be the consequences? or on some principle of law, and so on? We would have different batches of judges, and our decisions would be constantly fluctuating. This was a result which might occur from the manner in which the court was constituted by the provisions of this article. It seemed to him to be a system under which we could not have that certain and stable adjudication which was to be desired. It was a system, too, that in his judgment weakened the responsibility which the judges ought to feel. The responsibility was thrown upon a number, so that individually there was little. A judge might say "he did not sit in the Supreme Court but one term in three or four, and was not responsible for its decisions—his opinion on this or that question was so and so, and was not responsible for the decision given on the same question at another term of the court."

Occasions might occur, and had occurred in our Supreme Court as at present constituted, which would justify the insertion of the provision in relation to the judges giving their decisions in writing. He would ask gentlemen, could a system such as this contemplated, secure that feeling of responsibility which the judges of the court of last resort should feel? On the contrary, he did not think it would; nor did he think it would give to the decisions of our highest legal tribunal that general character for stability which they should possess; nor would it secure to the extent which it ought the confidence of the people in the adjudication of our Supreme Court.

There was another thing which he would advert to in conjunction with what he had before said in relation to the improbability of the court being able to discharge all the business devolving upon it, and it was a matter which would have the effect of lengthening the duration of the terms. He alluded to the chancery business, which would necessarily impose very onerous duties upon the judges, in addition to their other duties. The third section of the article said that the Supreme Court should have the power to issue writs of error, habeas corpus, mandamus, &c., and amongst others, injunction. So that there was a certain portion of chancery jurisdiction conferred upon this court. This he considered a strong objection to the article as it stood. He supposed the Convention had not designed to give this power, but the article as it stood certainly conferred upon the Supreme Court an original chancery jurisdiction in a certain class of cases. An injunction was a writ used in chancery practice, and was always sued out on a bill of petition filed in chancery, and not otherwise. This then was an original chancery jurisdiction; so that the court in Detroit could send its injunction to Berrien, Genesee, Mackinaw—in fact, all over the State. He did not suppose that this was a provision desired by the people, and was another reason why he should vote against the article. What he said on this occasion was presented in the performance of his duty. He had stated in a spirit of fairness what he considered important objections to the system contemplated, and for these reasons, in addition to those presented on a former day, he should vote against the passage of this article.

On motion of Mr. BAGG, a call of the Convention was ordered, and Messrs. McLEOD and ROBERTS were found absent without leave.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

And the question being, shall the article entitled "Judicial Department" now pass? the yeas and nays were had, and the vote was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Choate, Conner, Cornell, Danforth, Daniels, Eaton, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, McClelland, Mosher, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Wait, Warden, Whipple—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Axford, Bagg, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Crouse, Fralick, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Lee, Lovell, McLeod, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Webster, White, Whittemore, Williams, President—30.

So the article was passed, and under the rule referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the article entitled Miscellaneous Provisions.

The question being upon the motion of Mr. FRALICK, to strike out section 2,

Mr. WILLIAMS observed that the motives for introducing the section had been entirely perverted. The proposition was in the way of a remedy for a class of cases which had occupied much of the time of the Legislature, and had created a great deal of ill feeling. One gentleman had remarked, on a previous day, that this had been a vexata questio for the last twenty years in the Legislatures of this State. Another gentleman said he had been a member of the Legislature for six years, and that each year it was a matter of much trouble and expense to the Legislature. Inasmuch as the Legislature had not determined this matter, it was proposed to set it at rest by constitutional provision; and to avoid all trouble, the provision was here introduced. This provision was not intended to enable one man to tax others, as had been intimated; it merely proposed that the owners of lands overflowed by the erection of mills, should receive compensation for the damage done. And how were these damages to be ascertained and assessed? By the very same description of tribunal which we had appointed to assess damages in other cases—by a jury of freeholders. During his absence from home, some years since, a road was made over a part of his property, and was of very little benefit to him and those he represented; but it did him very little damage. He was decidedly in favor of securing private property, and he wanted this matter to be definitely settled, for it had long enough been a source of dissension and ill-feeling. But gentlemen had spoken very pathetically about taking other men's property. Why, our laws were full of encroachments on private rights; our constitution was founded on the principle that every man gave up a portion of his private rights for the sake of securing the remainder. In regard to rail roads, plank roads, streets in cities, &c., private property was thus taken, because it was for the benefit of the whole. In the same way the law allowed the authorities of a city to tear down buildings in case of fire, for the same reason. And, again, a man could not prosecute a nuisance upon his own property. In regard to the interest on money, did we not there encroach on a man's property? He had not the right to do with it as he pleased. Even in his own business the law encroached upon his private rights. He could not use his mill as he pleased. The law compelled him to take so much toll, and no more. Why were we forming a constitution? In part, to prevent the executive and legislative departments from encroaching upon private rights to an extent greater than the public interest demanded. If necessary, he could go on and point out many other cases.

Mr. McCLELLAND understood the gentleman's argument to be this: that because we had already encroached upon private rights, therefore it was proper we should go a little further. That he understood to be the sum and substance of the gentleman's argument here. It was true that the Legislature of this State, and of other States, encroached a little too much upon private rights. Allusion had been made to cities. He had instances in his mind where encroachments on private rights had been very injurious to the people. He knew of cases in his own city where, by permitting these encroachments to be made, very great injustice had been done, in the opinion of many of the most respectable citizens. He would ask if it were right to base a proposition of the kind on the mere argument that, because we had done so before, we would be justified in encroaching further? There might be great injury done to individuals by adopting the rule sought to be established by the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] He was willing to go with the gentleman in putting some restraint on the Legislature. If we had any thing to do, it was to protect the people of this State against the encroachment of others, and even against the encroachments of the people themselves.

Mr. WHIPPLE said that there was a little difference of opinion existing in relation to the subject of taking private property for certain uses. The Supreme Court of the State of Massachusetts held that an act of the Legislature authorizing persons to take property for the use and purpose contemplated in this article, was a constitutional and legal enactment. It was not his purpose to question the authority of that case, nor to say whether it was right or wrong. But he would advise the Convention that there are such decisions; and no one knew that better than the President of this Convention, [Mr. GOODWIN.]

There were a great many difficulties surrounding this question, and he was exceedingly anxious we should settle it now. If this provision would allow private property to be taken for private use, he was opposed to it—if for public use, he was in favor of it. Those who had watched the proceedings in our courts were aware of the amount of litigation which grew out of this matter; it had become, in fact, a complete nuisance, and had crushed many an individual. In determining this matter, we had to recollect that the water power of the State was used to but a very limited extent. We should look forward to the period when it would be used for the impelling of machinery, for the manufacture of calicos, woolens, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHAPEL remarked that the friends of the proposition merely asked that something might be done here which would mark out the means by which their rights, or rather the rights in dispute, might be secured, without doing injustice to the other party.

[Mr. C. then took ground that as plank road and rail road companies were enabled by legislative enactment to enter upon property and take it for road purposes, the same reasoning applied with equal propriety to the taking of lands, as specified in this section. He contended that mills were erected for the benefit of the surrounding country.]

Mr. N. PIERCE did not think the reasoning on this matter to be proper. He should say that in the county in which he resided, more sickness and deaths had resulted from the erection of mill ponds than from any other cause which he knew. There had been always a great amount of trouble and litigation about them. Could not the Legislature be left to say that a man should not make a mill pond larger than ten acres? It was no blessing to have a mill pond of one hundred acres close by a man's residence. He knew that those who lived on the sides of these ponds were very much distressed by ague and fevers, no doubt generated by the standing water. In fact, in nine cases out of ten, there was no necessity for having the water in these ponds in this way.

Mr. COMSTOCK observed that the objections of some gentlemen were based upon the question in relation to taking private property for private use; at present the objection was on account of these mill ponds being a nuisance. If they were nuisances, did not the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE] know that the Legislature had provided means for their being abated? He entirely agreed with the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] that something should be fixed here to put an end to the litigation which was constantly arising from this matter. He viewed mills in the same light as rail roads—great public benefits, which were entitled to legislative protection.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD said this provision was introduced in order that parties connected with water rights might understand their privileges. He did not know that this provision was for the protection of millers, in particular. He knew that very many men in his own county, who were not millers, but whose lands had been overflowed, would vote for this section. This subject had been a most fruitful source of one of the most troublesome and expensive species of litigation that ever came before our courts of justice. This provision was intended to protect the poor man in his rights. On but too many occasions were the poor men driven out of court when seeking for their rights, by reason of the costs arising from these suits. It only asked that these men should have their rights, but through a different channel from that now existing. It said that property should be assessed by a jury of twelve men—the same tribunal which had control over cases of a similar character. Gentlemen might say, let them go to the courts of justice. But then we had had experience in regard to that remedy. What did going to the courts of justice, to the court of last resort, amount to? To an utter rejection of claims for justice, so far as the poor clients were concerned.

In regard to the inviolability of private property, referred to by gentlemen, every argument that could be adduced in relation to the construction of rail roads, &c., applied with equal force as to the erection of mill dams. Let gentlemen just consider in what condition the State would be, if its water powers were not improved. There had been enough of money expended in this State upon the subject to have enriched every miller in the State. It was not for their benefit that the provision was introduced, neither was it for his. He had not a cent's worth depending upon this matter, except as a citizen of the State; in truth, he had already suffered to depletion by it.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The PRESIDENT called the Convention to order.

The unfinished business of the morning was resumed, and the question being on striking out section 2 of the article "Miscellaneous Provisions,"

Mr. CORNELL said he did not wish the question taken until he had "defined his position." From observation and reflection, he thought that such a law, embracing the provision contemplated, should be made, but not incorporated in the constitution. A law compelling those who took the property of others, to pay for it, was simple justice; but the principle which allowed one individual to appropriate the property of another to his own use, was wrong. It had been said by gentlemen that, when necessary, private property should be taken for public use; but this section went further—it allowed it to be taken for private use. Now, was it right, was it proper, that anything of the kind should be placed in the constitution? The section cured some of the defects, some of the difficulties, under which they labored at present; but it was liable to serious objections. Suppose an individual should come from the State of New York, purchase forty acres of land and settle down, leaving his family behind. After returning for his family and getting back to his new home, he finds fifteen or twenty acres flowed. Now, what would be the consequence? He can only get payment for the land flowed, when, perhaps, he might not desire to have a smaller farm; or he may be unable to sell the remaining small portion to any one, and thus be crippled in his business. Such cases might occur.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH hoped the motion would prevail. He had looked into the manual and found the advocates of the section all millers; but they said it was intended only for the public good, and not for the millers.

Mr. DANFORTH (interposing)—Did I say so?

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—No sir; but others had. It appeared to him improper to throw the rights of others into the hands of any individual. A member had remarked that he had been badly bled; but, if this section remained, others would be worse bled. He had been told of an instance to-day of a poor Irishman who had been ruined by having his land flowed. His children had all died of chill fevers produced by the damming up of the water, and finally, the man himself, to save his life, was compelled to leave, unable to dispose of his land. It appeared to him, if the section was adopted, that no one would be safe. The gentleman from Ingham had been honest in his remarks, in saying they first consulted their own interests when locating a mill pond.

Mr. ALVORD moved the previous question, and the motion to strike out prevailed, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Green, Hanscom, Harvey, Kingsley, Kinne, Leach, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whittemore, President—54.

YAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Britain, Butterfield, Chapel, Comstock, Danforth, Gardiner, Hart, Hascall, Morrison, Robertson, White, Williams—13.

Mr. WALKER offered the following, to stand in lieu of the section stricken out:

"Sec. 2. The Legislature shall provide by law that lands may be flowed, or water diverted for milling and manufacturing purposes, when the public good will be promoted thereby, and shall provide the manner in which the damages to individuals shall be assessed and paid."

Mr. W. said he did not wish to argue the question, as he had performed that duty on yesterday. He had voted for striking out the section, because it gave the right indiscriminately to enter, without determining whether it was for the public good.

Mr. ALVORD moved the previous question; and the same being ordered, the question was put on adopting the substitute of Mr. WALKER, and lost.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD offered the following, to stand as an additional section to the article:

"Sec. 8. The Legislature shall have power, after the year 1855, to combine or abolish any of the State offices provided for in this constitution."

Mr. B. said efforts had been made in the Convention to combine various offices; but it was thought impracticable at present. If it should appear politic to do so after the year 1855, this provision would enable the Legislature to accomplish it. It certainly could do no harm—being only a matter of prospective economy.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend the proposed section by adding: "or abolish any other provision of this constitution." He then moved the previous question, and the same being ordered, the vote was taken on the amendment and lost.

The proposition of Mr. BUTTERFIELD was then rejected.

Mr. WHITTEMORE moved to strike out section six of the article.

Mr. MORRISON moved the previous question; which was demanded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The motion to strike out prevailed—yeas 42, nays 26.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following new section, to stand as section five:

"The waters of this State, navigable in fact, shall be common highways, and forever free to the inhabitants of this State and the United States."

Mr. W. said he could conceive of no objection that could be raised against this proposition; it certainly was against millers. He was opposed to their damming up navigable streams; impeding their free navigation. The object of the section was to put an end to law suits growing out of the customs and laws of this State, by conflicting with the Ordinance.

Mr. J. BARTOW was happy to meet the gentleman [Mr. WILLIAMS] on some ground. He would say to him that our laws did not destroy the Ordinance, but merely threw it in doubt.

Mr. N. PIERCE said he would be glad to hear, if the proposition were adopted, what effect it would have where locks have been up?

Mr. CHAPEL—I will inform the gentleman that it will have the effect of making the water run over them.

Mr. CHURCH suggested the propriety of striking out the words "in fact."

Mr. N. PIERCE—That will not obviate the difficulty. What are navigable waters?

Mr. WALKER—I looked into the laws of the United States on yesterday, and the words used in the Statute are the same as in the proposition. It expressly provides that where streams have been meandered, and not found navigable, the adjacent proprietors shall be tenants in common of the bed of the stream.

The vote on the proposition of Mr. WILLIAMS' was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Arzeno, Bagg, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Comstock, Church, Daniels, Gardiner, Hanscom, Kinne, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Robertson, Sturgis, Town, Van

Valkenburgh, Walker, Webster, White, Whittemore, Williams—29.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Axford, Barnard, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Choate, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Wait, Warden, President—37.

Mr. CONNER offered the following as additional sections to the article:

"Sec. —. An accurate statement of the receipts and expenditures of the public moneys shall be attached to, and published with, the laws at every regular session of the Legislature.

"Sec. —. The Legislature shall provide for the speedy publication of all statute laws of a public nature, and of such judicial decisions as it may deem expedient. All laws and judicial decisions shall be free for publication by any person."

Both propositions were adopted.

Mr. DANIELS offered the following, to stand as a new section:

"The Legislature shall, as soon as practicable, establish a house of correction for juvenile and female offenders."

Mr. DANFORTH—The Legislature have the power now.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I rose for the purpose of making the same statement.

Mr. CHURCH—We have been unfortunate in one institution; and as the Legislature already have the power, we should not force the matter on them.

Mr. DANIELS remarked that it only required the Legislature to do it as soon as practicable, and he wished to present the views of the Convention to the Legislature. From observation, he was convinced that such an institution was necessary.

The motion was lost; yeas 29, nays 35.

Mr. HASCALL offered the following to stand as a separate section:

"The Legislature shall prescribe by law the manner in which the State printing shall be executed, and the accounts rendered therefor; and shall prohibit all charges for constructive labor."

Mr. H. said—Mr. President, we are here to correct abuses. Wherever important evils have developed themselves under our former system, we are expected to apply the remedy. The proposition which I have offered is calculated to bring about an important reform in a matter upon which there is much public feeling. That there have been most serious abuses connected with our system of State printing, under both whig and democratic administrations, I have yet to hear denied. A fortune has been realized by those who have been enabled to procure it for a succession of years, and the avidity with which it is sought after, is the best proof to me that the station is a desirable one. Men are not so anxious to lose money, as to bind themselves to a contract where this must be the inevitable result. Yet we have seen experienced, practical printers, bid in the State work at half the usual prices of printing, and make money at it. I ask any sensible man, in what manner must they, of necessity, execute the work, in order to make money as they do, and pay the high price for labor which they have been accustomed to do? All will answer, it can only be done by outraging the rules of correct taste; by charging the State with constructive labor never performed; and by taking advantage of the licenses of the craft to an extent never contemplated in any fair and honorable transaction.

Sir, from circumstances which have transpired, this movement on my part may be regarded as the result of personal ill feeling towards the present State Printer. Nothing can be more unfounded. I entertain feelings the most respectful towards that individual, and would extend to him any personal favor consistent with duty, in my power. But in this movement I am influenced solely with reference to the public interests and a sense of duty. My practical experience in the business which I follow, has enabled me to detect serious abuses connected with the public printing. These I have exposed and have endeavored to remedy.

I have acted conscientiously, and I fear no consequences personal to myself. However much others may shrink from coming in contact with an interested public press, when that press seeks to work an injury to the State, I shall maintain my position, regardless of fear or favor.

The proposition here presented is calculated to obviate the objections which certain timid gentlemen urged to that first offerred by me, but is intended in the end to accomplish the same result. My former measure was thought to go too much into detail for a constitutional provision; but it would be very useful in a law, and certain gentlemen would willingly see it in that shape. This proposition will accommodate them. It is general in its nature, and leaves all to the Legislature, only making it imperative on that body to make some special enactment in regard to the abuses which are sought to be corrected.

I do not wish to go over the discussions which have already been had on this subject. Our time is limited, and I do not wish to trespass on it a moment beyond the necessity of the case. The existence of circumstances which call for the movement here made, is agreed to by all. That some action should be had in this body, on this subject, is evident to all who have any interest in the welfare of the State. The Legislature has heretofore had control of the matter, but what has it done? What will it do hereafter, unless compelled by the constitution? Let the past answer. I am endeavoring to carry out what I deem to be the wishes of the people. I wish that they should know the friends and enemies of the proposed measure, and shall therefore ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the following as an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. HASCALL:]

"And the Legislature shall appoint their own State printer."

Mr. R. said—I wish to be allowed the privilege of sending up this amendment to the gentleman's proposition. I do not offer it with the anticipation that it will prove acceptable to this Convention, from the fact that I may, as a practical printer, and one of long experience in the State printing of this State, have presented my views and opinions in relation to the subject on a former occasion. I offer it in order to have an opportunity of recording my vote where it may be read hereafter, and for the purpose, sir, of showing to the people, when it will be too late to rectify the errors of this Convention, that your State printer, fastened down to particular prices for forty days' sessions, once in two years, and obliged to furnish his office here, and be here on the ground, cannot perform the duties. My own proposition originally was that the State printer should be elected, or that his selection might be left to the Legislature, on the ground, sir, that the letting of the printing by contract had failed in every State in which it had been attempted, and also in the United States Congress. The further object which I have in offering it, is to show the fact which I now leave for the consideration of members: that no printer can afford to furnish all the materials and hands necessary to conduct the State printing for a forty days' session, once in two years, at the prices now being paid him—that he may charge such excessive prices as he pleases, for you cannot get your printing done elsewhere, because you are situated in an isolated spot; and we are in one that never can admit of its being done under any other circumstances than those, perhaps, the most oppressive that ever have been in any other State in the Union.

Mr. STOREY said the whole matter was provided for in the legislative article. (Mr. S. here read the section in that article relative to State printing.) All this humbug about constructive printing had been voted in, and voted out, and he trusted it would be voted down again.

Mr. HASCALL said he wished to provide against loose printing, and this would do it. They were here to correct abuses, and the charge for constructive printing was one. He asked the yeas and nays.

The amendment of Mr. ROBERTS was lost—yeas 10, nays 51.

Mr. STOREY merely wished to say that if the proposition were adopted, it would not save a penny. He hoped this Convention would not attempt to break down the established rules and customs of any craft.

After a short conversational discussion between several members,

Mr. LEACH moved the previous question on the proposition; and the same being ordered, it was adopted—yeas 56, nays 6.

Mr. SOULE offered the following, to stand as a separate section:

"The laws, public records, and the judicial and legislative written proceedings of the State shall be conducted, promulgated and preserved in the English language."

And the same was adopted.

Mr. CORNELL offered the following, as an additional section:

"The Governor, after 1856, may, in his discretion, assume the legislative and judicial departments of the government."

Mr. C. said the article seemed to be a kind of common sink, and he wished to give it a good bottom. He withdrew the proposition.

Mr. HART offered the following, to stand as a separate section:

"The Legislature shall provide that after the year 1854, all taxes, except upon property paying specific taxes, shall be levied and collected in the townships and counties."

Mr. ARZENO moved the previous question on the article; and the same was demanded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The proposition of Mr. HART was then disagreed to—yeas 30, nays 32.

The article was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to adjourn.

Mr. CHAPEL moved a call of the House; but the call was not sustained.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the Convention then adjourned.

SATURDAY, (53d day,) August 10.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

REPORTS.

Mr. STOREY, from the committee on salaries, reported

ARTICLE —.

Of Salaries.

Sec. 1. The Governor shall receive an annual salary of one thousand dollars; the Judges of the Circuit Courts shall each receive an annual salary of fifteen hundred dollars; the State Treasurer shall receive an annual salary of one thousand dollars; the Auditor General shall receive an annual salary of one thousand dollars; the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall receive an annual salary of one thousand dollars; the Secretary of State shall receive an annual salary of eight hundred dollars; the Commissioner of the State Land Office shall receive an annual salary of eight hundred dollars; the Attorney General shall receive an annual salary of eight hundred dollars.

Which was read the first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole, and placed on the general order.

Mr. McCLELLAND, from the committee on the legislative department, to whom was referred the petition of George Goodman, W. H. McComber, and 147 others, praying the incorporation by the Convention of a clause in the constitution prohibiting the collection of all debts, of a less amount than one hundred dollars, if contracted after the adoption of the constitution, reported the same back to the Convention, recommending its reference to the committee on the judicial department, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration.

The committee was so discharged, and,

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the consideration of the petition was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. McCLELLAND, from the same committee, to whom was referred the remonstrance of the Mayor, Recorder and Aldermen of the city of Detroit, against the incorporation of a provision in the constitution, prohibiting the Legislature from giving to any city or village the power of granting licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors, &c., reported the same back, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration.

The committee was so discharged, and the remonstrance laid upon the table.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HANSCOM moved that the printing of the daily journals of the Convention be dispensed with for the remainder of the session.

Mr. CHURCH—We take up to-day the article "Upper Peninsula." Amendments will be made to it, and we shall not know on Monday morning how the article stands.

Mr. HANSCOM—By dispensing with the printing of the journals, we shall save three days of the time of the Convention.

Mr. BRITAIN—Has the gentleman formed his opinion after a consultation with the printers?

Mr. HANSCOM—I have formed my opinion from a knowledge of the facts.

We do not get our journals now until the middle of the day.

Mr. BRITAIN—I think that it should not be carried into effect without consultation with the printers.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I think we cannot get along without the journals. I know that I am so bungling that I cannot, without it, tell what took place yesterday.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Upon consultation with the members, it was thought to be the best plan to dispense with the printing of the journals at present. I do not know that it is the practice to have the journals printed for the use of the members each morning, in any State of the Union, except this. It is not done in Congress. They never have a journal before them, nor do they see the journals until weeks after, frequently not until the end of the session. In the present case the clerk will read the journal, slowly of course. Any errors can be corrected, and it will save expense and a great deal of time.

The bills and articles are now in the hands of the committee on phraseology. When they make a change it must be printed, and the force of the printing office is not sufficient to print the articles and the journals, and enable us to adjourn by Thursday. Again, let us look at the Convention of 1835. The report was made in the afternoon—the constitution was engrossed and sent up on the morning of the 24th, and the Convention then adjourned.

Mr. CHURCH—I understand that the matter is set up as soon as it leaves here, and that the delay is in the bindery; they are not folded and fit for distribution.

Mr. HANSCOM—I will withdraw the motion.

The article entitled “Miscellaneous Provisions,” coming up for a third reading,

Mr. LEACH moved to recommit to the committee on miscellaneous provisions, with instructions to insert the following to stand as a separate section:

“The property of all persons who by law are prohibited from voting on account of color, shall be exempt from taxation.

Mr. L. said—I do not propose to discuss the matter. This Convention has decided that people of color shall be prohibited from voting. I therefore hope that this amendment may be incorporated, as taxation and representation should go together.

No person should be taxed except he has a right to vote.

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend by striking out the words “on account of color.”

Mr. ROBERTSON—I think that it is an imposition. Other persons have not the right of voting; but all persons have their property protected by law. Persons under the age of 21, and women, have not the right of voting. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MORRISON—If we exempt persons of color, we should exempt every other class who cannot vote from taxation.

Mr. LEACH—We all know that women are represented by the other sex. Foreigners are in a short time entitled to vote; but as long as you deny the right of voting to a whole class, you should exempt their property.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend by adding thereto, “also report the following as an additional section to the article, viz:

“To promote the early sale and settlement of the unappropriated public lands now held by the United States exempt from taxation, within this State, the Legislature is hereby authorized to take all necessary and proper steps to procure a cession of said lands to the State whenever they can be obtained on just and advantageous terms; and whatever sum, if any, shall be realized from the sales of the land so acquired, after repaying to the State the amount of all advances made on account of the purchase, management, sale, and settlement of the same, together with interest thereon, shall constitute a permanent fund for the benefit of education, and the support of such deaf, dumb, blind and insane persons as are unable to support themselves.”

Mr. C. said—I do this because when this article was before us previously, a motion was made by a delegate to strike it out, and the previous question was demanded by a delegate from Calhoun. I desire to say nothing on the subject. A friend of mine does, and I wish to give him an opportunity. I will, however, take occasion to say, that when a motion is made to strike out a section, to demand the previous question, without allowing time for any explanation, is, in my view, exceedingly improper.

Mr. HANSCOM—I hope that we may take a direct vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Genesee, [Mr. LEACH.]

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I think it can do no harm to retain the section. It merely authorizes the Legislature to do so and so. Three quarters of the land is held by the United States; they claim the soil, and if that title can be extinguished upon favorable terms, it must be a vast benefit to the people of this State. I do not wish to discuss the matter, but I think it can do no harm.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I was aware that there was a lurking desire to insert in general terms, something which should be the ground-work of future legislation—to enable them to have a plausible reason for urging this land question, which will surely be a source of trouble and corruption to the State hereafter, if they succeed. I hope that the matter will be fully and finally settled to-day, for I believe that this Convention is decidedly averse to it. No good can come out of it. We do not want the land. It is got up by a few for speculative purposes.

The author was here a few days ago with his printed circulars. He was a prudent, cautious man; he laid his plans and went away. Here is the working of his plan, and it is as well understood as if the whole was spread in detail, and I shall oppose it on every stage of its proceedings. I hope the section will be stricken out.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I think the section should be stricken out. In a few years the lands may be distributed. The State has never had the handling of lands, but it has been a source of corruption and trouble.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope it will be stricken out. This Convention has decided against holding property of this kind. It may probably turn out well; but from every apparent indication it will be more likely to involve the State in ruin and disgrace. I hope, therefore, that it will be met in its incipient stages, and put down.

Mr. KINGSLEY was likewise opposed to it. It would merely supply an office for a few pet politicians. This tells the Legislature that they shall do it.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the foregoing, by inserting after the word "terms:"

"Not exceeding the average value of said lands to the United States, during the ten years next preceding the adoption of this constitution."

Mr. B. said—My object is to set the matter right before the Convention. The delegate from Calhoun thinks that the lands may soon be distributed. Would this State dare to receive them? Would the delegate from Calhoun sincerely wish it? The idea is that a large amount of money is to be paid for these lands. I do not so understand it. It has been found that all that the United States has received per year, for the last ten years, is $48,000. What then is the value of the lands. Such a sum as would produce an interest of $48,000 per year. The Legislature might get them on better terms, but that estimate would reduce them to but a few cents per acre. I do not pledge myself to vote for the proposition ultimately; but I do feel anxious to have the matter carefully considered, coming from the respectable source from which it does, and that we should not throw away blindfoldedly what may be of future advantage to the State.

The person spoken of as the author wants no office; he does not wish it; his compass is better to him than any office. He estimated what the lands had been worth to the United States, and that if we could get them at that rate, it would be like getting them for nothing. The sale of lands yearly, now, is $100,000; if we had them, it would probably put into the treasury the first year $50,000, clear of expenses. I want the proposition fairly understood.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—The gentleman from Genesee should look at this point of view. Three-quarters of the wild lands are in the hands of the United States. The general government has already made a profit of $10,000,000, over and above the expenses of sale, and the expense arising from the purchase of Indian titles; and the wild lands are still owned by the United States; and while so owned, they will not be settled for a number of years. It is for the interest of this State to promote the settlement of the wild lands within the State. We are entitled, by the compact of 1787, to these lands. Each one of the original States became seized of their lands, upon the severance of the colonies from the British crown, and the new States came into the Union on the same footing as the old States, in all respects whatever. What harm can this do, or by what argument can this be termed a corruption fund?

Mr. BRITAIN's amendment was lost.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the proposition of Mr. CHURCH, as follows:

Strike out in line five, after the word "after," the words "repaying to the State the amount of all advances made;" and insert "deducting the amount paid;" and insert at the end thereof, the following: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the Legislature to pledge the payment of any sum or sums therefor, except out of the proceeds of the sale thereof."

Which was accepted by Mr. CHURCH.

Mr. WALKER said—That, I think, will obviate the danger of running the State into debt and trouble, beyond what the lands produce. I think, if the lands could be obtained on these terms, we might effect a speedy settlement of the State.

Mr. BARTOW—I would like to know if the gentleman from Macomb wants to run the State into debt?

Mr. WALKER—Undoubtedly not.

Mr. J. BARTOW—The friends of this measure do not want to produce it in its naked shape; but the effect will be to steep the State in debt up to the ears. They propose to contract a debt to the United States, pay the interest yearly, and the principal when they can; it is a miserable scheme. The interest must be paid yearly by direct taxation, the principal by the sale of the lands. Some time or other it will be a source of corruption—it will control legislation.

Mr. BRITAIN—Is the gentleman talking with reference to the amendment? He is laboring in the whole field.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I will labor in the whole field, and I can take any particular part of it and confute it.

The CHAIR read the amendment.

Mr. BRITAIN—Has the gentleman any objection to that amendment?

Mr. J. BARTOW—I have an objection to every part of it. The delegate from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] has had many such questions to deal with. There has been no question, however ultra, however destitute of reason, or of common sense, that has not met with his approval.

The CHAIR said the gentleman from Genesee was out of order.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I protest against the whole movement. It will involve us deeply; make us meddle with matters that we have no business to touch. If they give us the lands, we will endeavor to make the best use of them; but the present method I consider a piece of utter absurdity.

Mr. BUSH—From the remarks of the gentleman from Genesee, I do not understand the proposition. I understood it to be this: that for the last ten years, the net proceeds of the lands of the State amounted to $48,000; and that the proposition was this: that the Legislature should be authorized, if opportunity presented, to make a contract with Congress to take charge of the public lands in the State of Michigan, dispose of the lands for the U. S., pay them for a series of years the amount that they have been receiving per annum, and appropriate the balance in opening roads in the more remote portions of the State, where the lands lie; and that, after the series of years have expired, for which they have agreed to pay the yearly amount, the balance of the lands shall belong to the State of Michigan. The last amendment was, that no risks should be run; that the payments should be confined to the amount actually received from the lands; that no debt should be incurred, but that the balance should remain as a permanent fund.

If the evils really exist, as pictured forth by the gentleman from Genesee, I should be opposed to it; but I think that they only exist in the imagination of the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER said he offered his amendment to obviate the evils contemplated by the gentleman from Genesee.

Mr. FRALICK—I thought that we settled the question yesterday; I therefore move the previous question.

The amendment offered by Mr. CHURCH was lost.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to amend the instructions proposed, as follows:

Also to report a separate section, as follows: "The Legislature shall provide that, after the year 1853, all taxes except upon property paying specific taxes, shall be levied and collected in the respective townships and counties."

Mr. BUTTERFIELD wished to read an amendment containing a proposition that had not been presented to the consideration of the Convention: "That the Legislature should provide that in no case should more than seven per cent interest be allowed."

Mr. B. said he was aware that the opinion was generally entertained that money should be as free as any other article of merchandize; that there should be no uniform or legal rate of interest, in fact; but he thought that if members would give it due consideration, they would arrive at a different conclusion; for it must be evident that loans made, bearing exorbitant interest, could not be of any benefit to the borrower; and must tend in the end to embarrassment and loss; and he therefore wished the capital of the State directed from this channel and thrown into other directions. One man who invests ten thousand dollars in some legitimate channel of trade, who, with that capital, pursues some active employment, is worth more to the State than if he possessed one hundred thousand dollars, and let it out on bond and mortgage at ten per cent. If we allow that amount of interest to be drawn, we withdraw so much capital from the business of the country, and likewise from taxation; for capitalists will prefer employing it in that manner, than in more active employments, with that rate of interest; while, otherwise, lands might be improved; water power might be brought into operation, and other measures that would be productive of benefit to the State at large.

Mr. DANFORTH—I move the previous question. If the amendment is agreed to, it would take $30,000 out of the treasury, and would clog the wheels of government.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I think the gentleman from Ingham is not fair. It is not my proposition; but I think that it ought to carry. Does the Auditor General control the wheels of government? I think that the taxes should be collected in the towns and counties.

Mr. AMMON BROWN moved the previous question on the article; and the same being demanded, the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. LEACH wanted to know where his amendment was?

The CHAIR—It falls with the motion.

Mr. LEACH—I think the gentlemen ought to be ashamed of themselves.

[Cries of order—order.]

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to reconsider the vote ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. MORRISON demanded the yeas and nays.

And the same prevailed—yeas 36, nays 31.

And the question being, shall the main question be now put? it was decided in the negative, by yeas 28, nays 38.

And, by the rule, the consideration of the article being suspended for the day,

Mr. HANSCOM moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. BUSH moved a call of the House; which motion was lost.

Mr. BRITAIN hoped that the gentleman from Oakland would withdraw his motion. If the matter was not pressed through to-day, we might do some other business. A disposition seems to prevail with some, to cut off the right of other members to present amendments, by the help of the previous question; and, to show how little good it can effect, how many motions to reconsider have been made within the three days? I hope the article will be permitted to remain where it is, out of the reach of the House, for one day. The people of the State of Michigan are not disposed to surrender what they consider their rights; and, for evidence, I may refer to the proceedings of this morning.

Mr. HANSCOM—I think that the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] has lost his ordinary shrewdness. Where is the propriety of opening again the whole article. Why not dispose of it to-day, except it is the intention of the Convention to prepare a fresh nest of amendments. I want to get rid of it to-day; and I believe this Convention is as well prepared to vote upon the measure to-day, as it will be at any future time. I want to come to a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Genesee, and next upon the amendment of the gentleman from Calhoun. The previous question is not upon the whole article.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—If that is the position of things, I am in favor of a suspension of rules.

A MEMBER inquired if it required a majority, or a two-thirds vote; and what would be the effect of a suspension of the rules?

The CHAIR stated that it brought the matter fully before the Convention; and that it required a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BRITAIN thought that business would be facilitated if the article was allowed to lie over for the present.

Mr. ROBERTSON said a change had come over the spirit of the dreams of the gentleman from Berrien. He [Mr. R.] hoped that the rules would not be suspended. All the propositions had been voted down—some by an overwhelming majority. What was right in the case of the gentleman the other day, should be right to-day.

The yeas and nays being had, the result was—yeas 47, nays 19.

So the rule was suspended, two-thirds having voted therefor.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved a call of the House. The same was ordered, and MESSRS. ANDERSON, BEARDSLEY, CHAPEL, LEE, McLEOD and SKINNER were absent without leave.

Leave of absence was asked and obtained for MESSRS. McLEOD and SKINNER.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Sergeant-at-arms was despatched for MESSRS. ANDERSON, BEARDSLEY, CHAPEL and LEE.

Who soon thereafter appearing in their seats,

On motion of Mr. LEACH, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The question being upon Mr. LEACH's motion to recommit the article Miscellaneous Provisions with instructions, a division of the question was had, and the motion to recommit first put and lost—yeas 30, nays 44.

The article was then read a third time, and the question being, "shall the article now pass?" the yeas and nays were had, as follows:

YEAS—MESSRS. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eaton, Fralick, Gibson, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Town, Van Valkenburg, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whipple, Whittemore—46.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Asahel Brown, Carr, Daniels, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Leach, Lovell, Moore, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, Sturgis, Wait, White, Williams, President—24.

So the article was passed, and under the rule referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to suspend the rules limiting the time of debate, so far as it referred to proceedings in committee, during the time the article entitled "Upper Peninsula" was under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Yesterday we had questions of importance, and the rule was refused to be suspended. When it meets gentlemen's convenience, it can be retained and enforced in the most harsh and ungracious manner. Many of us are detained here most unwillingly. I have pressing business at home, that calls my attention so imperatively, that I only remain from a conviction of duty. This is not of more importance than other questions, and the extension of the rule I should regard as a gross act of injustice.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I hope the gentleman from St. Joseph will cast no imputations. When I moved to reconsider the vote, reference was made to the upper peninsula; and it was agreed by many that it should not apply to this question, as it was necessary that it should be discussed. The other questions have been fully discussed, but this has not. The gentleman from St. Joseph, himself, said, a little while ago, that on this subject he was in the dark. It will be discussed in committee of the whole. If it is tedious, we can bring it into Convention; then the rule will apply.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Monroe will prevail. I think that it ought to meet the views of the whole Convention. It is of importance that the subject should be properly discussed; and it cannot be done with propriety under the rule that has been adopted. No gentleman can do justice to himself and his subject within that time, upon an entirely new question. I do not doubt that every gentleman in this Convention desires to do justice to the upper peninsula, and I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. CORNELL—Upon my manual I find my name enrolled as a member of the committee upon the government of the upper peninsula; but that is all that I know about it. I have never been called upon; and I want time to be taken, so that I can understand the subject. I am confident that members will require more than five minutes to discuss the matter; therefore I want the rule suspended.

Mr. GALE—I am a member of the same committee, but that is all that I know about it. I have no voice in the report, and I hope that the rule will be suspended.

Mr. HANSCOM—I am in the same condition. I did not know anything about it, so I told them to fix it up to suit themselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS—The gentleman says that this is a new question. The rule was applied stringently the other morning when a question was presented that I deemed essential to the welfare of the country, and that had not before been offered to the consideration of this Convention. The hammer dropped, and the same courtesy was not shown to me that was extended to others all over the house.

I voted for the widest latitude, until it was put up for a special purpose. Now it is to be taken off for a special purpose; and I am opposed to its being so taken off, as I consider it as rank injustice. Let each man be confined to a speech of five minutes. For nine weeks we have had this subject before us, and if each member has done his duty, he is as well prepared to vote without speeches as he can be with them.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I find the name of the gentleman from St. Joseph among the yeas yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Yes; but after the rule was sustained. I want to keep it so.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I was opposed to it yesterday; it was violated every few minutes. I want the gentlemen of the upper country to give us what information they can. I want the rule suspended.

Mr. MOORE—I believe that we should have had as good a constitution as we now have, if the five minutes rule had been adopted from the beginning, and we might have been home a month ago. Gentlemen might condense their speeches; it would have as good an effect—probably better.

Mr. ROBERTS—After every other article has had a full and free discussion, I hope that there will be civility enough in this Convention to allow the friends of the upper peninsula an opportunity of stating their views. For my part I cannot see what objection there can be. The report was printed as early as it was practicable. We labored under this difficulty, that we could not prepare it before we saw what the general frame work of the constitution was to be, as we wished to make it as much in accordance with it as possible.

The motion to suspend the rules prevailed by a two-thirds vote.

On motion of Mr. WHIPPLE, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the article entitled "of Upper Peninsula," Mr. WALKER in the chair.

Section 1 was read, as follows:

Sec. 1. That all that portion of the public domain within the territorial limits of the State of Michigan, including the boundaries of the islands of lakes Superior, Huron and Michigan, and in Green Bay, the Straits of Mackinac and the river Ste Marie, known as the counties of Mackinac, Chippewa, Delta, Marquette, Schoolcraft, Houghton and Ontonagon, and the islands thereunto attached, shall constitute a separate judicial district, and be entitled to one circuit judge, who shall perform the same duties, and possess the same powers of other circuit court judges of the State; and to one district attorney, who shall perform the duties of prosecuting attorney throughout the entire district, and who shall be elected at the same time, and hold his office for a like period

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, "one circuit," was stricken out, and the words "a district" inserted in line 5.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, "other" was stricken out of line six, and the words "and hold his office for the same period," were inserted after the word "State."

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the words "the boundaries of" were stricken out of line two.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following, to be inserted in sixth line, after the word "State:"

"Provided, That for the choice of a regent of the University, the territory described shall be annexed to the same judicial circuit as the county of Wayne."

Mr. J. BARTOW would like to know if the object of the mover was to deprive them of a regent?

Mr. WILLIAMS—Not if they have the proper population.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I see no necessity for attaching this territory to that of Wayne. If they are entitled to any privileges at all, they are entitled to the choice of a regent. Their necessities are as great with regard to education as with regard to judicial matters. The people are universally taxed, and you cannot with justice deprive them of any part of their rights. But they are entitled, above all others, to a regent of their own choice. As there are large settlements, there is a great territory, and many children to be educated. Why not extend to them this right? You might as well deny them their judicial privileges as deny them this.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Suppose they do not want a regent. Many districts will comprise 60,000 before they are entitled to the choice of a regent. Let it be distinctly expressed that they shall have a regent, or that they shall not.

Mr. DANFORTH—I would like to know if all this population has ever paid any tax except the specific tax.

Mr. ROBERTS—The same question has been asked before. I will answer it again. Mackinac has always paid a tax; so has Chippewa, except an improper tax, which was rescinded. The specific tax has been paid from the upper country. We are not indebted to the lower peninsula in any shape—in fact she is indebted to us.

Mr. BRITAIN—I am of a different opinion. I understand that the upper peninsula refuses to pay a State tax, on the ground that she has had no benefit from the State.

Mr. WHIPPLE would inquire if this discussion was pertinent to the question whether they had a right to elect a regent?

Mr. WILLIAMS—I think that it is a legitimate inquiry. I am prepared, and I hope that every gentleman is likewise prepared, to do justice to the upper country; but it is necessary that we should know the amount of taxes that have been paid. I understand that $1700 is due from Chippewa alone, with the accumulated interest upon it, making it over $2000.

Mr. J. BARTOW—When the financial matter comes up, we can then properly examine it. I believe that the gentleman from St. Joseph labors under a serious misapprehension on the subject.

Mr. WILLIAM's amendment was lost.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend by inserting after the word "district," in line seven, the words "who shall have power to issue his warrant for the arrest of offenders, in cases of felony, returnable according to provisions of law."

Mr. C. said—I offer this in behalf of a delegate who is at present absent from the house. On account of the sparsity of population, a difficulty arises which the adoption of this amendment will tend to remove. An offence is committed of a grave character. The district attorney is summoned. By making inquiries, he is satisfied that the person should be arrested. He is obliged to go to some justice, perhaps living at a great distance, then send an officer with the warrant, and the result is such a delay that an opportunity is offered for the escape of the criminal. The amendment proposes to vest this power in the hands of the district attorney, after due examination of the facts connected with the alleged violation of the law, if he is satisfied that a warrant should be issued, that he may be enabled to do so in accordance with law.

I can see no objection to giving the prosecuting attorney this power in the upper country; it will save much delay, much expense. I offer this for the favorable consideration of the House. I am indifferent about the form, but I think that the power should be given.

Motion carried.

On motion of Mr. KINGSLEY, the words "in their respective circuits," were inserted after "State," in sixth line.

On motion of Mr. HASCALL, the words "to be elected by the qualified electors of said district," were inserted in fifth line, after the word "judge."

Sec. 2. That the boundaries defined in the preceding section shall constitute a senatorial district, and be entitled at all times to at least one Senator in the Senate of the State.

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike it out.

Mr. HANSCOM wanted some reasons.

Mr. FRALICK—I do not want to take up the time of the committee; but it should be left to the Legislature. They would give them all they were entitled to.

Mr. GALE—I cannot understand the reason for districting one district and not the others. I think that we are bound by the principle of justice to district the whole at the same time. Where, I would ask, is the propriety of districting one, and leaving the rest undistricted. It is contrary to reason and common sense.

Mr. FRALICK thought the matter ought to be left open. We had not the necessary information before us, and he thought that justice would be done to the upper country.

Mr. J. BARTOW—They are separated by nature from the lower peninsula, and if they are entitled to a Senator, it should be secured to them. It is most proper and just that they should be represented in both branches of the Legislature. We ask but one in the upper branch, and with respect to the other we can consult what is right. The immense interest that we all have in the settlement of this country will make us all feel that the rights of the country should be respected, and that by a distinct provision in the constitution. If it had been represented before, we should not have had gentlemen say that they were so ignorant with respect to its population or resources. I am fixed in the belief that we should give them a full, fair representation in both branches.

Mr. FRALICK—I did not assert that they would not be entitled to a Senator; but that I had no doubt full justice would be done to them. What they were entitled to, that they would have.

Mr. GALE—This involves another question. From the report it seems designed as a distinct government. If its interests are regarded as so distinctly opposite to the interests of the State of Michigan, then it should be regarded in that light. But it is a question whether we, as the representatives of the people of the State of Michigan, have a right thus to separate one portion of the country from the other. I supposed that we came here to establish general principles, leaving them to be further carried out by the Legislature; but we have now a new idea, that we ought to establish a separate government; and I contend that by so doing we are departing from the principles which we were sent here to establish, and from every correct principle of government. Are not the Legislature as well qualified to district that portion as the rest of the State? Have they not as much authority to do it as we have? If they have not, I am utterly mistaken.

Mr. J. BARTOW—We have been obliged to depart from general principles by the geographical position of our State, and it is proper under our circumstances. Whereas, had we been situated like other States, it would have been wrong. We have varied in another respect, and with the gentleman's consent. In the representation for the new counties, we have done no more than what was just and proper; but if it was correct, as regarded the new counties, how much more is it needed with regard to this remote country, which is equal in extent to the whole inhabited portion of the State.

I was sorry to hear my colleague talk of a separation; it cannot be done with justice either to them or us. I hope that it will never be mentioned again. I repudiate the idea as much as I do the dissolution of the Union. You cannot take care of a country that is not represented. A member of Congress will only take care of his own district, his immediate constituents, and the rest of the country has to suffer; and it is a melancholy fact that there are but one or two men that can tell us any thing about the upper country.

This is a vast region of country, of many thousand square miles in extent, and it is our duty to see that it does not run to waste. While my colleague is right, as regards general principles, I think that an exception should be made with regard to the upper peninsula.

Mr. GALE—I think it is necessary, if their interests are diametrically opposed to ours, and certainly the proceedings indicate a supposition of that kind; but I am opposed to any measure that will perpetuate that kind of feeling. What is asked? That we should give them six representatives; while, for anything we know, there are not more than as many hundreds of population. They are fully entitled to all their rights; but, are they not, and have they not been sufficiently protected? With regard to all the northern counties, it is not the square miles, but the population that was estimated. They may want a senator. I have no objection to give them a senator, provided we do it upon general principles; but I think that legislating in this manner for a part, is unjust towards the rest of the State. We are here to form an organic law, and we should not depart from general principles; if we depart from them, it should be for good and well known reasons, which have not in this case been given. We should at the same time district the whole State; and if they are then entitled to a senator, I am willing that it should be given to the upper country.

Mr. N. PIERCE said it was well understood that a separate article was to be brought in, giving a separate jurisdiction to the upper peninsula. When we gave the representatives to the northern counties, we made no provision for the upper peninsula at that time, and he expected they would want a senator.

The committee refused to strike out.

Sec. 3. The county of Mackinac, with the territory thereto attached, shall be entitled to one Representative to the State Legislature; the county of Chippewa, and the territory thereto attached, one Representative; the county of Delta, with the Beaver and other islands in the Straits of Mackinac, one Representative; the counties of Marquette and Schoolcraft, and the territory thereto attached, one Representative; the county of Houghton, and the territory thereto attached, one Representative, and the county of Ontonagon, with the territory attached thereto, one Representative.

Mr. FRALICK offered the following as a substitute for said section:

"The counties of Mackinaw and Chippewa, with the territory thereto attached, shall be entitled to one representative to the State Legislature; the counties of Delta, Schoolcraft and Marquette, with the territory thereto attached, shall be entitled to one representative; and the counties of Ontonagon and Houghton, with the territory thereto attached, shall be entitled to one representative."

Mr. F. said—I wish this substitute adopted, as I think it is sufficiently liberal. I do not think that the population is entitled to more than three representatives. If we adopt the plan giving each county a member when it is organized, we shall have a member with a very small population. I believe that by the substitute the territory is contiguous to the county to be represented.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I do not know whether the delegate from Wayne has examined the map; but there will be some hundred of miles to travel to ascertain the election of one representative. The proposition is wrong; it is not applicable to the upper peninsula. The delegate from Wayne thinks it is liberal; we do not come here asking for liberality; we do not want charity; but we do come here to ask what is right. We do represent territory in the Legislature—we have adopted the principle in Congress. The whole Senate of the United States is based upon territory, not upon population. Florida has two representatives, and has probably not 10,000 white inhabitants. We ask what is right and proper, and do not transcend a general rule. Houghton has 2,000 inhabitants; Ontonogan 1,000; Schoolcraft 500; Delta has 1,000; and it must be recollected that these are all men. There is not the usual number of women and children; they are all adults, all voters; therefore the population is equivalent to five times the number in the settled districts of the State, because the usual number of adults is about one to five of the population generally.

Mr. GALE—Has Florida two representatives with only ten thousand white inhabitants?

Mr. WILLIAMS—At the last return, Florida had twenty-eight thousand inhabitants.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I spoke of the white inhabitants. I repeat, that if the counties had five times the population, there would be no question as to the propriety; yet that should be the rule to judge. Delta is peculiarly situated; it is the best pine country in Michigan. Thousands of lumbermen come and go, and we should hold out inducements for them to become permanent citizens. I am not urging this matter because I have any personal feeling on the subject; but I want justice extended toward that portion of the country, that will become the California of Michigan, and will eventually be worth more than California, with all her gold.

What does the gentleman from Wayne mean by being liberal or charitable? He has no right to give anything away. We have only a right to be just, and that we may act justly, I present these facts. Does the gentleman from Wayne fear the political aspect it will assume? That has been destroyed, and the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] is father to the system; whether for good or for evil remains to be seen.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I was opposed to the system reported in the legislative article, and made some three or four speeches against the single senatorial district system.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I referred to biennial sessions and limitation of time. The gentleman from Monroe stands father to the system.

Mr. McCLELLAND—It was engrafted in the article in consequence of its being the unanimous wish of the people of the State. The people have fully expressed that wish. I represent merely a part of the people; and when we come here, knowing their wishes, we are bound to carry them out, unless we know that their opinions have changed.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I think that half the number of Representatives they ask will be sufficient for the upper peninsula. The population is sparse, and the gentlemen have given us but few facts. A great many are a transitory population; themselves and their families are numbered elsewhere. They merely go there for a few months in the summer. Here we have twelve representatives—

Mr. J. BARTOW—Who talks of twelve Representatives?

Mr. N. PIERCE—I do, sir.

Mr. J. BARTOW—Who besides?

Mr. N. PIERCE—I do not know. But we give six Representatives to the northern counties, and six is wanted for the upper peninsula; and but little population in the whole. How many civilized Indians there are, I do not know; but there is but little evidence of a white population. They ought to tell us how many "half-breeds" there are, and how many settlements; but, instead of that, they only tell us of their riches, and talk about their rights. I think they ought to have three Representatives, and I think that is quite enough.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the same back, and asked and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT, and a quorum being present,

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, it was resolved into a committee of the whole on the article entitled Upper Peninsula, Mr. WALKER in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of Mr. FRALICK's substitute for section 5, when it was withdrawn, and the following offered in its stead:

"The territory embraced in the first section of this article, shall be entitled to three Representatives."

Mr. ROBERTS wished the report to be read.

The report of the committee on the affairs of the upper peninsula was read by the Secretary.

Mr. FRALICK—I propose to make a single remark. The proposition did not suit me, although I think three members a sufficient number. The gentleman from Genesee first said that he wanted us to be liberal; secondly, that he did not want any liberality; but I am willing to be liberal, and I think that this proposition is so. I do not think that this Convention possesses the proper knowledge of the locality and population of the upper country, to district the members; and if correct now, the whole aspect might be changed in three or four years; at least it would probably be subject to change, more than any other portion of the State. It would probably be the best to leave it to the Legislature to do as they shall deem the best.

Mr. CORNELL moved to strike out "three" and insert "four."

Mr. ROBERTS—I would like to make an inquiry. We shall probably have one hundred Representatives in the House, and thirty-two Senators in the Senate. Will not ninety-four Representatives and thirty-one Senators be a fair compliment for the lower peninsula, consisting, as it does, of 36,000 square miles. The proportion which this bill calls for is small, as compared with the interests and value of the upper peninsula.

Mr. DANFORTH inquired if the whole taxes received from the upper country, including the specific taxes, would pay for seven members?

Mr. ROBERTS—I am prepared to answer that question at the proper time. We have paid by thousands into the treasury; while for us, you have paid for nothing, except for a member from Mackinac and one from Chippewa. Mackinac has paid all her indebtedness; so have most of the other counties. Chippewa has paid within a few hundred dollars. How is it, I would ask, with the other counties of the State? Berrien owes $341; Calhoun, $1,549 58; Cass, $2,272 41; Chippewa, $1,800 78—$1,600 of which, by an act of the Legislature, was ordered to be rescinded, as it never ought to have been levied; therefore, the actual balance against Chippewa is $200 68. Jackson, Kalamazoo, Kent, Lapeer, Livingston, Macomb, Monroe, Oakland, Wayne, St. Clair, Washtenaw, are all largely indebted to the State; whilst all that can be shown against those counties in the upper peninsula which I have named, is $200 68. I will appeal to the records, if there is any charge against the mining companies; or if there is any charge against Ontonagon, Marquette, Schoolcraft, or any other county. There is not a cent due from that portion of the State to the Auditor General. There has been a large amount paid in from taxes and the mining companies; while the whole amount received has been only for the members from Mackinac and Chippewa; and we ought, in fact, to have part refunded. I might ask the gentleman from Ingham, how the State debt of the lower peninsula compares with the debt of the upper? But I can assert that we have paid more than we have expended at any time, or upon any occasion.

Mr. DANFORTH—I did not call for the balance sheet of the several counties. The old counties are in debt $30,000; the new ones, about $40,000; but I called for a statement respecting taxes received from Mackinac, Chippewa, and the rest of the upper country. Chippewa has had a member for thirteen years, and it has cost the State over $7,000 to pay for that Representative; while Chippewa has paid, in thirteen years, $607, Mackinac has paid $3,000; while her Representative has cost $7,000 for the last thirteen years; and the mining companies have paid in between $3,000 and $4,000. Looking at the matter as it really exists, those who profess the most liberal views should be cautious, as the expense must be much greater if we entail seven Representatives upon that country. I voted in favor of the new counties, and I will go as far as my conscience will permit; but I cannot vote to give them six Representatives and one Senator, with so small a population and so little paid for taxes. I do not believe that the taxes of the whole upper country, including the specific taxes, would pay for those seven members. If they will show a shadow of right, I will go as far as any man to support them.

Mr. HANSCOM—One thing is hardly fair; that the gentleman from Ingham should calculate the expenses since the formation of the last constitution; because their expenses cannot justly be charged upon the mining counties. If the late constitution authorized a member to be sent with a small population from Mackinac and Chippewa, we should not therefore jeopardize the interests of the great mining country on Lake Superior.

If you choose to disfranchise Mackinac and Chippewa, that is one thing; if you choose to extend representation to the shores of Lake Superior, that is another matter. Mackinac and Chippewa have had a member for the last fifteen years. If this Convention chooses to withdraw their right of sending a member, they should not strike a blow at the newly organized counties beyond them; for there is no more connexion between Mackinac and the counties beyond, than there is between Mackinac and Wayne.

The article has designated all the counties. I should have preferred it had the committee merely acted with reference to the five counties, and left it discretionary with the Convention in respect to the mining counties.

What are the facts with regard to the mining population? The last census told us that there were no settlements—not a white man existed there. But a short time has elapsed since the first vessel sailed from Saut Ste Marie, carrying a few individuals, who commenced exploring. Now, dating from that time, what has been the change of things? Some four years ago I was in that country—left in the fall and returned again in the spring. I was with Houghton and some others—traversed the country, and had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with its characteristics. Back of the coast there is an agricultural country; but on the coast agriculture cannot be carried on—it is a rocky region. What, then, has been effected since 1846—four brief years? At that time hardly a white man was there; one solitary schooner constituted the whole of the shipping interest from Detroit to the Saut Ste Marie, and one was drawn up on the side of Lake Superior shore. Now they have propellers and steamboats; then they carried in the one schooner a few supplies for the settlers; now they have a commerce of hundreds of thousands of dollars, in this work of four years. Then communication was only had once a month between Detroit and Mackinac, except sometimes by the addition of a strange vessel of pleasure, or a vessel trading for furs. Now they have regular lines of steamboats to Saut Ste Marie, connected with the other side, to afford a passage to Lake Superior. A slight reflection on what has been done in so short a time, must indicate to us the impropriety of basing our action upon the basis of the present population.

I am a citizen of one of the older and larger counties of Michigan, and I design to reside there as long as I live; but I believe there is magnanimity enough in our older counties to concede to our northern brethren the right of common justice. If you do not concede them all they ask, concede them something. But we ought not to rob Mackinac and Chippewa of the right of representation which they have enjoyed for the last fifteen years, when the population was much smaller than it is now. Nor should we confine the representation of the upper peninsula to one member, with the important interests of the mines and fisheries, that we are bound to protect.

By the time we have another enumeration of the inhabitants, they will amount to more than twenty fold what they now are. What do they ask? One-thirty-second part of the Senate, about one-seventeenth of the House of Representatives. It may be of vast benefit to them; and we should take into account the probable increase, as judged by the increase of the last four years.

The upper peninsula has been no expense, except that of granting them charters. Shiawassee has cost the State more about her county seat than the whole of the upper peninsula; but shall we tell that county, you shall have no Representative, because you have cost us more than you have paid into the treasury.

Mr. WILLIAMS—How many votes did they cast for delegates to this Convention?

Mr. HANSCOM—I do not know. The community is scattered.

Mr. WILLIAMS—How many tons of shipping?

Mr. HANSCOM—I might make a very lengthy report.

Mr. DANFORTH—I have no ill feeling to the upper peninsula. I supposed that the permits were given to capitalists who went there to speculate. I think that seven Representatives are too many, as there is no proportionate population; and I do not believe the taxes would pay for the members.

Mr. ROBERTS—The gentleman is particular with regard to the upper peninsula. He will find on record that $700,000 have been spent by the Legislature for roads and bridges. The money has been squandered, and not a dollar applied to the upper peninsula.

I wish the report read recommending the land to be so distributed—

Mr. N. PIERCE—I cannot foresee—

Mr. ROBERTS—I know the gentleman cannot foresee a great many things.

Mr. CORNELL—I do not see much propriety in having the report read. If the lands have all been squandered, it does not make any argument for the upper peninsula.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I would like to ask the delegate from Wayne, as he proposes three Representatives for the upper country, if he proposes to designate the counties that are to have Representatives.

Mr. FRALICK—I would leave that to the Legislature.

Mr. WHIPPLE—Mackinac is entitled to one Representative; so is Chippewa. If I understand the proposition rightly, one more Representative will be allowed for the mining country on the shore of Lake Superior. What, then, are you going to do with Delta and Beaver Island? They have population enough already to entitle them to a Representative; and there is to be a large accession of population on Beaver Island. Rather than deprive that portion from being represented, I should prefer throwing Mackinac and Chippewa in one district, as I believe that Delta and the Beaver Islands have population more than Mackinac and Chippewa put together. I do not, however, wish to deprive Mackinac or Chippewa of their Representative; nor do I wish the mining country or the fisheries to be unrepresented.

Gentlemen talk about the tax they pay. Is that the rule? No sir; you cannot apply it as a principle, and do justice. You must act according to circumstances; you cannot make taxation the rule of representation, for it would be unjust to the infant settlements. We have treated the principle as inapplicable as regarded the new counties. Gentlemen talk as if 20,000 square miles was a mere bagatelle—a mere nothing. There is a vast interest growing up in that quarter, and I am disposed to cherish it; for, by so doing, we shall benefit the whole State. I think the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne illiberal and unjust.

A division of the question being called for, section three was stricken out.

The substitute was then adopted.

Sec. 4. The Legislature shall provide by law for adequate compensation for the district attorney, and for detention and delays of such Senator and Representatives in the performance of their duties.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I move to strike the section out, because it provides for payment for detention and delays, which by law are not entitled to be paid for.

Mr. GALE—I have another reason. They want to keep all the specific tax. We shall have to pay for their judge and prosecuting attorney; now, they want extra pay for their representatives and senators; we are paying dearly, if it is a rich country. From such riches the Lord deliver me; for they are all in the earth and have to be dug out. We have called for information, and we have re-called, and in vain; while to hear the member from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] you would think it comprised all God's creation; that they had all the wealth and commerce in the world. It is very easy to make general assertions; it might be more difficult to prove them.

Mr. HANSCOM—How long is it since California was discovered?

Mr. GALE—A long time after the upper country was settled. Can we suppose that population will flow there as it does to California? A great portion of the lower peninsula is unrepresented; yet we have no call for a representative there. If we are to represent copper mines buried in the earth, let us fairly say so; but to have representation upon that foundation, and to then pretend that they represent human beings, I consider a perfect outrage.

Mr. J. BARTOW—We have already given a larger representation to the lower peninsula than to the upper.

Mr. GALE—I want the general assertions reduced to data.

Mr. J. BARTOW—What will you do with the persons appointed to represent the upper country? They must come in the fall, and remain here until February; and according to the legislative article, receive ten cents per mile for their traveling fees. If you refuse to do any thing more, you, in effect, disfranchise the whole country. You might as well refuse to give them a representation, as refuse to give them the means by which it can be rendered available. Can a man trust himself so far away from home for $120, or $180, with traveling fees? Not a man would do so in the lower peninsula. If it is the intention to disfranchise them, let us say so; if it is not, let us at least treat them fairly. Do not make a promise to the ear and break it to the heart, as it is neither charity nor liberality. It is not right.

In Congress they pay eight dollars for every twenty miles. In the case of the delegate from Oregon, it was thought it would be an unjust sum, so they fixed it at $2000. They departed from a fixed rule, because they thought it would be exorbitant. We wish, in a similar manner, that the matter should be left to the Legislature to do what is proper and right, as a compensation for the necessary delays that must take place; as without some such allowance we might as well strike it out of the article altogether.

Mr. CHURCH—The other counties in the State have been obliged to pay for their own prosecuting attorney; and probably the settled principle should be that each county shall pay their own prosecuting officer. If this is stricken out, my friend from Genesee certainly presents a strong case, as I think otherwise they will not be elected. Whatever number of Representatives we may finally decide upon to represent the upper country, propriety would suggest that we should make an exception with regard to their compensation.

It has been said that the inhabitants of the upper peninsula are inhabitants of the lower peninsula, and that the representatives will not live there. That will not be true. As population increases, the representative will be selected from the actual residents of the country; so this objection is of no force. Men are called here to attend to their duties, and they cannot get back until the first of May. That they should only receive the allowance paid to the other members, is to me preposterous and unjust. It will amount to an actual exclusion of the representatives of the upper country.

Mr. WHIPPLE—A representative from Mackinac or Chippewa has to travel 400 miles, and at the allowance of ten cents per mile, he will receive forty dollars for coming, and forty for returning. He must come in the fall and return in May. The time for coming and returning will make him absent from home about 180 days. The representative of the upper country may receive ten cents more for coming, and ten more for returning, so that he would receive for 180 day's absence, $200. And I would ask this Convention if they think that is a reasonable compensation, or if it will not disfranchise the whole upper country? I recollect, at the first session of the Legislature, the members for Mackinac and Chippewa came down, and the Legislature allowed them a reasonable compensation. We must look at the condition of things. The Legislature sits in February, and ten days in March. They must remain here the half of March and the whole of April before they can return; and I think it just that a fair allowance should be made, or the matter left to the Legislature.

Mr. CHURCH—I move to amend by striking out the word "shall," in line one, and insert "may." Also, strike out the words "for the district attorney, and," in the same line.

Mr. BRITAIN—That is as far as I wish to go. I recollect the case of a young gentleman who contested a seat from Mackinac or Chippewa. After it was decided against him, he started home in the winter. There is no reason that the Legislature should make a large allowance. If he chooses to earn his money, he can go; if he does not, he can remain here. But he can go home, and lose no time at all; it makes no difference at what season of the year.

Mr. CORNELL—An old man would not answer; he could not return; he must travel on snow shoes.

Mr. BRITAIN—I should esteem it no hardship. Any man who is fit to represent that country, can go home; he might ride a poney.

Mr. J. BARTOW—The gentleman from Berrien talks of getting to Mackinac with a poney. Why, he would have to take canoes. The gentleman from Berrien is a young man; when he is decrepid with the advance of years, he will think differently. Now he is in his prime, and thinks he could go in the winter.

Mr. BRITAIN—I think that a person can ride all the way; if he cannot, he can come out in a dog train.

Mr. ROBERTS—There are five hundred and fifty miles, and no trail at all for seven months in the year. If the gentleman from Berrien will go there, we will send him as a Representative, give him all he can make, and guarantee him $1,000 besides.

Mr. MOORE—If the members can get there, what can they do when they are there? While, if they are here, they can earn something. There, according to the statements, they cannot; for if it is impossible to get there, no business can be done.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I hope the section will be stricken out. I understand that one of the representatives lives in Detroit; so it cannot make any difference to him. The U. S. mail travels the year round, and a man can travel as well as the U. S. mail. The immense wealth that we have heard about, will, undoubtedly, open a back way very soon. I begin, almost, to believe it. I think I shall emigrate there. I think, as they are so wealthy, that we should not give them any extra pay. I think that three dollars during the session is sufficient.

Mr. ROBERTS—My honorable and intelligent friend from Calhoun unquestionably alluded to me, when he made the remarks about the Representative from the upper country living in Detroit. He has cast this aspersion twice or three times before; he did so in the Legislature. His extreme intelligence doubtless furnishes him with all the information respecting the upper country. I shall excuse him with the exception that I want to give a different impression than might be entertained respecting the representative from Chipewa living in Detroit. Did I not mention, as a fact, that the gentleman who now and has represented that section, has never, since he has been a representative there, resided for three months in the city of Detroit?

Mr. McCLELLAND—I think we ought to be reasonable. The delegate from Calhoun said that in the course of time there would be a communication with Mackinac, both winter and summer. I apprehend that until that is effected, an allowance will be absolutely necessary. The delegate from Berrien [Mr. WHIPPLE] said that the representative from the upper country would have to be absent from home 180 days, for a compensation of $200. I ask the gentleman from Calhoun if that is reasonable? Would it not be better to leave it to the Legislature?

Mr. N. PIERCE—I think it is wrong. I would not ask the Legislature.]

Mr. McCLELLAND—That may be the case; he is able to live without any compensation. With all due deference to his opinion, I doubt whether he would represent them more than once, if he came down during the winter and remained here until May, for the small compensation that would be given. He might once—he probably would not again.

The amendment offered by Mr. CHURCH was agreed to.

The motion to strike out section four did not prevail.

Sections five, six, seven, eight and nine, were read.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to strike them all out. The matter ought to be left to the Legislature.

Mr. ROBERTS—We are making an entire article for the upper country, and therefore we should insert all the provisions that are necessary. I hope that they may not be stricken out. With regard to the returning of the moneys collected from the mining companies, it is an act that we deem just and necessary.

Mr. N. PIERCE withdrew his motion.

On motion of Mr. LEACH, the committee rose, reported the article back with the amendments, asked the concurrence of the Convention therein, and to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. ROBERTS moved that the consideration of the article, with amendments, as reported by the committee of the whole, be postponed until Monday next, and be made the special order of that day.

Upon which the yeas and nays were had; and the motion was lost; yeas 32, nays 34.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the article was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the committee of the whole was discharged from the consideration of the article entitled "Of Salaries," and the same was taken up for consideration by the Convention.

"Sec. 1. The Governor shall receive an annual salary of one thousand dollars; the Judges of the Circuit Court shall each receive an annual salary of fifteen hundred dollars; the State Treasurer shall receive an annual salary of one thousand dollars; the Auditor General shall receive an annual salary of one thousand dollars; the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall receive an annual salary of one thousand dollars; the Secretary of State shall receive an annual salary of eight hundred dollars; the Commissioner of the State Land Office shall receive an annual salary of eight hundred dollars; the Attorney General shall receive an annual salary of eight hundred dollars."

Mr. FRALICK—I move to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$800" as the salary of the State Treasurer.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I would like to know the reasons.

Mr. FRALICK—I think it is too much; nor do I see the propriety of the State Treasurer receiving more than the Secretary of State. I think that is a sufficient reason.

Mr. MORRISON—I will state the reasons that induced the committee to report the salary of the State Treasurer $200 more than that of the Secretary of State. The responsibility is much greater; he has to give bonds to a large amount for the faithful performance of his duty; and for that reason, the committee thought it best to give him an increase of salary. It is not, however, greater than a good competent book-keeper can obtain in any of our cities.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to amend by inserting "$250."

Mr. FRALICK—I understand that the State Treasurer has one cent for each bank bill that he signs; the money goes into his pocket, not into the treasury; while the bonds are merely a contingency, if the State Treasurer runs away or uses the State money.

Upon the proposition of Mr. FRALICK, the yeas and nays were had, and the same was lost—yeas 32, nays 33.

Mr. HASCALL moved to amend so much of the article as relates to the judges of the Supreme Court, by striking out "fifteen hundred," and inserting "twelve hundred."

Mr. J. BARTOW—I hope the gentleman will furnish us with reasons. I don't think it is exactly the thing to get up and make a motion either on the score of economy or extravagance, without the mover showing what purpose it has to serve. If we want good men we must expect to pay them liberally. If the committee have not fallen upon the right sum, let us amend it; but probably the gentleman wants to make a little capital for himself.

Mr. HASCALL said—The committee have reported $1,000 as the salary of the Auditor General, and his duties are more severe. Farmers and laborers are getting one dollar per day, and think they get well paid; while, by my amendment, judges get three dollars per day, and they are not employed all the year; at least, not necessarily so. We have been called upon to reduce the salaries of the officers of the State, and I do not see the propriety of making the salary of a circuit judge greater than that of the governor of the State.

Mr. MORRISON—The committee, in considering the salaries, were disposed to consider the reason of the thing. I do not believe that we can draw talent and ability upon the bench, with a less salary than the one reported. I did not think that a motion would be made to put it lower, as the judges have received that amount for the last fifteen years. The traveling and other extra expenses, must, at the very least, amount to $500, and a man cannot support his family as cheaply as if he was all the time at home. I hope it will not be reduced.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to insert "sixteen hundred."

A division of the question was had on striking out the amount contained in the article, and the motion to strike out was lost—yeas 17, nays 48.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend by adding to the article, "and no fees whatever for the performance of any duties connected with their office."

Mr. C. said—A remark was made respecting certain fees that were received by a State officer. The sum might be large or of small account; but it is something of which the public knows nothing. While we are giving him a salary of $1,000, he may actually receive $1,400 or $1,500.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—They are entitled to certain fees.

Mr. CHURCH—Not if they draw them without any warrant by law; if they receive them, they should be entitled to them by law.

Mr. J. BARTOW—The Legislature may impose other duties not at present contemplated; and if, for the performance of those duties, they receive certain fees, I can see no impropriety in their so receiving them. The State Treasurer is said to receive certain fees for signing bank bills. It is an extra duty performed by him, and if he performs it he should receive pay for it, as there is no good reason why these fees should go into the treasury. The State does not countersign the bills for the sake of the fees, but to accord security to the bill holder. Is there any thing in this unjust or improper? If the pay is large or small, he works for it; and the Legislature can always regulate the amount of fees for these services. He must do the work no other man can do, and it can never be excessive, for the Legislature will always have control over the matter.

Mr. EATON—The gentleman supposes that the Legislature is going to ask them to do duties which they cannot perform. If they get so much per year, and do this within the year, they ought to have a yearly salary, and no more. They labor, or are supposed to do so, their whole time. If the Legislature want them to sign bills, it is within the time, and they should have no extra pay for signing the bills, or for any other work performed.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I am surprised to hear such an argument advanced. If we go on the factory system, and compel State officers to work twelve hours per day, let us say so; if we do not, then I think this fee is just. The State, for the security of the people, demands additional labor, and the pay should properly go into the pockets of the men who perform the work. We do not want to hire a man for one dollar, and make him earn $1.25 per day, and put the balance into the treasury. He performs his regular duties; but this is an extra duty. He has to work extra hours, and I think he is fully entitled to the compensation, and that it would be ridiculous to put it into the State treasury.

Mr. FRALICK said that all we had done by way of restricting the salary, would be of no use, unless we adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Kent. The Legislature might give the Auditor General $2,500 by means of fees. The amendment ought to be adopted, and if the Legislature appointed extra work, they might authorize the appointment of a clerk or deputy. He thought the restrictions ought to be placed in the constitution itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I move to insert after "fees," the words "or perquisites;" for it does not take any extra time. He has clerks. The fact is, the clerks do the duties of the office, and he has generally three-fourths of his time to himself. One State officer was absent several months last year, and the duty of the office was as well performed as they ever were. Few of the State officers are here their whole time. I hope the amendment will prevail.

The amendment as amended was then adopted.

Mr. EATON moved to adjourn, but the motion was lost.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I propose, sir, to strike out the entire article. These salaries must be considered by all as just and reasonable; but times change; circumstances change; and it may be necessary, from various causes, to increase the salaries of some, and reduce those of others; for it is evident that the duties of some may be materially increased for a series of years, while the duties of others may be diminished; and the Legislature can regulate all these things to the circumstances of the case, at the time it is acted upon. I believe it to be injudicious, and that every man's good sense will teach him the impropriety of arranging the salaries so that they cannot be changed.

Mr. MORRISON—I do not believe with the gentleman from Monroe, that the matter should be left with the Legislature. The salaries should be permanently fixed, or it will cause trouble in the Legislature. The people expect us to fix the salaries of the State officers.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I think I can show in a few words that there may be a great deal of truth in the argument of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND.] It has been proposed seriously, and moved three or four times, that the taxes shall be collected in the towns and counties. If that should be carried into effect, I would ask gentlemen what would be the duties of the Auditor General. There would not be a duty but might be performed by a clerk; while, if we get a grant of land, there would be an increased duty.

Mr. CHAPEL—I cannot agree with my colleague. I believe that it is the duty of this Convention to fix the salaries of these men, and thereby take this bone of contention out of the hands of the Legislature. What is the difference between appointing a clerk and electing an officer by the people, as regards the pay. A responsible clerk cannot be had at a less salary than six or seven hundred dollars per year, and the true policy is to elect persons, who will be responsible, to all these offices. We ought to fix the salary; and as to the perquisites, let them go into the treasury, and not let him earn another $1,000 by signing bank bills. If the services are too arduous, let him have a clerk. But the gentleman from Monroe proposes to strike this article out of existence; the salaries of the judges, as well as the others. What will follow? You will have the eight judges and the whole of the State officers be-seizing the Legislature, wanting large salaries. I have seen this sort of thing as long as I want to see it. We ought to fix the salaries, and pay the judges good, round salaries; pay them well. A man of talent, a good lawyer, one who will give good decisions, should have more than $1,200. If we reduce the salaries of the judges to $1,000, with the expense which they must unavoidably incur for holding the circuits, what kind of judges shall we have on the bench?

Mr. CHURCH—The delegate from Monroe fixed, in his legislative article, the pay of members of the Legislature at $3 per day for the next fifteen years. It may be worth $5, or it may be worth $2, as the condition of things may change; but now he wants these salaries left to the Legislature.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I see no analogy between the two cases. I think the argument of the gentleman from Macomb unanswerable. The Auditor General has at present a great deal to do; in five years' time he may have nothing to do; and I do not want the Legislature to be deprived of the power of reducing the salaries. As far as my own legislative conduct is concerned, gentlemen will perceive, by reference, that I have invariably been in favor of a reduction of salaries.

Mr. MOORE—The gentleman from Monroe reported a committee on salaries. He says they are just and proper; but now wishes to strike the article out of existence.

Mr. McCLELLAND—So there was a committee on the punishment of crimes; but I voted against the report. If I were supposed to be obliged to favor all that the committees choose to report, I should never have taken so responsible a situation.

Mr. DANFORTH moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following substitute for the article:

"Executive, judicial and State officers shall receive such compensation as shall be prescribed by law; but such compensation shall neither be increased nor diminished during their continuance in office."

Mr. ALVORD moved the previous question on the article. A quorum not voting thereon,

Mr. MOORE moved a call of the Convention.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Upon the question for a call of the Convention, the yeas and nays were had, and the same was lost—yeas 17, nays 44.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

The question being upon seconding the previous question, the same was demanded, and the main question was ordered to be now put, by yeas 39, nays 18.

The question being upon striking out the entire article entitled "Of Salaries," the yeas and nays were ordered, and the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Arzeno, J. Bartow, Britain, Burns, Choate, Hart, Lovell, McClelland, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, White, President—14.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Alvord, Barnard, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Green, Gibson, Hanscom, Harvey, Hascall, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, Soule, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Webster, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman—47.

So the article was not stricken out.

Mr. BARNARD moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

The article was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the article entitled "Miscellaneous Provisions" was passed; which motion he moved to lay upon the table. The Convention refusing to lay the motion on the table,

Mr. BRITAIN withdrew it.

Mr. WALKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the article entitled "Salaries" was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved the previous question.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to adjourn; and the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, (54th day) August 12.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. LEACH: of Norman Little and 71 others of Saginaw county, praying for the insertion of an article in the constitution making it the duty of the Legislature to obtain, if possible, a cession of all unsold lands in this State, &c., &c.

Laid upon the table.

REPORTS.

Mr. HART, from the committee on schedule, reported

Which was read a first and second time by its title, laid upon the table and ordered printed.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. GALE offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on printing be requested to cause the report of the committee on supplies and expenditures to be printed and laid upon the table of the members of the Convention on Thursday morning next.

Mr. G. said, at the time the report of the committee on supplies was made, he had moved that it go on the journal. It was considered a novel matter by some, but the Convention so ordered. But the morning following, a part only of the report appeared; the main part was suppressed. Again, on that day he had received but one copy of the journal, which seemed extraordinary.

Now, I wish (said Mr. G.) to see the whole of the report in print. All the information I can obtain from the chairman of the committee is that the stationery is cheaper than it was ever furnished before; but, from the course pursued, I am led to suspect "something rotten in Denmark." I want to get at the facts.

Mr. HANSCOM—I hope the gentleman from Genesee will be gratified. He intimates that there is something wrong, and I wish him to be enlightened. The report was printed in the journal, as ordered by the Convention, and the bills for the stationery will be printed with the documents, with references. The articles were purchased of merchants in Detroit, who are of the highest respectability. Although they do not belong to my political party, I should be sorry to have it said that they had cheated the Convention.

Mr. GALE said he did not care whether the stationery was bought of whigs or democrats. If there was any iniquity in connection with the transaction, he wanted to ascertain it. The bills were an integral part of the report, and he wanted to see the whole of the report.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend by adding, "and that one thousand copies be ordered to be printed for the use of the delegate from Genesee," [Mr. GALE.]

Mr. GALE said, though he happened to be in the minority on that floor, yet he had rights there, and would not be ridden down. The gentleman from Macomb [Mr. ROBERTSON] knew that he [Mr. GALE] did not want a thousand copies, but he wanted the report printed as ordered by the Convention, and any attempt to throw ridicule upon his efforts to obtain it would be abortive. If all was right, what in the name of common sense were they afraid of? The report, as made by the chairman of the committee, had not been printed, as ordered by the Convention; a part, and the main part, had been suppressed.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said he saw no object in printing the bills. The report of the chairman of the committee was before the Convention, and we are [said Mr. VAN V.] referred to the Secretary of the Convention; that the bills are in his hands. Could not the gentleman from Genesee examine them? Why go to the expense of having them printed? The gentleman could examine the bills, and if he discovered anything wrong, he could report to the Convention. He hoped the motion would not prevail.

Mr. ALVORD moved to indefinitely postpone; but withdrew his motion.

Mr. GREEN said, this had been called an unusual proceeding. It did appear to him that there was something unusual about it. He did not know that there was any intention of doing wrong. The gentleman [Mr. GALE] called for the particulars; but a general report had been printed, and not the particulars; it goes on stating that the supplies were less than usual. The gentleman from Oakland [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH] says we have the privilege of going to the secretary and examining the bills, but it would be inconvenient for one hundred members to do so. There were delegates who wished to see the items of the bills; and he [Mr. G.] did not think it satisfactory, after they had been ordered to be printed in the journal, to be told that they might apply to the Secretary if they wished for such information.

Mr. HANSCOM said he was anxious that the whole matter should be printed. It had occupied more of the time of the Convention than the whole of the stationery was worth.

Mr. COMSTOCK hoped, in justice to the chairman of the committee, [Mr. HANSCOM,] the gentleman who offered the resolution, [Mr. GALE,] and the people, that the printing would not be postponed.

Mr. EATON said he was a member of the committee, and was desirous that the report should be printed and go to the world, to clear the committee from the charges of having practiced some fraud.

Mr. HANSCOM thought it due to those merchants who furnished the supplies that it be printed.

Mr. ALVORD said he had made the motion to indefinitely postpone, in good faith, as he had supposed the bills would be printed with the other documents, as an appendage to the journal; but as the gentleman from Genesee [Mr. GALE] had fancied that he had discovered a mare's nest, he [Mr. A.] was willing to have them printed in the daily journal. He did not think the gentleman from Genesee would discover anything very outrageous. Perhaps the gentleman judged there was something wrong, from what he supposed would have been his own action.

Mr. GALE said, had he been on the committee, he would not have acted so; he would have acted honorably, and laid the whole of the proceedings of the committee before the Convention.

Mr. CHAPEL said, on the return of the chairman from Detroit, the committee was called together, and the bills of the merchants were examined, item by item. To expedite the printing of other matter, we have got to dispense with the printing of the journal. Why go to this expense, when the gentleman can see the bills, and examine them, item by item?

Perhaps the gentleman [Mr. GALE] wants to make a little capital, which he has need of in Genesee. Perhaps he wishes to cover up his vote on the suffrage question. Believing that the Convention were in possession of all the information, and knowing that the printers had as much work as they could do, he would vote against the motion.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the resolution, by adding the words "and such printing shall appear in the journal of the last day's proceedings of the Convention."

But the amendment did not prevail.

Mr. GALE modified his resolution so that the matter required to be printed should appear in the printed journal of today's proceedings; and, as modified, the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. GREEN,

Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to report to the Convention the amount of stationery on hand, specifying the different items, and the cost of each, as per bill.

The article entitled "Salaries" coming up for consideration,

Mr. WALKER asked if the question was not on the reconsideration of the vote by which the article was ordered to a third reading. That the Convention might understand his object in moving to reconsider, he proposed to offer a substitute, which he read.

The CHAIR said the first question was whether the Convention would sustain the previous question.

The previous question was sustained, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was taken on the passage of the article, and the same was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, Beardsley, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Comstock, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hascall, Kinne, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, Soule, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman—40.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Britain, Burns,

The CHAIR said the article was passed, and would be referred to the committee on phraseology.

Mr. WALKER—The question was on reconsideration. I suppose that my substitute is now in order.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I voted on the passage of the article.

Mr. WALKER—I asked if the question was not on reconsideration? I voted for reconsideration.

The CHAIR—I put the question on its passage.

Mr. WALKER—Then I want to change my vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS—There has been an error, and the chair is bound to correct it.

Mr. BARNARD moved a reconsideration of the last vote, which prevailed by yeas 51, nays 11.

Mr. WALKER inquired what had become of the motion to reconsider?

The chair stated that it had been cut off by the previous question.

The question was again taken on the passage of the article, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Beardsley, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Chandler, Choate, Church, Conner, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eaton, Fralick, Gibson, Hanscom, Hascall, Kinne, Marvin, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, J. D. Pierce, Soule, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Whittemore, Williams, Woodman—33.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Britain, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chapel, Cornell, Crouse, Daniels, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hart, Harvey, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, McLeod, O'Brien, Orr, N. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, White, President—39.

So the Convention refused to pass the article.

Mr. WALKER moved that the same be recommitted to the committee on "Salaries."

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to add "with instructions to fix the salaries as follows:

"Governor, $1,000, Judges, $1,200, Treasurer, $1,000, Auditor General, $800, Commissioner of State Land Office, $1,000, Secretary of State, $800, Attorney General, $500, Superintendent of Public Instruction, $800. They shall receive no more than is provided for in this constitution."

Mr. WALKER offered the following substitute for the instructions proposed:

"The Governor shall receive a salary of one thousand dollars per annum. The Auditor General, State Treasurer, Secretary of State, Commissioner of the Land Office, and Superintendent of Public Instruction, each such salary as shall be prescribed by law, not exceeding one thousand dollars each per annum. The Attorney General shall receive a salary, to be prescribed by law, not exceeding eight hundred dollars per annum. The circuit judges shall each receive an annual salary of not less than fifteen hundred dollars each, per annum, to be prescribed by law. The judge of the district court for the upper peninsula shall receive such annual salary, not exceeding one thousand dollars, as shall be prescribed by law. And no fees or perquisites of office shall be received by any such officer in addition to the salaries above named."

Mr. WILLIAMS—I am opposed to the introduction of such milk-and-water propositions in the constitution. The Convention meant something or nothing by the appointment of the committee on salaries. They meant that the salaries should be fixed definitely, or their action was meaningless. I am opposed to the proposition, because it will cost more than the salaries to legislate on them every year. And every man in every town and county who wishes to do a little fancy business as a demagogue, either in the famous Macomb school house, or anywhere else, will profess his anxiety to bring down salaries of public officers. I do not want to allow them this opportunity. The voters at the polls have more weighty matters to attend to at elections. I believe it would be better to increase the salaries three hundred dollars, constitutionally, than leave this subject open for petty agitation—a fruitful source of expense and mischief, both with the people and the Legislature.

I was (said Mr. W.) on the committee which reported the article, and though perhaps some of the salaries are a little too high, I would rather err on the side of liberality, than leave the matter open. The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE] wishes to bring the judges' salaries down, and would raise the salary of the Governor two hundred dollars. A judge does more drudgery in one year than a Governor in four years. The judges are subject to more expense in traveling, and require more industry, intellect, and information. They are men on whose learning and integrity repose the rights of the community. We are traitors to the public if we do not secure the best men in the State for the judicial bench. The Auditor has the hardest work in the government offices; his salary should not be reduced relatively to others. I believe there are two nearly sinecure offices. Some of us on the committee wished to combine them, but we were overruled. We have compelled the incumbents to keep offices here, and we must support them. If a man wishes to vegetate here, even on a salary of one thousand dollars a year, I think he has the hardest bargain. They will not have the business of ordinary trades; but if you require them to wait here and keep their families here, and break up their business elsewhere, pay them. Make them really do what you enjoin—really keep offices here, and pay them.

With regard to the fees and perquisites of office, I hope the gentleman will alter his amendment, so that they shall receive no fees or perquisites. To say they shall receive nothing more than their salary means nothing. A public officer should not be allowed to gouge men who have business with him, and under the pretence of extra official duties, swell his salary.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I am not a high salary man. I do not think I was sent here to increase salaries. I shall not go to increase salaries or multiply offices. It is proper to decrease the salaries and stop the holes in the constitution. The Governor's salary has been reduced from $2,000 to $1,500, and it may be to $1,000. The judges should be reduced to $1,200. Money never made a great man. A man who cannot live on $1,200 a year, should resign. Gentlemen may state what the lawyers make in their profession, but I do not believe they make a thousand dollars a year; at least I know many that do not. I believe there should be a reduction in expenses all the way down. We have reduced the expenses of the Legislature, if we do not undo it before we adjourn. The gentleman from St. Joseph [Mr. WILLIAMS] says he is in favor of amalgamation; but as they will not amalgamate, he says give them enough to make them respectable. I do not wish to give more than it is worth.

Mr. WILLIAMS—The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE] says that I wish to give a thousand dollars salary, to make officers respectable. I did not say so. I do not know who will be officers of government. They may be men whom no sum can make respectable.

Mr. CHAPEL moved to strike out the words "not less," and insert "not more."

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the substitute would not be adopted. The article was probably the best that could be got on the subject, and by opening the question again the Convention might get into trouble. In regard to the judges of our courts, a reduction in their salaries could not be advantageously applied. It was a matter of fact that there were in the city of Detroit many of the profession who would not take seats on the bench, because the salaries were far less than they could make at the bar. By fixing a liberal salary, the best talent could be secured. Reduce the salaries, and you drive from the bench men of the best talent.

Where I reside (said Mr. H.) there are two members of the bar who have refused to give up their practice to go on the bench. One of them would not take a seat on our Supreme bench, because he can make more by his profession. You elect for six years; if he gives up his practice for the office, and afterwards returns to the bar, his business is gone, and it may take him years to regain it. It is difficult to get on the bench the best talent in the State; but real economy requires us to get the best talent.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH did not believe the committee were extravagant in fixing the salaries. If the best talents were required, it would be necessary that the judges should receive a liberal salary. Gentlemen at the bar have to prepare themselves by study eight or ten years; and any professional man in good practice would hardly relinquish it for the salary proposed. With regard to the Auditor's office, the duties are more arduous than any other. If any officer is entitled to an increase of salary, it is the Auditor. It was proposed to merge the two offices of Treasurer and Commissioner of the Land Office. The duties combined would not be equal to those of the Auditor; yet it is proposed to give each of those officers $1,000. It is as low as the various offices can be filled with competent men. The salaries are fixed, and cannot be increased by the Legislature.

Mr. BRITAIN thought the salaries of the judges were too high. He knew of no reason why we should pay two or three hundred dollars a year more than they do in Indiana and Ohio. He wished the question to be taken on each separately.

Mr. BUSH said the proceedings were out of order. The question had been taken on the passage of the article, and lost. It could not be reached except by reconsideration of the last vote; which Mr. B. moved to reconsider.

Which motion prevailed.

The question again recurring on its passage,

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to recommit the article with instructions, as heretofore proposed by him.

Mr. DANFORTH proposed to substitute the following for the instructions: To add to the article, "and it shall not be competent for the Legislature to increase the salaries herein provided."

And the substitute was adopted.

The article was then recommitted with the instructions proposed.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, from the committee on salaries, reported back the article amended agreeably to instructions; and the article as amended was passed and referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, the resolution offered by Mr. STOREY on the 5th instant, was taken from the table and indefinitely postponed.

On motion of Mr. FRALICK, the article entitled "Of Upper Peninsula of Michigan," was taken from the table.

The question being upon concurring in the amendments made in committee of the whole, those to section 1 were severally concurred in.

The substitute for section 3, proposed by the committee, being under consideration,

Mr. CORNELL offered the following substitute:

"The counties of Mackinac and Chippewa, and the territory thereto attached, shall be entitled to one Representative; the counties of Marquette and Schoolcraft, and the territory thereto attached, one Representative; the county of Houghton and the territory thereto attached, one Representative; the county of Ontonagon and the territory thereto attached, one Representative."

Which motion was lost.

Mr. MORRISON offered the following substitute for the same:

"The county of Mackinac, with the territory which may be thereto attached, shall be entitled to one Representative to the State Legislature; the county of Chippewa, and the territory which may be thereto attached, one Representative; the counties of Houghton and Ontonagon, and the territory which may be thereto attached, one Representative; the counties of Delta, Schoolcraft and Marquette, and the territory which may be thereto attached, one Representative."

Which was not agreed to; yeas 33, nays 38.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following substitute for the one proposed by the committee:

"Until after the census of 1855, there shall be elected in the territory defined in the first section of this article, four members of the House of Representatives; and the Legislature shall, at its next session, divide said territory into four representative districts."

Mr. H. said there was obvious impropriety in districting that portion of the State by the Convention. The census would be taken and known before the next meeting of the Legislature. The next Legislature would not only know the amount of population, but could also ascertain the wishes and feelings of the people. It must be recollected that the difficulty of traveling is ten-fold greater in the upper peninsula than in the lower peninsula. It would be most proper to fix the number of Reprerepresentatives and leave it to the next Legislature to make the districts. Are four Representatives a larger number than that portion of the State is entitled to? Gentlemen have said we should adopt the same rule to one part of the State as the other. As far as we can, we should; but has Congress carried out this plan? In the North-western Territory it did not. Special provisions were made, adapted to their peculiar circumstances and wants. Shall we not do so? Sir, the same rule has been applied to six counties in our peninsula, to which have been given a greater representation, compared with their population, than any other counties, on the principle that they have interests that ought to be represented.

Gentlemen have told us that hundreds of thousands will soon be settled in the upper peninsula, and that the wealth would be unbounded; yet, when we ask one twenty-fifth of the representation, they say it is going to do the State injustice. How do their arguments harmonize? The interests of the upper peninsula are conceded to be very important, and of such a character that we can know nothing about them unless we receive information from their Representatives. Assuming the increase of population to be as great for the next four years as it has been during the four years past, they will be entitled to ten Representatives; but it will be seven years before they can get the representation according to the population. Justice demands this liberality at our hands; greater liberality was manifested in the old Convention. We ask that this, at least, should be done to them.

Mr. FRALICK was of opinion that to allow them three members was acting with great liberality, especially when they were allowed a Senator. From no calculation that he had made, could he ascertain that the population amounted to more than six thousand. A great portion of the population return to the lower peninsula in the fall. They are voters here, and, consequently, should not be voters there.

The substitute offered by Mr. HANSCOM was negatived—yeas 32, nays 36.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend by inserting before "three," the words "at least;" which was not agreed to.

The substitute proposed by the committee was then concurred in.

Mr. McLEOD hoped the amendment to section 4 would not be concurred in. It must have been under some misunderstanding that it was made in committee. The Legislature must provide for the payment of the district attorney, or no provision could be made. There are a dozen counties in the district, having separate interests. The boards of supervisors can only meet once a year. They have no treasurers or county officers; and each county will want to pay as small a portion of this salary as possible. The Legislature should fix the salary, and levy a tax on the whole district. It was not intended to be a State expense.

He [Mr. McL.] had presumed that this was intended for the benefit of the upper counties. If they were not allowed to judge of their own interests, when they asked nothing, they had better withdraw the article.

The amendment made in committee was not concurred in.

Mr. McLEOD moved to amend section 4 by inserting after "district attorney," the words "by tax on said district."

Mr. BRITAIN said he did not know of our constitutional right to impose an additional officer on those counties, and compel them to pay his salary. To impose a district attorney on them for six years, and compel them to pay, he did not believe to be right. He doubted whether the interests of the country would be subserved by the appointment of this officer.

Mr. WALKER said it seemed to him proper. When counties are organized, provision is made for the payment of the services of the prosecuting attorney in the county. But gentlemen would perceive that no provision could be made here, because no provision had been made for the boards of supervisors to meet at one place. There was evident propriety in fixing the compensation, and the mode and means of paying. The gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] says he is opposed to fixing on those counties an officer, and compelling them to pay him. Has he not done so in the case of a prosecuting attorney in each county? They have no common board of supervisors meeting at one place, hence the necessity of the compensation being established by the Legislature.

Mr. N. PIERCE was in favor of striking the district attorney out. If the counties were organized, why did they not elect the same officers as other counties? We are told of the great wealth of the district; why do they ask for special privileges? Why would not a prosecuting attorney answer as well in Mackinac and Marquette as in Oakland?

Mr. McLEOD said there were but two or three prosecuting attorneys in the upper peninsula. There was not sufficient business in one county to pay him. They say there is business sufficient in the whole district to pay him, and it is right they should club together to give him a sufficient salary to support him. It was difficult to make gentlemen understand the difference of circumstances between the upper and lower peninsula.

We have no roads (said Mr. McL.) for three hundred miles, but a bridle path, except those between the diggings, where they have cut roads to carry their copper. We have no interior communications—nothing but the water. In so old a county as Mackinac, we have not been able to get the bonds of our county officers approved, because our board of supervisors could not meet without ruinous results to their own interests. In some instances they have to come two or three hundred miles. There must be something to bring the entire county in jeopardy, to induce them to leave their business and come together.

The amendment prevailed.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend section four as amended, by striking out all after "district," in the foregoing amendment, and insert in lieu thereof, "the senators and representatives provided for in this notice, shall receive the sum of ——— dollars each, and no more, as compensation for detention and delays in the performance of their duties, in addition to the mileage and per diem allowance provided for in this constitution, to members of the Senate and House of Representatives."

Mr. R. thought it would be much better to fix a definite sum than to leave it to the Legislature. If so left, it might be an inducement to improper motives in the votes on different questions in the Legislature. Suppose on a very important question the votes of those three representatives would have the control; they might say, we will go for your bill if you will go for our in-increased compensation. I propose to keep these men free from such undue influences. The time of the session will be forty days, for which they will receive one hundred and twenty dollars. It seems the settled conviction of members of the Convention, that some further compensation should be paid. I would in addition give them sufficient to cover their expenses, rather than leave it indefinite and discretionary with the Legislature. It will save thousands of dollars.

Mr. N. PIERCE said it had been an open question every session of the Legislature. Sometimes they received $100 extra, sometimes $60, and sometimes nothing. They usually received on account of their daily pay and mileage, double the amount of members from the lower peninsula. The mileage would be reduced one-third; but it seemed to him there was no propriety in giving them extra pay, and he was in favor of striking out the section.

Mr. ROBERTS would make a proposition to the Convention, which he hoped would be satisfactory. It appeared the great trouble in relation to the upper country was with regard to the expense anticipated to accrue under the proposed arrangements, and was the cause of the opposition to the measures proposed. To relieve the lower peninsula, he would propose that the article be recommitted to the committee on the governmental and judicial policy of the upper peninsula, with instructions to so amend the same that the salaries of the district judge and district attorney, together with the expenses of a senator and their representatives, shall be paid out of the treasuries of the several counties; that the counties may be subject to taxation for county and township purposes the same as counties of the lower peninsula, and that all moneys paid into the State Treasury by mining companies, or as a tax for county and township purposes, shall be refunded to the treasuries of the several counties from which it may be received, deducting expenses of collection, if there be any.

Mr. BRITAIN said, while in a deliberative body, he had a duty to perform from which he should not be drawn aside. While legislating for that territory, he must consider that he was legislating for the whole State. The Convention had refused to give to the upper peninsula more than three representatives. In the lower peninsula, one representative will have as large a constituency as those three; the provision made, he thought, was quite liberal.

He [Mr. B.] could not sustain the proposition of the gentleman, [Mr. ROBERTS,] because it was unjust. It was stated that the people in the upper peninsula asked for a district attorney. That was the first intimation he had had of such a desire on their part. There seemed to him as much propriety in it, as in saying they shall make certain roads and pay the expense. When the people of the district ask for a district attorney, there might be propriety in acceding to their wishes; but he considered the proposition of the gentleman from Chippewa adverse to the interests of the counties.

Mr. N. PIERCE wanted to know whether they did not expect to have a prosecuting attorney in each county?

Mr. McLEOD—Unless the lower country will furnish us with lawyers, we neither have nor expect to have.

Mr. EDMUNDS hoped the proposition of the gentleman from Chippewa [Mr. ROBERTS] would not be adopted. He was prepared to treat the upper peninsula as other portions of the State. There was no necessity for making the distinction proposed. The members would come here not to merely act for that section, but for the whole State. He believed there was a liberal feeling towards the upper peninsula in the Convention; all that was wanted was to know fully the circumstances of the country. He believed the proposition ought not to be entertained.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to strike from the proposed instructions, so much as relates to per centage of mining companies, which was lost.

The motion to recommit did not prevail.

The question recurring on the amendment offered by Mr. ROBERTSON, relative to extra pay for members from the upper peninsula in the Legislature,

Mr. HANSCOM expressed his opinion that the matter ought to be left to the discretion of the Legislature.

Mr. CHURCH said—I hardly know how to get at the proposition; but I have made up my mind, as far as my vote goes, to close up this matter of extra compensation. I have come to the conclusion that it should not be left to the Legislature. It should either be struck out, and the representatives be left to get along in the best way they can, or the Convention should fix the compensation for the extra detention. I see inducements for log-rolling in respect to this extra pay, which should never be permitted by this body. There appears to be some reason for giving to those representatives some extra compensation, and I am satisfied it is perfectly in the power of this body to fix the amount definitely, that the log-rolling may be forever after prevented. I shall give my vote when I can steer my way through to carry out that view.

As to the district attorney, I believe each county in that peninsula cannot sustain its prosecuting attorney. The action is correct to give one district attorney to follow the judge in the exercise of his duties. In another section we provide that each county shall have one prosecuting attorney. If we pass this, there will be required some change in that. There will be a struggle in the several counties in regard to his pay, and some legislative action is necessary to provide for that. It does become necessary for the Legislature to step in and say the district attorney shall have a salary, and prescribe the mode in which he shall be paid.

As to a tax on the counties, I would leave it to the Legislature, as we have come to the conclusion at last, that after all, Legislatures may have some wisdom, though very little. It is necessary to say the Legislature shall provide by law for the compensation of the district attorney. If I vote for any extra compensation at all for the representatives and senator, I would fix the sum, and close up the matter of compensation forever.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I wish the substitute I offered, to be read, though it is not in order, as it meets the views of the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH;] and for the same reasons that operate on his mind, I offered it. I think we should leave no gap open. The committee on salaries contemplated no such officers as judge and district attorney for the upper peninsula. If the upper peninsula has a large per centage on specific taxes, the Legislature may provide for the payment of those officers from such resources; if not, they will cause the payments to be made out of the general fund. As to the duties, they will all be performed in the summer season. From statements made by gentlemen who are acquainted with the country, it appears to be almost impossible for the judge to go through that district in winter. And with regard to the district attorney it will be the same. I would fix (said Mr. W.) the compensation of all officers. I would fix the standard at some rate. If $1000 for judge, and $500 for district attorney are not right, make them so. With regard to the extra compensation for the representatives from the upper peninsula, I would not have it left to the discretion of the Legislature. We know that votes may be paid for in the Legislature, because we know they have been; and we know that three clever men having votes at disposal, may dictate the compensation they may be allowed, if left to the decision of the Legislature. I will show how it would operate under the present constitution, and also under the new one. Pay, under the present, for 60 days, at three dollars per day, $180; mileage, $240, will make $420. Add two dollars a day extra, $120, will give the most distant member the round sum of $540. The Mackinac member will get less; say for pay, mileage and extra compensation, $390. By 1855, there will be new modes of communication. There will be roads by Green Bay, and the Bay de Noquet, and I have no doubt the upper peninsula can then be reached at any season. In Canada they travel in winter; and men in New Hampshire do so. I never heard of a man receiving extra pay in Maine or New Hampshire, for attendance on the Legislature.

How will it be in 1855? The pay of the most distant member will be $120; mileage $160, say $280. Pay for the nearest member, and mileage, $280. It is enough; it is more than they can earn at home. No man will reject the office, and there will be candidates enough. If the allowance contemplated by my section is not just and equitable, let us fix it at something, so that the time of the Legislature may not be taken up, and the bonus may not be a corruption fund.

The amendment to section 4 offered by Mr. ROBERTSON was lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following substitute for section 4:

"The Legislature may provide for the payment of said district judge, not exceeding $1,000 per annum; and of said district attorney, not exceeding $500 per annum. In cases of delay and detention, it shall be competent for the Legislature to make extra compensation to the members of the Legislature from said described territory, not exceeding two dollars per day during the session of the Legislature."

On motion of Mr. MOORE, "500" was stricken out, and "700" inserted.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following substitute for section 6:

"One-half of all money received into the treasury from corporations in the upper peninsula paying a State tax of one per cent. per annum, shall be paid to the treasurers of the counties from which it is received, to be applied for township and county purposes, as provided by law."

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike out section 6.

Mr. ROBERTS moved a call of the Convention. The same being ordered, Messrs. AXFORD, BARNARD, BUSH, KINNE, LEACH, J. D. PIERCE, WARDEN and WHIPPLE were absent without leave.

Mr. BRITAIN asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. WHIPPLE; when,

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The PRESIDENT called the Convention to order,

And a quorum being present, resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning, being the article entitled "Of Upper Peninsula of Michigan."

The question being on Mr. BRITAIN's substitute for section six,

Mr. HANSCOM moved to amend the same by adding thereto, the words "but the Legislature shall have power, after the year 1855, to reduce the per centum to be refunded."

Mr. B. said there were a number of companies paying one per cent. specific tax to the State, which were exempt from paying anything for county or township purposes. The object of the proposed substitute was to enable the counties to derive support from these taxes. Other companies paid a specific tax of one-half of one per cent., and subject also to be taxed for county and township purposes. There was some justice in taking back one-half of the one per cent. paid into the treasury, which there would not be in the case of those companies which paid in only one-half of one per cent.

The amendment to the substitute was carried.

The question being on the substitute, as amended,

Mr. FRALICK was of opinion that sections six, seven, and eight, should be struck out. The specific taxes imposed upon those mining companies should be paid into the State treasury, intimating that they should be retained for the benefit of the upper country. He [Mr. F.] did not think the Convention was in possession of sufficient information to fix it exactly. After the census shall have been taken, and more information obtained in relation to the circumstances of the upper peninsula, the Legislature will be able to act more advisedly.

Mr. HANSCOM said it was purely nominal. By no calculation can the amount proposed to be returned be equal to the demand. After that time, the Legislature may say, instead of paying back five mills, there shall be paid back two or three mills. Anxious as I am (said Mr. H.) to see justice done to that part of the State; anxious as I am to protect them, I am unwilling to allow the Legislature the liberty of paying back this specific tax.

Mr. BRITAIN said, the Legislature, when imposing this specific tax, had exempted those companies from local taxation. He thought the Convention would see the propriety of paying back a part of this tax for the support of the local government.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I don't like this. I don't like paying back any thing. Some of those chartered companies pay one per cent, others one-half of one per cent. I should like better to say the Legislature shall equalize the specific tax on those companies. It seems to me it would be better to do something else than pay money back.

Mr. HANSCOM—There may be a great question, after chartering the companies and fixing a tax, whether it is not in the nature of a contract, and whether the Legislature can touch it. There seems some impracticability about it.

The question was first taken on striking out the section, (6,) and the same prevailed.

On inserting the proposition of Mr. BRITAIN, the yeas and nays were had, and the same prevailed—yeas 45, nays 18.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, sections 7 and 8 were stricken from the article.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend section 1 by striking out all after "elected," in the 8th line, and inserting "for a term of two years;" and the same prevailed.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the following was adopted in lieu of section 2:

"The territory described in the above section shall at all times be entitled to at least one Senator in the Senate of the State."

Mr. MOORE moved to strike out section 9, and asked the yeas and nays thereon.

Mr. ROBERTS—In the report of the committee, the gentleman [Mr. MOORE] will find that the companies are compelled to take up their land at $2 50 an acre, under their permits. If they take less than a quarter section, they must pay $5 00 an acre. It would seem to be a great hardship to the companies to separate them, and compel them to take up a single quarter section at five dollars an acre instead of a larger quantity at $2 50. He [Mr. R.] would observe that six hundred and forty acres, in connection with a mining company, would not last ten years for fuel.

There are two or three companies which have half a million invested, instead of $250,000, as most of them have. Most of them cannot expend more than $10,000 in the next two years to any profit, yet they will have to pay in fifty thousand.

Mr. MOORE—Is not the Legislature open to act on this subject?

Mr. ROBERTS—If the gentleman will reflect, the privilege is cut off from the Legislature.

Mr. MOORE—The Legislature will have the same power they have now.

Mr. ROBERTS—The constitution cuts off the action of the Legislature, except by general laws.

Mr. HANSCOM—It can do no harm. Any alteration would have to be submitted to the people of the State.

The motion was lost—yeas 23, nays 44.

Mr. CHAPEL offered the following as a new section to the article:

“The Legislature may change the location of the State Prison from Jackson to the upper peninsula of Michigan.”

Mr. C. said there had been complaint of the labor of the convicts coming in competition with the labor of the mechanics of the State. The prison was at present a sinking fund. It cost the State some five or six thousand dollars a year. By locating it in the upper peninsula, it might be made to pay into the treasury a large amount of money. In addition to this there seemed a great deal of difficulty growing up between the citizens of Jackson.

This provision would leave the matter in the hands of the Legislature. They may take it from where it is a bill of expense, and a source of dissatisfaction to the people of Jackson, and locate it where it may be productive of income to the State.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I am in favor of the proposition. I believe it will be our interest some day to remove it there. Under a charter a company will be able to take the labor of the prisoners to the benefit of the State.

Mr. BUSH—I am in favor of the proposition. Though not necessary to remove it at present, it will be calling the attention of the Legislature and the public to the subject. Although the labor of the prisoners is now attended with evil, it is running the State into debt every year.

The State owns one of the finest sections in the mining district, upon which the labor of the prisoners may, under proper arrangements, be made profitable. He [Mr. B.] hoped the motion would be carried, and the attention of the public and the Legislature called to the subject.

The proposition of Mr. CHAPEL was adopted.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend section nine by adding thereto:

“But no such corporation shall be permitted to purchase any real estate except such as shall be necessary for the exercise of the corporate franchises of such company.”

And the same was agreed to.

The question then being on ordering the article to a third reading, it was so ordered by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Church, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eaton, Edmunds, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Whittemore, Woodman, President—48.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Anderson, Barnard, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Choate, Comstock, Daniels, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Hart, Harvey, Lovell, Moore, Warden, White, Williams—19.

The article was then read a third time by its title, passed, and referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the resolution was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH,

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the article entitled "Schedule" was taken from the table, read the first and second time by its title, and taken up for consideration in Convention.

The following sections were then severally read and agreed to, viz:

That no inconvenience may arise from the changes in the constitution of this State, and in order to carry the same into complete operation, it is hereby declared, that

Sec. 1. The common law and the statute laws now in force, not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations, or are altered or repealed by the Legislature.

Sec. 2. All writs, actions, causes of action, prosecutions and rights of individuals and of bodies corporate, and of the State, and all charters of incorporation, shall continue; and all indictments which shall have been found, or which may hereafter be found, for any crime or offence committed before the adoption of this constitution, may be proceeded upon as if no change had taken place. The several courts, except as herein otherwise provided, shall continue with the like powers and jurisdiction, both at law and in equity, as if this constitution had not been adopted, and until the organization of the judicial department under this constitution.

Sec. 3. That all fines, penalties, forfeitures, and escheats accruing to the State of Michigan under the present constitution and laws, shall accrue to the use of the State under this constitution.

Section four was then read, as follows:

"That all recognizances, bonds, obligations and other instruments entered into or executed before the adoption of this constitution, to the people of the State of Michigan, to any State, county or township, or any other public officer or public body, or which may be entered into or executed under existing laws, to any such officer or public body, before the complete organization of the departments of government under this constitution, shall remain binding and valid; and rights and liabilities upon the same shall continue, and may be prosecuted as provided by law. And all crimes and misdemeanors and penal actions, shall be tried, punished and prosecuted, as though no change had taken place, until otherwise provided by law."

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the words "to the people of the State of Michigan," were inserted after the word "laws."

On motion of Mr. CORNELL, the word "other" was struck out of the third line, before the words "public officer."

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the word "any," before "public," in the same line, was stricken out.

Mr. ALVORD moved to strike out the word "any," in the fourth line, before the word "such."

The motion was not agreed to.

The fifth section, as follows, was read and agreed to:

Sec. 5. All officers, civil and military, now holding any office or appointment, shall continue to hold their respective offices, unless removed by competent authority, until superseded under the laws now in force, or under this constitution.

Sec. 6. All county officers, unless removed by competent authority, shall continue to hold their respective offices until the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three. The laws now in force as to the election of township officers, shall continue in force until the Legislature shall, in conformity to the provisions of this constitution, provide for the holding of elections to fill such offices, and prescribe the duties of such officers respectively."

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the words "election of," were stricken from the section, and the words, "election, qualification and duties of," were inserted in lieu thereof.

On motion of Mr. GALE, the word "day" was stricken out in the second line, and "Monday," inserted.

Sec. 7. On the — day of —, A. D. 185 , the terms of office of the judges of the Supreme Court under existing laws, and of the County Courts, and of the clerks of the Supreme Court, shall expire; and on said day the terms of office of the several judges under this constitution shall commence.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the section was amended by the insertion of the words "of the judges," before the words "of the County Courts."

Sec. 8. On the — day of —, A. D. 185 , the jurisdiction of all suits and proceedings then pending in the present Supreme Court, shall become vested in the Supreme Court established by this constitution, and shall be finally adjudicated by the court where the same may be pending. The jurisdiction of all suits and proceedings at law and equity, then pending in the Circuit Courts and County Courts for the several counties, shall become vested in the Circuit Court of the said counties.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, section eight was amended by adding thereto, the words "and of the district court of the upper peninsula."

The following sections were read and agreed to:

Sec. 9. The probate courts, the courts of justices of the peace, and the police court authorized by an act entitled "an act to establish a police court in the city of Detroit," approved April second, one thousand eight hundred and fifty, shall continue to exercise the jurisdiction and powers now conferred upon them respectively, until otherwise provided by law.

Sec. 10. The office of State printer shall be vested in the present incumbent until the expiration of the term for which he was elected under the law then in force; and all the provisions of the said law relating to his duties, rights, privileges and compensation, shall remain unimpaired and inviolate until the expiration of his said term of office.

Sec. 11. In reprinting the statutes of this State, the Legislature shall provide for omitting all acts or parts of acts which have been repealed; but the Legislature shall have no power to authorize any alteration or modification of the laws actually in force, otherwise than is clearly designated in this constitution.

Section twelve was read as follows:

Sec. 12. It shall be the duty of the Legislature, at their first session, to adapt the present laws to the provisions of this constitution, as far as may be.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend the same by preceding it with the following:

"The Governor, after the adoption of this constitution by the people, shall appoint — persons, whose duty it shall be to adapt the present body of statute law of this State to the provisions of this constitution, (but who shall have no power to make any alteration or modification of the laws now in force, otherwise than is clearly designated in or required by this constitution,) and who shall present to the Legislature for their action at its next session their proposed alterations and modifications of said statute law; and,"

Mr. WALKER moved to amend by adding to the foregoing, the words "who shall receive such compensation, not exceeding seventy-five dollars each, as shall be allowed by the Legislature."

The amendment was accepted by Mr. CHURCH.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following substitute for the proposition of Mr. CHURCH:

"The Attorney General of the State is required to prepare and report to the next Legislature, at the commencement of the session, such changes and modifications in existing laws as may be deemed necessary to adapt the same to this constitution, and may be best calculated to carry out its provisions, and who shall receive no additional compensation."

Mr. CHURCH withdrew his amendment.

The amendment of Mr. HANSCOM was agreed to.

Sec. 13. Any country attached to any county for judicial purposes, if not otherwise represented, shall be considered as forming part of such county, so far as regards elections for the purpose of representation in the Legislature.

Mr. MORRISON moved to strike out the word "country," and insert "territory;" which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the same section was amended by striking out at the end thereof the words "in the Legislature."

Sec. 14. This constitution shall be submitted to the people for their adoption or rejection, at the general election to be held on the first Tuesday of November, one thousand eight hundred and fifty; and there shall also be submitted for adoption or rejection, at the same time, the separate resolution in relation to the elective franchise; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, and all other officers required to give or publish any notice in regard to the said general election, to give notice as provided by law in case of an election of Governor, that this constitution has been duly submitted to the electors at said election. Every newspaper within this State, publishing this constitution as submitted, for six successive weeks previous to said election, shall receive as compensation therefor, the sum of fifty dollars, to be paid as the Legislature shall direct.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to amend section 14 by striking out all after "election," in the 6th line.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out, by striking out "six" and inserting "three;" and by striking out "fifty" and inserting "fifteen."

Mr. HANSCOM moved to pass over the section, but the motion was lost.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to amend Mr.

WILLIAMS' amendment, by inserting the words "four" and "twenty," in lieu of of "three" and "fifteen;" which was accepted by the mover; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend the clause by striking out in the 7th line, the words "for six successive weeks previous to said election," and inserting after the word "publishing," the words "in the month of September next."

Mr. LEACH moved the previous question, but the same was not sustained.

Mr. MORRISON modified his amendment by adding, also strike out "fifty," and insert "fifteen."

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the clause by striking out the words "for" and "successive," which was lost.

A division was had on Mr. MORRISON'S proposition, and the first clause of the same was agreed to.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to amend the second branch of the proposition, by inserting "twenty-five," instead of "fifteen."

A division of the question was had, and the question was first taken on striking out "fifty," in the section, and the same prevailed—yeas 48, nays 14.

And the question being on filling the blank,

Mr. EATON proposed inserting "twenty."

Mr. BRITAIN proposed "thirty."

Mr. WHITE proposed "forty."

Mr. RIX ROBINSON moved the previous question on the section; and the same was demanded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being on filling the blank, and the vote being taken on the highest number first, the motion to fill the same with "forty," was lost—yeas 11, nays 49.

The motion to fill the blank with "thirty" was also disagreed to.

Upon filling the same with "twenty-five," the result was—yeas 37, nays 29.

So the blank was filled with "twenty-five."

The question recurring upon striking out the last clause of the section, the same was not agreed to.

Sec. 15. Any person entitled to vote for members of the Legislature by the constitution and laws now in force, shall, at the said election, be entitled to vote for the adoption or rejection of this constitution, and for or against the resolution separately submitted, at the places and in the manner provided by law for the election of members of the Legislature.

Sec. 16. At the said general election, a ballot box shall be kept by the several boards of inspectors thereof, for receiving the votes cast for or against the adoption of this constitution; and on the ballots shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "adoption of the constitution—yes," or "adoption of the constitution—no."

Sec. 17. The canvass of the votes cast, and the returns thereof, shall be made by the proper canvassing officers, in the same manner as now provided by law for the canvass and return of the votes cast at an election for Governor, as near as may be. On the — day of —, or within five days thereafter, the Auditor General, State Treasurer and Secretary of State, shall meet at the Capitol, and proceed, in presence of the Governor, to examine and canvass the returns of the said votes, and proclamation shall forthwith be made by the Governor of the result thereof. If it shall appear that a majority of the votes cast upon the question have thereon "Adoption of the constitution—yes," this constitution shall be the supreme law of the State from and after the — day of —; but if a majority of the votes cast upon the question have thereon "Adoption of the constitution—no," the same shall be null and void.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, section seventeen was amended by inserting after the words "near as may be," as follows: "and the returns thereof shall be directed to the Secretary of State."

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to fill the first blank in the section with "16th day of December next;" and the same prevailed.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the second blank was filled so as to read "1st day of January, 1851."

The article having been gone through with by sections, and being open for general amendment,

Mr. WALKER offered the following to stand as a separate section:

"Resolved, That at the next general election, and at the same time when the votes of the electors shall be taken for the adoption or rejection of the revised constitution, the additional amendment in the words following, to wit:

"The Legislature shall have no power to pass any act to grant any license for the sale of ardent spirits or other intoxicating liquor,"

"Shall be separately submitted to the electors of this State for their adoption or rejection, in form following, to wit: A separate ballot may be given by every person having the right to vote for the revised constitution, to be deposited in a separate box. Upon the ballots given for the adoption of the said separate amendment shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "No license of the sale of spirituous liquors;" and upon all ballots given against the adoption of the said separate amendment, in like manner, the words "License of the sale of spirituous liquors." And on such ballots shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "Constitution: Spirituous liquors," in such manner that such words shall appear on the outer side of such ballot when folded. If, at said election, a majority of all the votes given for and against the said separate amendment shall contain the words "No license of the sale of spirituous liquors," then the said separate amendment, after the — day of — one thousand eight hundred and —, shall be a separate section of article four of the constitution, in full force and effect, anything in the constitution to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. WILLIAMS moved the previous question on the section, and the same being demanded, the main question was ordered to be now put; and the proposition of Mr. WALKER was rejected—yeas 30, nays 34.

Mr. LOVELL moved to strike out section 11 of the article.

Mr. HART moved to adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. LOVELL's motion prevailed.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following to stand as section eleven:

"Reprints of the laws shall only be made after the same shall have been compiled by a person appointed by the Legislature in joint convention, and certified by three persons appointed by the governor, to be a true and accurate compilation, and of all the general laws of Michigan actually in force. No alteration of the legal import of any law shall be permitted in such compilation. No revision of the laws shall ever be made and submitted to the Legislature."

When, on motion of Mr. BUSH, the Convention adjourned.

The roll being called, a quorum of members answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT announced as the committee under the resolution of this morning, Messrs. BEESON, FRALICK and WHITTEMORE.

The consideration of the article entitled "Schedule" was resumed; and the question being on Mr. BRITAIN'S proposition, to stand as section 11,

Mr. BRITAIN withdrew the same, and proposed the following in lieu thereof:

"No general revision of the laws shall hereafter be made. When a reprint thereof becomes necessary, the Legislature, in joint convention, shall appoint a suitable person to collect together such acts and parts of acts as are in force, and without alteration arrange them under appropriate heads and titles. The laws so arranged shall be submitted to — commissioners, appointed by the Governor, for examination; and if certified by them to be a correct compilation of all general laws in force, shall be printed in such manner as shall be provided by law."

Mr. MORRISON moved to strike out "commissioners," and insert "Attorney General."

Which was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the blank before "commissioners" was filled with "two."

But the Legislature shall, at its session in 1851, provide by law for the transfer of said causes that may remain undisposed on the first Monday of — next, to the Supreme or Circuit Court, established by this constitution, or require that the same may be heard and determined by the circuit judges."

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the following, to stand as section five, was adopted:

shall ascertain, determine and certify the results of the election for said officers, under said act, in the same manner, as near as may be, as is now provided by law in regard to the election of Representatives in Congress. And the several judges and officers so ascertained to have been elected, may be qualified and enter upon the duties of their respective offices on the first Monday of January next, or as soon thereafter as practicable."

Mr. MOORE moved the following additional section to the article:

"From and after the year 1855, the Legislature shall provide by law a uniform system for the collection of all taxes throughout the State."

Mr. BRITAIN proposed the following substitute for the foregoing:

"The Legislature shall, on or before 1855, provide that all taxes shall be collected in the respective counties, and that the State tax shall have precedence over every other tax; such law shall protect the interests of the State in all lands liable to the State in consequence of non-payment of taxes."

Mr. McCLELLAND moved the previous question, and the same being demanded, the main question was ordered to be now put.

The substitute of Mr. BRITAIN was not agreed to.

The proposition of Mr. MOORE was rejected—yeas 6, nays 60.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following as an additional section:

"The Legislature shall, on or before 1855, provide that all taxes, except specific taxes, shall be collected in the respective counties, and that the State tax shall have precedence over every other tax. LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

Section 1. The legislative power is vested in a Senate and House of Representatives.

Sec. 2. The Senate shall consist of thirty-two members. Senators shall be elected for two years, and by single districts. Such districts shall be numbered from one to thirty-two inclusive; each of which shall choose one Senator. No county shall be divided in the formation of senate districts, except such county shall be equitably entitled to two or more Senators.

Sec. 3. The House of Representatives shall consist of not less than sixty-four, nor more than one hundred members. Representatives shall be chosen for two years, and by single districts. Each representative district shall contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of white inhabitants, and civilized persons of Indian descent not members of any tribe, and shall consist of convenient and contiguous territory. But no township or city shall be divided in the formation of a representative district. When any township or city shall contain a population which entitles it to more than one Representative, then such township or city shall elect by general ticket the number of Representatives to which it is entitled. Each county hereafter organized, with such territory as may be attached thereto, shall be entitled to a separate Representative when it has attained a population equal to a moiety of the ratio of representation. In every county entitled to more than one Representative, the board of supervisors shall assemble at such time and place as the Legislature shall prescribe, and divide the same into representative districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such county is entitled by law, and shall cause to be filed in the offices of Secretary of State and clerk of such county, a description of such representative districts, specifying the number of each district, and the population thereof, according to the last preceding enumeration.

Sec. 4. inhabitants and civilized persons of Indian descent, not members of any tribe. Each apportionment, and the division into representative districts by any board of supervisors, shall remain unaltered until the return of another enumeration.

Sec. 5. Senators and Representatives shall be citizens of the United States, and qualified electors in the respective counties and districts which they represent. A removal from their respective counties or districts shall be deemed a vacation of their seats.

Sec. 6. No person holding any office under the United States or this State, or any county office, except notaries public, officers of the militia, and officers elected by townships, shall be eligible to or have a seat in either house of the Legislature; and all votes given for any such person shall be void.

Sec. 7. Senators and Representatives shall, in all cases except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest. They shall not be subject to any civil process during the session of the Legislature, or for fifteen days next before the commencement and after the termination of each session; they shall not be questioned in any other place for any speech in either house.

Sec. 8. A majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each house may prescribe.

Sec. 9. Each house shall choose its own officers, determine the rules of its proceedings, and judge of the qualifications, election and returns of its members; and may, with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members elected, expel a member. On such reconsideration, if two-thirds of the members elected agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent with the objections to the other house, by which it shall be reconsidered. If approved by two-thirds of the members elected to that house, it shall become a law. In such case, the vote of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays; and the names of the members voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journals of each house respectively. If any bill be not returned by the Governor within ten days, Sundays excepted, after it has been presented to him, the same shall become a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Legislature, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case it shall not become a law. The Governor may approve, sign, and file in the office of the Secretary of State, within five days after the adjournment of the Legislature, any act passed during the last five days of the session; and the same shall become a law.

All such appointments, and all votes given for any person so elected for any such office or appointment, shall be void. No member of the Legislature shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract with the State, or any county thereof, authorized by any law passed during the time for which he is elected, and for one year thereafter.

or joint resolution shall become a law without the concurrence of a majority of all the members elected to each house. On the final passage of all bills the vote shall be by yeas and nays, and entered on the journal.

Sec. 20. No law shall embrace more than one object, which shall be expressed in its title. No public act shall take effect or be in force until the expiration of ninety days from the end of the session at which the same is passed, unless the Legislature shall otherwise direct, by a two-thirds vote of the members elected to each house.

Section four of the foregoing article having been altered by the committee by adding thereto the words "or attend court as a suitor or witness," the same was concurred in.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD moved to suspend the rule, in order that a motion might be entertained to strike out of the first section, the words "residing in this State on the first day of January, 1850, or;" and the yeas and nays were ordered thereon, and resulted—yeas 17, nays 44.

Two-thirds not voting therefor, the rule was not suspended.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend section one as follows:

Insert after "1850," 4th line, "who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, pursuant to the laws thereof, six months preceding an election." Also strike out all after the word "intention," in line five, and all of line six, and insert the words "as aforesaid."

And the same was agreed to.

The article was then referred to the committee on enrollment.

Mr. MARVIN moved that the vote by which the Convention refused to pass the resolution offered by Mr. WALKER yesterday, in relation to the license question, be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT decided the same not in order.

On motion of Mr. REDFIELD,

Resolved, That when the Convention adjourn, it adjourn to meet at 7 o'clock this evening.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, section three was amended by striking out all after the word "appointment," and inserting "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, if in session."

The article was then referred to the committee on enrollment.

Sec. 2. No organized county shall ever be reduced by the organization of new counties to less than sixteen townships, as surveyed by the United States, unless, in pursuance of law, a majority of the electors residing in each county to be affected thereby shall so decide. The Legislature may organize any city into a separate county, when it has attained a population of twenty thousand inhabitants, without reference to geographical extent, when a majority of the electors of a county in which such city may be situated, voting thereon, shall be in favor of a separate organization.

Sec. 3. In each organized county there shall be a Sheriff, a County Clerk, a County Treasurer, a Register of Deeds and a Prosecuting Attorney, chosen by the electors thereof, once in two years, and as often as vacancies shall happen, whose duties and powers shall be prescribed by law. Sec. 4. The county clerk, county treasurer, judge of probate and register of deeds, shall hold their offices at the county seat.

Sec. 5. The sheriff shall hold no other office, and shall be incapable of holding the office of sheriff longer than four in any period of six years. He may be required by law to renew his security from time to time, and in default of giving such security, his office shall be deemed vacant. The county shall never be responsible for his acts.

Sec. 6. A board of supervisors, consisting of one from each organized township, shall be established in each county, with such powers as shall be prescribed by law.

Sec. 7. Cities shall have such representation in the board of supervisors of the counties in which they are situated, as the Legislature may direct.

Sec. 8. No county seat once established shall be removed until the place to which it is proposed to be removed shall be designated by two-thirds of the board of supervisors of the county, and a majority of the electors voting thereon shall have voted in favor of the proposed location, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Sec. 9. The board of supervisors of any county may borrow or raise by tax one thousand dollars, for constructing or repairing public buildings, highways or bridges; but no greater sum shall be borrowed or raised by tax for such purpose in any one year, unless authorized by a majority of the electors of such county voting thereon.

Sec. 10. The board of supervisors, or in the county of Wayne, the board of county auditors, shall have the exclusive power to prescribe and fix the compensation for all services rendered for, and to adjust all claims against, their respective counties; and the sum so fixed or defined shall be subject to no appeal.

Sec. 11. The board of supervisors of each organized county may provide for laying out highways, for construction of bridges, and for organizing of townships, under such restrictions and limitations as shall be prescribed by law.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the title was changed to "counties."

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, section 11 was amended by striking out the word "for" before "organizing," and "of" after the same word.

Sec. 2. Each organized township shall be a body corporate, with such powers and immunities as shall be prescribed by law. All suits and proceedings by or against a township, shall be in the name thereof.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to suspend the rule, in order that a motion might be entertained to amend section 1, by inserting in line 2 the words "one commissioner of highways."

The yeas and nays were had on the motion to suspend the rule, and the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Asahel Brown, Burns, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Crouse, Desnoyers, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Prevost, Robertson, E. Two-thirds voting therefor, the rule was suspended.

The question being upon inserting as proposed by Mr. J. BARTOW,

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to amend the same by inserting, "the justice of the peace whose term of office will first expire in each town, shall be commissioner of highways;" which was lost.

Mr. J. BARTOW's amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. GREEN moved to suspend the rule in order that the following might be added to the article:

"The word 'town,' instead of 'township,' may be used in all cases where it refers to a corporate body, or to territory within the jurisdiction of such corporate body."

But the Convention refused to suspend the rule.

The article was then referred to the committee on enrollment.

Sec. 2. Every impeachment shall be tried by the Senate. When the Governor or Lieutenant Governor is tried, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court shall preside. When an impeachment is directed, the Senate shall take an oath or affirmation truly and impartially to try and determine the same according to the evidence. No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members elected. Judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend further than removal from office; but the party convicted shall be liable to punishment according to law.

Sec. 3. When an impeachment is directed, the House of Representatives shall elect from their own body three members, whose duty it shall be to prosecute such impeachment. No impeachment shall be tried until the final adjournment of the Legislature, when the Senate shall proceed to try such impeachment.

Sec. 5. The Governor may make a provisional appointment to fill a vacancy occasioned by the suspension of an officer until he shall be acquitted, or until the election and qualification of a successor.

Sec. 6. For reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for the impeachment of a judge, the Governor shall remove him on a concurrent resolution of two-thirds of the members elected to each house of the Legislature; but the cause for which such removal is required, shall be stated at length in such resolution.

Sec. 7. The Legislature shall provide by law for the removal of any officer elected by a county, township or school district, in such manner and for such cause as to them shall seem just and proper.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, section 3 was amended by striking out at the end of the same, the words "such impeachment," and inserting "the same."

And the Legislature may appropriate the twenty-two sections of salt spring lands now unappropriated, or the money arising from the sale of the same, where such lands have been already sold, and any land which may hereafter be granted or appropriated for the support of such school, and may make the same a branch of the University, for instruction in agriculture and the natural sciences connected therewith, and place the same under the supervision of the regents of the University.

Sec. 12. The Legislature shall also provide for the establishment of at least one library in each township; and all fines assessed and collected in the several counties and townships for any breach of the penal laws, shall be exclusively applied to the support of such libraries.

by any resident of the State, not exceeding in value fifteen hundred dollars, shall be exempt from forced sale on execution, or any other final process from a court, for any debt contracted after the adoption of this constitution. On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the Convention adjourned.

Evening Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT, and a quorum being present,

Mr. HART, from a majority of the committee appointed to divide the State into judicial districts, submitted the following report:

1st district—Monroe, Lenawee and Hillsdale.

2d—Branch, St. Joseph, Cass and Berrien.

3d—Wayne.

4th—Washtenaw, Jackson and Ingham.

5th—Calhoun, Kalamazoo, Allegan, Barry and Van Buren.

6th—St. Clair, Macomb and Oakland.

7th—Lapeer, Genesee, Saginaw, Shiawassee and Livingston.

8th—Eaton, Kent, Ottawa, Ionia, Clinton and Montcalm.

Mr. HANSCOM, from the same committee, submitted a minority report, as follows:

The minority of the committee appointed under the resolution to prepare and report upon the subject of a division of the State into judicial circuits, report and recommend that the districts be composed as follows:

1st district—Wayne and Washtenaw.

2d—Monroe, Lenawee and Hillsdale.

3d—Branch, St. Joseph, Cass and Berrien.

4th—Jackson, Calhoun, Kalamazoo and Van Buren.

5th—Oakland, Macomb and St. Clair.

6th—Livingston, Ingham, Eaton, Barry and Allegan.

7th—Lapeer, Genesee, Shiawassee, Saginaw, Tuscola and Sanilac.

8th—Ionia, Kent, Ottawa, Newaygo, Clinton and Montcalm.

The following is the number of terms that would be required to be held in the different circuits under the above arrangement of circuits, as is now believed from the best estimate of the population of the respective counties: 1st circuit, 8 terms; 2nd, 12; 3d, 14; 4th, 14; 5th, 12; 6th, 14; 7th, 16; 8th, 16.

The undersigned respectfully suggests to the Convention, that among the reasons that induced the placing of Wayne and Washtenaw together, and constituting them a circuit, instead of making the county of Wayne a circuit of itself, the following had much weight, and they ask for them the consideration of the Convention.

By the provisions already incorporated into the constitution which we have framed, Wayne county (or the city of Detroit, in which a large majority of the judicial business of that county originates,) can be relieved by the Legislature, by the organization of municipal courts. Just as much of the duties imposed upon the circuits can be imposed upon such courts as the exigencies of business may require. This exception, though general in the constitution, as applied to cities, has really no practical operation, except in the county of Wayne.

Another reason is the contiguity of the places of holding the courts in the respective counties. One or two hour's ride, at a nominal cost, takes the judge from Detroit to Ann Arbor, and vice versa. Not so as applied to the judges who hold the northern or western circuits. They have to travel hundreds of miles of bad roads, at all seasons of the year, at great labor and expense, as well as serious loss of time.

Another fact is submitted that should have its influence upon this question. Under the proposed division of the majority of the committee, only four terms are to be held by the judge of that circuit; while in some of the others terms to the number of sixteen will be required, and that, too, by judges residing in districts where all the expenses, trouble, and labor of traversing the circuit is far greatest.

But one other reason is respectfully urged. It is unjust to the other portions of the State to withdraw from the judicial force of the State the sole labors of one of the judges, where neither population nor the business that will be imposed upon this Circuit Court, warrants it. There is, in fact, now in existence in the county of Wayne a local tribunal that relieves the Circuit and County Courts of a large mass of business.

Such are some of the reasons that influence the undersigned to dissent from the report of the majority, and induce the submission of the proposition just read.

A. H. HANSCOM.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the two reports were laid upon the table, and so much of the same as contained the apportionment, ordered printed.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the article "Exemptions."

Mr. FRALICK moved to suspend the rule in order to move the indefinite postponement of the article.

The yeas and nays were had, and the Convention refused to suspend the rule—yeas 20, nays 43.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to strike out the word "articles" and insert "property."

Mr. NEWBERRY wished to know whether this was the article passed by the Convention. If it was not substantially the one passed by the Convention, what right had the Convention to consider it, without a suspension of the rules?

The CHAIR stated that wherever there was an alteration from the original article, it should be so stated by the committee.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I suppose the committee pursued their own course. If there is any difference of opinion, the Convention may choose their own course.

The PRESIDENT stated his views: If any important alterations had been made, they ought to be so reported, and the rules suspended before the Convention could act upon them.

Mr. McCLELLAND did not think it the duty of the presiding officer to interpose his opinion on the matter.

The CHAIR—My views differ.

Mr. McCLELLAND said the report had been accepted, and it was not the business of the chair to dictate to the Convention the course it should pursue on the report.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—There is only one word added in the first section. After the word "property," they have added the word "only."

The motion of Mr. McCLELLAND prevailed.

Mr. SKINNER moved to suspend the rule in order to move to strike out the word "resident," in section 1, and insert "householder;" which did not prevail—yeas 22, nays 49.

Section 1 was then concurred in.

Section 2 being under consideration,

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend the same by striking out "a homestead of not more than," and inserting "every homestead not exceeding."

Mr. CHURCH hoped the chair would state what substantial alterations had been made by the committee.

Mr. McCLELLAND said the committee had amended it in conformity with the intention of the Convention in passing the article. The great difficulty consisted in this: whether the forty acres exempted, could be mortgaged or not; it said "forced sale." They believed they were carrying out the original intention in adding "for agricultural purposes."

Mr. CHURCH—I object to the insertion of those words.

The CHAIR—The first question is on striking out, and inserting "every homestead not exceeding."

Mr. GALE—We seem to be concurring with amendments which it was not the intention of the Convention to pass. There is a radical alteration from what I voted for. I voted for exemption of a homestead of not less than forty acres, and now the proposition is to insert not more than forty acres. I object to the motion without a suspension of the rules.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I have seen a great many reports made in my life, and I understand this to be the parliamentary course: if a committee report, and a member believes they have made a report not in accordance with their instructions, or that they have transcended their powers, the member rises in his place and objects to the reception of the report; but when the report has been accepted, no man can object. It is for the body to receive or object, and not for a member to object to any report after it has been accepted. Such has been my observation of parliamentary proceedings.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, as one of the committee, he would make a statement in reference to the words "not more," or "not less." Every man knew it was the vote of the Convention to exempt the homestead of the man, whether it consisted of five, ten, or forty acres. As it reads, "not more than forty acres," it leaves the inference that the Legislature may make it apply to ten or twenty acres. We wished to prevent legislative interference; and in that the committee have not exceeded their powers, but carried out the intention of the Convention.

Mr. GALE—If the committee were appointed to draft a bill, it might be correct; but was that the intention? A few days since some one offered instructions to this committee, to amend the second section; what then said the gentleman from Monroe? He said the committee had no authority to make any alteration essentially, and argued that they could not do so under instructions. If he were right then, is he not wrong now, in effecting a radical change?

Mr. DANFORTH called Mr. GALE to order.

The report was received and the committee discharged.

The amendment offered by Mr. McCLELLAND was agreed to.

The committee having amended section 2 by inserting in the first line, "for agricultural purposes,"

Mr. ORR rose to explain, in regard to this amendment, in order that he might not be entirely misunderstood by the Convention or the various writers that scribble for the press. He would take this occasion to say that he was in favor of the exemption. The people of the county of Barry, whom I represent, (said Mr. O.,) are in favor of exemptions and the rights of married women. On the final passage of the article, previous to its commitment to the committee on phraseology, I voted against it, because I did not think it the best article that could be got up. It contained some provisions I did not approve of, and I voted against it in the hope that it would not pass before it was perfected. As it is reported back by the committee on phraseology, I think it is improved; yet my former vote places me in a false position with my constituents. I was not satisfied with it before, because it gave not only forty acres, but even five thousand or more; it was quite indefinite.

Again, there was no mode of selling it when mortgaged. It could not be foreclosed by law, as it was exempt from all final process. The committee have remedied that. There is one provision I am not in favor of: that this homestead shall be used for agricultural purposes. I think that is unjust. I hope to have the unanimous vote of the Convention in striking that out.

Mr. CHURCH said he could not concur in the change, or in the addition of the words "for agricultural purposes," unless some further amendments were made.

Mr. McCLELLAND said, as to the addition of the words "for agricultural purposes," it was taken from the Wisconsin law. He would again remark that the committee had not only made the amendments in accordance with what they considered to be the intention of the Convention, but he was authorized to say that at least twenty members of the Convention had been to the committee to induce them to make this amendment.

Mr. CHURCH said nothing would induce him to make a factious opposition to any proposition which had passed the Convention. This affects the inhabitants of new counties. Not one-third of them can sustain an exemption on forty acres and say it is used for agricultural purposes. They could not sustain it before a judge who would give a strict construction to the language. A person may have forty acres with only a small part of it actually in use for agricultural purposes, though he may intend so to use it. A man might have forty acres which he had not improved; he might be working out at day's wages, and his land be wrenched from him, while another man would retain his, which was waving with crops. Let us stand all alike—those whose lands are covered with the native forest and those covered with wheat.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Suppose I have forty acres—ten acres in wheat and the rest unimproved land. I ask if the whole does not come in for agricultural purposes? He [Mr. McC.] believed it did.

Mr. REDFIELD moved to insert after the word "used," the words "or designed."

Mr. N. PIERCE—I hope the friends of the measure will stand by the article. I was for going with them to exempt all the property of the State. This is the only article that could be settled down on. I think it is better not so broad. I would rather have it definite than leave it to guess work. If gentlemen will go to exempt all the property in the State, I will go with them as far as they could wish. I do not think the committee have exceeded their powers. The gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] could swallow the judicial article, but he cannot this. I do not think it is so great a change as in the judicial article, or so injurious to the people. Since I first saw the change in the article on the judiciary, I do not blame them for this. It operates nicely. The operations of the Convention have been turned into the hands of the committee, and I hope they will sustain the committee. The gentleman from Kent gained on the judiciary, and he can afford to lose on this. I am satisfied.

Mr. NEWBERRY—I object to concurring without a suspension of the rules.

Mr. EDMUNDS—This bill seems to hurt somebody in every part of the State, especially as it is reported by the committee. The gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] said it would hurt some of his constituents if carried; and it will be hard on some of mine, and the constituents of every member on this floor. Around villages some hundreds of persons live on parcels of land, some on three or five acres. They are not in the village plat, and the land is not used for agricultural purposes; but they need exemption as much as other men.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I think the gentleman is wrong in his conclusions. If they go out of the village to get land, it is for agricultural purposes. In answer to the gentleman from Oakland, I do not consider this a departure from, but effecting the object of the Convention. Did they intend me to occupy forty acres and put a flouring-mill on it of the value of twenty thousand dollars? To say land is not agricultural because it has not been plowed, seems preposterous. If grass or trees grow on it, it is agricultural. If not, for what other purpose is it used? A judge would never stultify himself by saying that land, though laying waste, was not agricultural; the worst he could say would be that it was misused. It saves the exemption from being abused, and that is what the Convention want. I feel great reluctance to get up here and explain; but there are none other of the committee here but the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] and myself. The rest are sick. He is the head and I am the tail—that is all that is left of the committee.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said the amendment of the gentleman from Cass would meet the object.

Mr. EDMUNDS contended that it would not meet the case. There were hundreds of those small plats around villages, with a house and barn only, which were not used for agricultural purposes.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—They are included.

Mr. HART—If it is carried it will ruin more than half of my constituents.

Mr. CHURCH was willing to accept the amendment, with the amendment of the gentleman from Cass, so that a person possessing forty acres of land shall not have his rights brought into dispute.

Mr. WALKER said he was not present when the committee reported, or when the discussion commenced; but it seemed to him to be necessary that there should be inserted after the words "city or village," the words "not exceeding $1,500." Without such limitation, a person residing in the neighborhood of a village might hold thousands of dollars under this exemption.

Mr. REDFIELD's amendment was agreed to.

The question was taken on concurring in the amendment made by the committee, and was nonconcurred in—yeas 33, nays 36.

Mr. WALKER moved to suspend the rule in order to move the insertion in section 2, after "villages," where it first occurs, the words "not exceeding in value fifteen hundred dollars;" but the Convention refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to suspend the rule, that he might be enabled to move to insert in section 2, after the word "State," in line 5, the words "said village lot or lots;" but the Convention refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to strike from section 3, all after "survive," in last line; which was done by unanimous consent.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, section 3 was amended by striking out "where any children shall survive," and inserting "during the minority of his children."

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to suspend the rule, in order to amend section 5 by inserting in the last line, after "devised," the words "or bequeathed;" which was agreed to, and the amendment made.

The article was then referred to the committee on enrollment.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, the word "inferior" was stricken from line 2 of section 1.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to suspend the rule, in order to strike out section 12; but the Convention refused to suspend the rule. The article was referred to the committee on enrollment.

The amendments made by the committee were concurred in, and the article was referred to the committee on enrollment.

Every newspaper within this State publishing in the month of September next, this constitution as submitted, shall receive as compensation therefor, the sum of twenty-five dollars, to be paid as the Legislature shall direct.

Sec. 17. Any person entitled to vote for members of the Legislature, by the constitution and laws now in force, shall, at the said election, be entitled to vote for the adoption or rejection of this constitution, and for or against the resolution separately submitted, at the places and in the manner provided by law for the election of members of the Legislature.

And in case of the adoption of this constitution, said officers shall immediately, or as soon thereafter as practicable, proceed to open the statements of votes returned from the several counties for judges of the Supreme Court and State officers, under the act entitled "an act to amend the revised statutes and to provide for the election of certain officers by the people, in pursuance to an amendment of the constitution," approved February sixteenth, one thousand eight hundred and fifty," and shall ascertain, determine and certify the results of the election for said officers under said acts, in the same manner, as near as may be, as is now provided by law in regard to the election of Representatives in Congress. Each county having a ratio of representation and a fraction over, equal to a moiety of said ratio, shall be entitled to two representatives, and so on above that number, giving one additional member for each additional ratio.

Sec. 23. The cases pending and undisposed of in the late court of chancery, at the time of the adoption of this constitution,

Sec. 28. The terms of office of all State and county officers, of the circuit judges, members of the board of education, and members of the Legislature, shall begin on the first day of January next succeeding their election.

RESOLUTION.

Sec. 29. At the next general election, and at the same time when the votes of the electors shall be taken for the adoption or rejection of this constitution, an additional amendment to section one of article seven, in the words following:

"Every colored male inhabitant possessing the qualifications required by the first section of the second article of the constitution, shall have the rights and privileges of an elector,"

Shall be separately submitted to the electors of this State for their adoption or rejection, in form following, to wit: A separate ballot may be given by every person having the right to vote for the revised constitution, to be deposited in a separate box. Upon the ballots given for the adoption of the said separate amendment shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "Equal suffrage to colored persons? Yes;" and upon all ballots given against the adoption of the said separate amendment, in like manner, the words "Equal suffrage to colored persons? No." And on such ballots shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "Constitution: Suffrage," in such manner that such words shall appear on the outer side of such ballot when folded. If, at said election, a majority of all the votes given for and against the said separate amendment shall contain the words "Equal suffrage to colored persons? Yes;" then there shall be inserted in the first section of the article, between the words "tribe" and "shall," these words: "and every colored male inhabitant," anything in the constitution to the contrary notwithstanding."

The amendments were severally concurred in.

The article was ordered to a third reading, and so read, when

Mr. CHAPEL moved to lay the same on the table and order it printed; but the motion was lost.

And the article was then passed.

On motion of Mr. GARDINER, the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, (57th day,) August 15.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. HART,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Convention draw a certificate in favor of Ezra Willis, for the sum of three dollars, for services as door keeper for the first day of the session, and for cleaning and putting the Hall in order after the adjournment of the Convention.

On motion of Mr. HASCALL,

Resolved, That the State Printer deposit with the Secretary of State, the journals, reports and documents to which each member is entitled, put up in separate parcels, and marked with the name of the member and officer entitled to each, subject to his order.

The PRESIDENT called Mr. WILLIAMS to the chair.

Mr. GARDINER offered the following:

Resolved, That 2,400 copies of the constitution, as adopted by this Convention, be printed in pamphlet form, to be distributed, one to each of the newspapers of the State, and the remainder equally amongst the members of this Convention.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I would ask what is the object, when we have provided for its publication in every paper in the State? They will be useless lumber in our offices. It would be a considerable item of expense, without any benefit.

Mr. CHAPEL hoped it would not be adopted.

Mr. McCLELLAND suggested the propriety of sending one copy to each proprietor of a newspaper in the State.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH hoped the resolution would be adopted. Many persons do not take newspapers. It would be of use as matter of reference hereafter.

Mr. GARDINER—We learn from various quarters of the State that they are forestalling public opinion, and it is necessary to get it before the people in pamphlet form. It is ordered to be printed in newspapers, in September; we want to get it into the hands of the people before that time.

The resolution was adopted—yeas 30, nays 29.

Mr. ALVORD offered the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of this Convention, and the Reporters appointed under resolution of June 3d, and the Door-keeper, be and they are hereby allowed the same mileage as is allowed to the members of this Convention.

Mr. WOODMAN moved to insert "and messengers;" which was lost.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN the resolution was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CHURCH offered the following:

Resolved, That the sum of twenty-five dollars be and is hereby allowed to Edwin R. Merrifield, for extra services as Door-keeper and Sergeant-at-arms pro tempore to this Convention, and that a certificate be drawn for the same, in the usual manner.

Mr. FRALICK moved to indefinitely postpone the same; and the yeas and nays being had thereon, the motion to indefinitely postpone was lost—yeas 31, nays 31.

And on the adoption of the resolution the yeas and nays were had, and resulted—yeas 33, nays 35.

So the resolution was not adopted.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS,

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be unanimously tendered to the Hon. DANIEL GOODWIN, President of the Convention, for the able and impartial manner in which he has discharged the duties of presiding officer of this body.

Mr. LOVELL offered the following:

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be presented to JOHN SWEGLES, Jr., H. S. ROBERTS, and CHARLES HASCALL, for the faithfulness and ability with which they have discharged their duties as Secretaries.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. HART, the majority report of the select committee upon dividing the State into judicial districts, was taken from the table.

Mr. J. BARTOW offered the following, based upon the report, to stand as a separate section of the schedule:

"The State, exclusive of the upper peninsula, shall be divided into eight judicial circuits, and the counties of Monroe, Lenawee and Hillsdale shall constitute the first circuit; the counties of Branch, St. Joseph, Cass and Berrien, shall constitute the second circuit; the county of Wayne shall constitute the third circuit; the counties of Washtenaw, Jackson and Ingham shall constitute the fourth circuit; the counties of Calhoun, Kalamazoo, Allegan, Barry and Van Buren, shall constitute the fifth circuit; the counties of St. Clair, Macomb and Oakland shall constitute the sixth circuit; the counties of Lapeer, Genesee, Saginaw, Shiawassee, Livingston, Tuscola and Midland shall constitute the seventh circuit; and the counties of Eaton, Kent, Ottawa, Ionia, Clinton and Montcalm shall constitute the eighth circuit."

Mr. J. BARTOW hoped it would meet with the approval of a large majority of the Convention. It was a delicate duty to perform; but it was the duty of the Convention to fix the districts. He was clearly of the opinion that this division would meet the approbation of the Convention; if not, he had no hope that it could be satisfactorily done by the Legislature.

Mr. BUSH moved to substitute for the foregoing the minority report of the committee.

Mr. MORRISON moved the indefinite postponement of the whole subject; which was lost.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following substitute for the one proposed by Mr. BUSH:

"The State is hereby divided into eight judicial circuits, to wit:

The first circuit shall consist of the counties of Monroe, Lenawee and Hillsdale; the second circuit shall consist of the counties of Branch, St. Joseph, Cass and Berrien; the third circuit shall consist of the counties of Wayne and Washtenaw; the fourth circuit shall consist of the counties of Jackson, Calhoun, Kalamazoo, Van Buren and Allegan; the fifth circuit shall consist of the counties of Kent, Ottawa, Ionia, Barry and Montcalm; the sixth circuit shall consist of the counties of Eaton, Clinton, Shiawassee, Ingham and Livingston; the seventh circuit shall consist of the counties of Oakland, Genesee and Saginaw; the eighth circuit shall consist of the counties of Macomb, St. Clair, Lapeer and Sanilac."

Mr. KINGSLEY—I see in the last proposition that Wayne and Washtenaw are placed in one district. To that I should have no objection, if the public convenience would be subserved. Wayne has the business of three counties. If Wayne and Washtenaw were put together, the business could not be done. He [Mr. K.] did not want the system to be defeated in the outset.

Mr. WALKER said Wayne and Washtenaw together would have more business than any other district. But the time spent in traveling from county to county in the other districts, would be avoided in this district. This difference of time spent in traveling would allow the judge more time to devote to the duties of the bench without calling for so great exertion, as in the other districts.

Mr. GOODWIN—I cannot suppose the Convention will adopt a system of districts with Wayne and Washtenaw together. The remarks of the gentleman from Washtenaw are correct. When the County Courts and the Chancery Court are abolished, there will be enough business to occupy a judge in the county of Wayne alone.

Mr. BUSH was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER.] A large portion of the State was new, and the roads bad. Regard should be paid to the convenience of getting round the country. Looking to the different sections of the State, and the convenience of the judges, he considered the amendment of Mr. WALKER the best.

The yeas and nays being had on the adoption of Mr. WALKER's proposition, the same was rejected—yeas 21, nays 46.

Mr. J. BARTOW modified his proposition by adding the county of Sanilac to the sixth district.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD moved to amend the proposition of Mr. BUSH, by striking from the apportionment for the fourth district the county of Van Buren, and attaching the same to the third district.

But the amendment did not prevail.

And on the adoption of the minority report proposed by Mr. BUSH, as a substitute for Mr. J. BARTOW's proposition, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the result was yeas 28, nays 41.

So the substitute was not adopted.

The question recurring on the adoption of Mr. J. BARTOW's proposition,

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend the same by transferring in the apportionment for the fifth and eighth districts, the counties of Barry and Eaton; so that the county of Barry should be placed in the eighth district, and the county of Eaton in the fifth.

And the amendment was accepted by Mr. J. BARTOW.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved the following as an addition to the proposition under consideration:

"Sec. —. Any citizen of this State shall be eligible to the office of circuit judge in any judicial circuit, without reference to his residence at the time of his election."

Mr. EATON moved the previous question, and the same being seconded, the the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. ROBERTSON's amendment was then disagreed to.

And the question being on the adoption of Mr. J. BARTOW's proposition, the same was agreed to as an additional section to the schedule.

On motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH,

Resolved, That the thanks of the Convention be tendered to EDWIN R. MERRIFIELD, for the efficient and courteous manner in which he has discharged his duties as door-keeper during the session.

The PRESIDENT took the chair.

Mr. GARDINER called up his resolution of yesterday, relative to the supervision and printing of the reports.

Mr. WALKER moved to strike out "C. J. Fox," and insert "JOSEPH COATES."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved the previous question, and the same being seconded, the main question was ordered to be now put.

The amendment of Mr. WALKER was disagreed to; yeas 27, nays 34.

And the question being on the adoption of the resolution proposed by Mr. GARDINER, the same was agreed to; yeas 44, nays 21.

Mr. GARDINER, from the committee on printing, to whom was referred the resolution of yesterday, directing them to inquire into the expediency of ordering the old and new constitutions printed in the Dutch, German and French languages, reported the same back, and that in their opinion it would be inexpedient.

The report was accepted and adopted.

Mr. WOODMAN offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee soliciting subscriptions to pay the clergy for services performed in this Convention, are hereby required to report, as soon as convenient, the amount of funds received and the manner in which the same have been disposed of.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the resolution was indefinitely postponed.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL, the committee alluded to in the foregoing resolution were allowed liberty to report.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE reported verbally, that the sum of $132 had been raised and disbursed to the officiating clergymen.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH,

Resolved, That the members of this Convention now absent, be requested and are hereby authorized to affix their signatures to the constitution adopted by this Convention and enrolled by its order, whenever it may be convenient for them so to do.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved that when this constitution shall be enrolled, it shall be signed by the members by counties, as the same shall be called; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN,

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention are hereby tendered to the messengers, for the faithful discharge of their duties.

On motion of Mr. BEESON,

Resolved, That the Governor be and he is hereby requested to draw his warrant upon the contingent fund for $550 62, in favor of the post master of Lansing, in full for the postage of this Convention.

On motion of Mr. GARDINER,

Resolved, That WILLIAM COATES, JOSEPH COATES and MARTIN MAHON, be allowed their per diem allowance as reporters of the Convention, for eight days after the adjournment of the same, to complete their reports and prepare them for the press.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM,

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be tendered to the various reporters for the efficient, accurate and prompt manner in which they have performed their duties.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN,

Resolved, That the Secretary of this Convention be instructed to draw his certificate in favor of JOSEPH COATES, WILLIAM COATES, and MARTIN MAHON, for the amounts due them respectively, for eight days' services, authorized in the resolution this morning adopted.

The President submitted a report of the Secretary of the Convention, in pursuance of a resolution, adopted on the 14th instant; which was read.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM,

Resolved, That this Convention recommend to the next Legislature that proper compensation be paid by the State to the proprietors of the various Newspaper Press, who have regularly furnished the members of this Convention with their papers.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN,

Resolved, That the State Printer be requested to complete the publication of the daily journals, and forward the same to the members respectively by mail, with as little delay as practicable.

Mr. BEESON, from the select committee upon enrollment, reported the constitution and schedule as correctly enrolled, and submitted the same to the Convention.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, a call of the Convention was had, and Messrs. J. BARTOW, BUTTERFIELD, BUSH, CARR, KINGSLEY, LOVELL, NEWBERRY, ORR, N. PIERCE and RIX ROBINSON, were found absent without leave.

On motion of Mr. WHITTEMORE, the Sergeant-at-Arms was dispatched for the absentees, who soon thereafter appearing,

On motion of Mr. LEACH, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. McCLELLAND then moved the adoption of the constitution; and the yeas and nays being had thereon, the motion prevailed as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bush, Carr, Hanscom, Hart, McLeod, Newberry, Roberts, Storey, White, Whittemore, President—11.

Mr. BUSH presented the following:

The undersigned, members of this Convention, solemnly protest against the adoption of the proposed constitution; for that

1st. Having full confidence in the integrity of the people, and in their ability to successfully maintain a representative government, they believe that all abuses can and will be corrected by an enlightened public opinion through the ballot box.

2d. That our State being new, and consequently but partially developed, they believe that the detail of the constitution which has been carried out in its every article, even to the one on township government, is not adapted to its changing condition and rapid growth and improvement.

3d. That distrust in the intelligence of the people, stamped upon every article of the Constitution, is, in their opinion, a stigma upon their character, not justified by the history of the State.

There being no further business before the Convention, at the suggestion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the Rev. Mr. Tooker closed the deliberations of the body with prayer.

Mr. DESNOYERS moved that the Convention adjourn sine die; which motion prevailed.

The PRESIDENT then addressed the Convention as follows:

Gentlemen of the Convention:

The expression of your approbation of the manner in which I have discharged my duties as your presiding officer, contained in the resolution adopted this morning, has awakened in my bosom emotions of high gratification. I thank you for it, and shall ever recur to it with pleasure. The task of framing the institutions by which the rights, interests and liberties of a people are to be guarded and secured, is at any time important; especially is it so at a period like the present, when the spirit of free inquiry is bringing to the test of observation, of experience and of close scrutiny, the principles which lie at the foundation of civil government, and State after State is revising and reconstructing its fundamental law. At such a period it was to be expected that diversities of opinion would exist, and that the variety and moment of topics arising for consideration, would lead to extended discussion and earnest debate. It cannot be otherwise than a source of gratification that in the midst of these, and the labors to which you have devoted yourselves with so much zeal and fidelity, there have so uniformly prevailed that dignity and urbanity which would ever be expected from a body of intelligent citizens convened for such high purposes.

I feel under great obligations to you, gentlemen, for the kindness and courtesy so generally extended to me throughout your arduous session. For them I tender to you my sincere thanks; and as we are about to part, allow me, in conclusion, to express to you each and all, my earnest wishes for your welfare and prosperity.

I now pronounce this Convention adjourned without day.

APPENDIX.

REMARKS of Mr. GOODWIN, relative to the Senatorial District System, in Convention, Thursday afternoon, July 11th, 1850:

Mr. GOODWIN—I beg the indulgence of the Convention while I assign my reasons for the vote I shall give on the proposition under consideration. The proposition is, in substance, to provide for the election of Senators in single Senatorial districts; not in districts where one shall be elected at each election in the district. The article originally reported contemplated that at the first election two Senators should be elected in each district, and that subsequently to the first election, there should be one in each district elected; but the amendment is to elect but one in a district at each alternate election. This does not meet my views. The article reported by the committee on the legislative department, as to that branch of the Legislature, appears to me preferable.

Let us look at the object of having two distinct branches of the legislative department, and in conjunction with another department of the government. The men of our revolution, the men by whom our government was originally formed, who were deeply versed in the principles of government, regarded two branches in the legislative department of vast importance in preventing hasty and inconsiderate legislation. That was not all. The veto power, in most of the States, was vested in the executive department, and that was considered a conservative power; so that before a law could have force and effect, it should receive the assent of the popular branch; then the assent of another branch, representing larger districts, elected for a longer term, and not so subject to hasty or inconsiderate action from local or sectional causes; then, finally, the approval of the Executive, who might, by his veto, prevent the adoption of a proposed law, until it should receive the sanction of a larger number of each house; and if this was not obtained, until the people had an opportunity to consider it at another election. That is the theory of our government, as instituted in the States of this Union. Is it not proper that we should preserve this feature as a check to hasty legislation? The committee who reported this article have said so. The committee of the whole have said so, and reported the article back. This Convention have thought it expedient that we should have two branches, and to retain a Senate.

It has been deemed proper that Senators should represent a larger district, and be chosen for a longer time than members of the other branch; and that they should go out, not all at the same time, but in sections, so that some members may be retained who have experience. What is the substance of the proposed change? By limiting the districts and diminishing the territory which the Senator represents, and by the further design which has been indicated, of shortening the time for which he shall be elected, to a single session, you take away most of the distinctive qualities of the Senate, which were designed to, and do, give value to the objects for which it was constituted. It appears to me, sir, if you adopt the proposed change, you may almost as well abolish the Senate entirely. That will be nearly the effect. This, however, would be a radical change in the government, which has not been contemplated by the community. I, therefore, (said Mr. G.) approved the article in this respect, as reported by the committee. It best preserves the great objects for which the two branches were designed. I would continue the Senate as a great component part of the legislative power. By the change, you would almost entirely fritter it away.

It is proposed, and the measure has received the sanction of the committee, that Representatives shall be elected in single districts. This commends itself to public approbation, and is in accordance with public sentiment. This renders it the more important that the characteristic properties of the Senate should be preserved. By electing in single districts, you localize your Representative, and make him, the agent of a small fraction of a county. When you elect a Senator from a larger district, you withdraw him from sectional objects and feelings, and consequently render your Senate more free from local prejudices and sectional influences, and better prepared to look to the general interests of the whole people of the State. By electing two in a district, they will go out alternately, and one be elected by the people of the district at each election for members. This will be most beneficial and safest for the interests of the people.

It has been said that public opinion calls for the change proposed. If (said Mr. G.) I were satisfied of that—that public opinion in my county was in favor of it, I should so cast my vote; but I do not come to that conclusion, or think that such is the case. Perhaps it may be in the neighborhood of my honorable colleague, [Mr. FRALICK.] True, in one of the Detroit papers, an article appeared to the effect stated by the gentleman; and he has made the remark that, if any candidate was opposed to it, he should have expressed his dissent. I do not believe that a candidate is bound to say yea or nay to an article appearing in a party paper. The views it suggests are thrown out for the people to discuss. These matters have been the subject of some conversation in the county of Wayne, but I think no particular public sentiment has been formed upon it, though the statement of Mr. FRALICK may be correct, if limited to that part of the county in which he resides. As he has supposed that we were under instructions, I will state a fact which I think will satisfy him, as well as others, on this point. In the convention by which our names were placed before the people as candidates, resolutions of instruction were proposed; and among others, one in favor of biennial sessions and single districts. It was urged by those opposed to instructions, that the candidates had been nominated, and that it would be proper to allow them to act, under all the circumstances, as they thought best. These resolutions were laid on the table. That, I consider a much better expression as to public opinion than a newspaper article, whether written by an editor or a correspondent; although the editor might insert a hand with a finger pointed to it.

Mr. COOK—It was an editorial article.

Mr. GOODWIN—That makes no difference. If I believed the masses in the county I represent, wished it, I would carry out their views; but I believe there is no distinct expression in the county on this point. I believe it is the wish of the majority of that county to keep two distinct branches of the Legislature, with their distinctive features; therefore, I shall go against the amendment, and in favor of the report of the committee on the legislative department.

REMARKS of Mr. ROBERTS, on the proposition of Mr. CHURCH, (p. 749,) relative to specific taxes, in Convention, Saturday Afternoon, Aug. 3, 1850, p. 755.

Mr. ROBERTS—Mr. President: A motion having been made to except the specific taxes received from the mining companies of the upper peninsula from the proposed appropriation of the specific State taxes generally, and from various remarks made by members during the morning session, I am forced to the conclusion that the time has arrived when I am called upon, as the immediate representative of the interests of the mining region, to give a full statement of the position in which that section of our State has been placed by the faulty action of the general government, and by careless legislation in this Capitol.

I have listened, sir, with painful emotions, whilst in committee of the whole, to aspersions cast upon the upper peninsula, by gentlemen who have no acquaintance with or knowledge of the country, its advantages, wants or requirements—who have never visited that region, and know nothing of the state of its affairs; and in order to furnish the Convention with facts of a reliable character, and with positive information, I shall have reference to notes collected and intended for a report from the committee, of which I have the honor to be chairman—a report which would have been made, probably, on Monday next, and which has only been deferred in deference to the several committees on other articles occupying the attention of this Convention, and to enable the committee to so execute their task as to conform to the general frame-work for the constitutional platform of the lower peninsula. I had hoped that the committee on the "Governmental and Judicial Policy of the Upper Peninsula" would have been thus indulged, both to save time and to avoid antagonistical positions; but, sir, circumstances have over-ruled me, and I must perform my duty.

I shall have to beg for more time than the ten minutes allowed by the rule, and in asking that time extended, I would call the attention of the Convention to the fact that I have seldom interfered with their labors, or interrupted their progress.

The rule being suspended, on motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, Mr. ROBERTS proceeded:

Sir, in 1844, the Secretary of War granted to individuals permits to locate tracts of land in the mineral region on the Southern shore of Lake Superior, of three miles square, for a period of three years, subject to renewals; the lessees or permittees to pay to the Government six per cent. on all mineral raised during the first term, and ten per centum after renewal of leases. The demand for permits becoming numerous, it was thought proper in a short time to stop the issue for three miles square, and substitute one mile square. Under this arrangement more permits were granted than there were lands to be covered; and contentions arising, Congress interfered and passed the act of March 1, 1847, entitled "An act to establish a land office in the northern part of Michigan, and to provide for the sale of mineral lands in the State of Michigan."

By this act the charge of these lands was transferred to the Treasury Department, a geological survey ordered, and full directions given to bring the mineral lands into market, the lessees or permittees to be protected by giving them the privilege to purchase at $2,50 per acre, if they should take the whole they had located, or $5 the acre for not less than a quarter section; and $5 to be paid by all entering after the lands had been duly placed in market. Accordingly, in 1848, a portion of these lands were placed in market by the customary proclamation, but under the adverse circumstances of a doubtful survey, and at a time when those who were in occupancy questioned the propriety of taking them up at those prices, even if they possessed the means to do so, the Government having failed to fulfill the promise of its agents in building a ship canal around Saut Ste Marie, and in every other respect. Some three or four did, however, accede to the terms, whilst others, whose leases had not yet expired, held over, and many abandoned their locations. These latter were succeeded in many instances by more wealthy capitalists; and new explorations developing richer veins of mineral, many substantial companies were established, additional capital called in to the aid of the old ones, and the labor of mining was renewed with a vigor which has continued without abatement until the present time; although they have had to and are still contending against the most discouraging and oppressive embarrassments, arising from the neglect of the general government, and partially from a want of proper legislation and action on the part of our State Government.

At the session of our Legislature, 1848, twenty-one charters were granted to these companies, viz: to the Copper Falls, North Western, Pittsburgh and Boston, Lake Superior Fishing and Mining, Lac la Belle, Bohemian, Albion, Douglass Houghton, Eagle Harbor, Medora, Ontonagon, North American, Quincy, New York and Michigan, New England, Algonquin, Michigan, National, Lake Superior, Jackson, Mackinac, and Lake Superior Mining Companies. These charters were considered liberal, except in respect to the payment of one per centum into the State Treasury on the entire amount of their real estate, the capital stock paid in, and upon all sums of money borrowed by them, as well as any portion of the nett profits invested in the business of the company, which tax was "to be in lieu of all other taxes upon the personal property of the companies, and in lieu of all other State taxes on their real estate." The charters were liberal, inasmuch as they did not restrict them in the quantity of land they might hold, and thus enforce them by limiting their localities to pay the United States the double rate, and because they did not compel them to pay in a greater amount perhaps than their works would require, by a given period. Illiberal, in putting them upon a par with banks and railroads in their exactions, for that because it was desirable to possess chartered privileges, to invite capital from abroad in aid of digging copper and iron out of the mineral bearing rocks of Lake Superior, when compelled to pay ten per centum of whatever they raised to the United States, or double or quadruple per acre for their bleak and apparently barren possessions, more than their fellow citizens of the lower peninsula for the fertile soil from which they dig their potatoes and gather their rich harvests; and for that it would deprive them of healthy county and township government, in as much as they left little or nothing to enforce a tax upon for such purposes, and in so doing visited an act of injustice upon the few for the benefit of the many. But, these charters of 1848 possessed the virtue of uniformity. No one company could complain of being deprived of advantages that its neighbor possessed.

At the session of the Legislature, 1849, nine more of these companies were chartered, viz: the Ohio Trap Rock, Minesota, North West, Siskowiet, Isle Royal, Native Copper, Phoenix, Union, and Pittsburgh and Isle Royal Mining Companies. Six of these are, in all things material, in uniformity with those chartered in 1848; but in the charter of the Ohio Trap Rock, when we come to the regulation of the one per centum to be paid into the State Treasury, we find it to read, "which tax shall be in lieu of ALL taxes on the PERSONAL and REAL estate of said company." Next, on examining the charter of the Minesota, we read, "and said tax shall be in lieu of all other STATE taxes on the PERSONAL property of said company, and in lieu of all other STATE taxes on the REAL estate of said company." The first of these two charters was approved on the 5th of March, and the latter on the 7th of March. I should here have thought it but reasonable to infer that the discrepancy was caused by clerical error, but from the fact that on reaching the remaining company unaccounted for, the Native Copper Company, approved March 31, I find it reads, "which tax shall be in lieu of the STATE tax upon the PERSONAL and REAL estate of said company." Thus it would seem that the Ohio Trap Rock is to be relieved from all other taxes whatever, whilst the Minesota and the Native Copper, although paying the same per centage, are only to be relieved from further State taxes.

Next, sir, are the charters granted at the session of our Legislature, 1850. This year there were eighteen companies chartered—the Forest, Piscataqua, Swamscot, Copper Harbor, Cleveland Iron, Eureka, Detroit and Lake Superior, Hungarian, Adventure, Iron City, Carp River Iron, Merchants, Chesapeake, Cape, Aztec, Ripley, Ridge and Peninsula Mining Companies. The three first are measurably on the plan of the twenty-one of 1848; and the six of the nine of 1849, except that in lieu of the one per centum to be paid into the State Treasury, one-half per centum is substituted, saying "said tax to be in lieu of all other State tax upon the real estate and personal property of said company: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be so construed as to release real estate and personal property from taxation for county and township purposes." In the remaining fifteen are several important changes. The section regulating the corporate succession, the capital stock, and allowing the companies to hold such real and personal estate as their business may require, to an amount not exceeding the capital stock, has added to it, "but said company shall not hold more than six hundred and forty acres of land in legal subdivisions in the upper peninsula, except a ware-house, lot and office, and such as may be necessary for smelting purposes." The amount fixed upon to be paid into the State Treasury is one per centum, and "said tax shall be in lieu of all State taxes upon the real and personal property of said company."

From "An act authorizing the State Treasurer to refund certain moneys to the treasurers of the counties of Houghton, Schoolcraft, Marquette and Ontonagon," approved April 2, 1850, the same time of the approval of the mining bills, in which it is enacted "that the State Treasurer be, and he is hereby authorized to refund and pay over unto the treasurer of the county of Houghton, one-half of all moneys collected in the counties of Houghton, Schoolcraft, Marquette and Ontonagon, in pursuance and by virtue of any act of incorporation creating any mining company in any and each of said counties," it may be inferred that the Legislature, in the passage of the first three named acts of 1850, intended to equalize the taxation by dividing between the State and the Counties equally, the per centage heretofore and hereafter to be received from companies exempt from taxation on their personal property; and that, by some misunderstanding between the two houses, or changed policy, the fifteen acts appear in the shape they do. The truth is, that it was the original intention of both houses to exact in the new charters but one-half per centum for the State, leaving them open to county and township taxes—thus refunding the one-half paid in by the companies at one per cent, and placing them upon an equality. But, sir, the wisdom or the vanity, the zeal or the cupidity of the chairman of the committee on incorporations in the Senate—a Senator ignorant of the ground he was treading—on the eve of the adjournment, was the true cause of the confused state of these acts—of depressing the privileges of one set of men, whilst elevating those of another, in direct hostility to the constitution. On the three bills emanating from the Senate, he could favor one-half per cent, and on the fifteen coming from the House, he would exact the whole.

It appears, sir, in the session laws of 1848, that by the provisions of "An act to organize four counties in the Upper Peninsula, and define the boundaries of the same," the counties of Marquette, Houghton, Schoolcraft and Ontonagon, were united and set off into a judicial district, the powers in which were to be held and exercised by a district judge, with the jurisdiction of a circuit court in the several organized counties in this State, as well in criminal proceedings as in civil cases and in equity. By the records in the office of the Secretary of State, an election took place under this act, on the first Tuesday of July, 1848, at which a district judge and other officers were chosen, and the organization of this judicial district perfected. A prosecuting attorney and notaries public were appointed by the Governor. Courts have been held as designated by the act; grand juries summoned; petit juries empannelled, and several convictions had in criminal cases. Yet it is a fact that no provision has been made to pay this district judge, the prosecuting attorney, sheriff, clerk and other officers of the court, nor the grand and petit jurors; that the district is as yet destitute of a court house, and furnished only with a temporary jail; that although each township has its supervisor, assessors, and other township officers, and the board of supervisors hold their meetings, the difficulties which present themselves in the history of the mining charters, are an almost insurmountable obstacle to the levying of an equitable tax. So both township and county expenses must be made up by commutation amongst individuals, or be accumulating as a debt.

Now, sir, the mining companies constitute the great bulk of the inhabitants, and are the owners of the property which should have been taxable for county, township and highway purposes. But comparatively few of them have as yet the title to their location from the general government, and of course have no real estate to be taxed. They pay their one per centum on their capital into the State Treasury, and their personal property is excused from further taxation by their charters. The majority of the stockholders who may live in the Eastern States, far removed from the scene of action, subscribe for their stock or invest their money with the understanding that the amount of their tax is fixed and unalterable. Each mining company is a community—a village—separate and independent of its neighbors. The few farmers, and the mechanics, were chants, hotel keepers and others, who live at the landings, and are separated from these companies, are but few in numbers. It would be manifestly unjust to make these pay for all the crime and poverty and misfortune inseparable from great communities, or to expect them to build the roads and bridges necessary for the accommodation of the masses. Instance, there are probably at the Boston and Pittsburgh mines, at least four hundred souls; and at the North American, more than two hundred. These companies, with the Albion, worked and inhabited by less numbers, are all within the township of Houghton, of which the mouth of the Eagle river is the landing, or the point at which they ship their copper and receive their supplies. Should the entire expense for township purposes fall upon the taxable inhabitants at the landing place? Certainly not. Upon the companies? They pay their one per centum and cut their own roads. It is enough. The Pittsburgh and Boston company alone, as appears by the books of the State Treasurer, pays in annually upwards of $1,250. If taxed, as their charter permits, for county and township purposes, on their real estate, it would be but upon a mere trifle of the $125,000 on which they are paying this one per centum. Upon the same principle, it may be asked whether the inhabitants of the few landing places, a few farmers, and the agricultural township of L'Ance, should pay the taxes of the mining townships of Copper Harbor, Eagle Harbor, Houghton, Portage, Algonquin and Isle Royal, composing the county of Houghton; or that the township of Ontonagon, which contains no mines, should pay the expenses of the townships of Minesota and Pe-wa-be, in the county of Ontonagon, where there are more than a dozen companies in active operation, and probably not an inhabitant disconnected with them!

"The principles which have authorized and sanctioned numerous grants to the States, for turnpikes, canals and railroads, through, or leading to, the public domain, designed to promote the sales of government lands, to facilitate the settlement of a new country, to develop new resources of public wealth, and to open new fields for enterprising labor," never appear to have been applied to this section of our country. The General Government, though repeatedly appealed to for appropriations to build a ship canal around the Falls of the Saut Ste Marie, and for Harbors and other public works on Lake Superior, appears to have paid little attention to their wants and requirements, more than to obtain exorbitant prices for their mineral lands. And although the United States have realized nineteen millions of dollars in the sales of lands in this State, over and above all expenses, and have upwards of twenty-four millions of acres still unsold and unappropriated, they have never rendered service to the upper peninsula by donations; and the little the State has at any time received from the General Government, has been appropriated for improvements in the lower peninsula.

I have alluded, sir, to the action of both the General Government and to that of the State of Michigan. My object is to show you that the first has done little or nothing except to oppress and speculate upon this section of our country. She oppressed us in 1837, when this State made an appropriation and commenced cutting a ship canal across the Portage at the Saut Ste Marie, by driving the contractors from the work, at the point of the bayonet. And from that day to this, though annually importuned, she has refused or neglected, either to build this work, grant an appropriation in lands for it, or to allow us the right of way. Not but there has been liberal legislation on the part of the U. S. Senate, nor that there has been anything wanting on the part of our Representatives in Congress. At each successive session for the last ten years, I believe, the Senate have passed a bill making appropriations for the building of the proposed canal, which has as often failed in the House of Representatives. Failed, firstly, perhaps, because of the paramount importance of the North-Eastern boundary question. Secondly, to make way for the final adjustment of a scheme to collect the public revenue and regulate the deposits. Thirdly, a new tariff system. Fourthly, the settlement of the Oregon question, followed by the outbreak of the Mexican war. Fifthly, the Wilmet Proviso, and so on, ad infinitum.

The General Government, by creating false issues, and making professions, she never intended to fulfill, has deceived and trifled with her citizens. For what should have induced the rush for permits and locations in the mineral region but—in addition to the discovery of mineral wealth, Fort Wilkins being built at an enormous expense, now abandoned as useless, and going to ruins—the appointment of agents, geologists and surveyors, and promises of the speedy accomplishment of the canal, the creation of harbors, the clearing of others, the erection of piers and lights, and the establishment of roads—in brief, the opening of avenues of ingress and egress? More, these enterprising men were not only permitted to, but encouraged, in 1844 and '45, in running out and marking their own boundaries, some for tracts of three miles square, and others for one mile square, as I have before stated. The lands were not then in market—they were not even surveyed—but yet the Secretary of War, Mr. Marcy, was issuing permits without law or precedent to sustain him, and giving tone to the promises made by the officers of government under his authority. No sum was named for which these lands were to be sold, and what other could the holders of permits dream of than the minimum price? The act of Congress of March, 1847, however, with its extravagant demands, and without the fulfillment of a solitary pledge, dissipated any such hope; and when, in 1848, after a bungling attempt at a geological survey, without any satisfactory report, some of these lands were placed in market, it found a vast majority of the energetic frames of men who had toiled, and hoped, and struggled against all privations and hardships for the four or five preceding years, had begun to give way—found them broken in purse and crushed in spirit, by delays and false allurements, and compelled to abandon the field of their enterprise—to surrender the fruits of their explorations, and their valuable discoveries, to the more fortunate and wealthy. Where to them, now, was their Ste Marie's canal? Where the clearing of their fine natural harbors, the erection of piers, the establishment of lights? Where their appropriation for roads, or for even a bridle path? Echo, from yonder mountain cliffs of mineral bearing rock, answers, where? The shrieking winds, bowling over the great inland ocean, at their base, catch up that echo and ring over that wild wilderness of waters, where? where?

Government deceived herself—deceived her citizens—turned jockey and speculator; and she has sold in all of that immensely rich domain of 20,000 square miles, and of more than 9,000,000 of acres, about 30,000 acres, and received as rents about the same number of thousands of dollars. So much for becoming a great mining proprietor, with tenants working on shares, and deceptive promises; and then, sick of her speculation, offering to sell out at double and quadruple the minimum rates. Yes, to sell that which ten years ago she pronounced so worthless that it would not pay the survey, for five dollars, instead of ten shillings, the acre.

And now, Mr. President, let me ask what has the State of Michigan done to foster, protect and advance her own interests? Sir, if she has not been equally patronizing to this iron right arm of hers, with the giant frame and massive copper heart, it has been no fault of hers. She has hampered us by her legislation. She, with her grand coadjutor, the General Government, has deprived us of the possession of property for taxation, and then denounced us as unworthy because of not paying a certain quota of tax into the State Treasury. She has instructed us how to organize our counties, establish our courts of justice, and place ourselves upon the civil calendar of counties of the lower peninsula, and then, in the same breath, stripped us of all means, except those of commutation amongst our individual selves, to carry out her provisions. She has made laws which it was beyond the mortal strength of man to obey, and then breathed the curse of censure upon us as pure, as honorable, as capable, and as high-minded a community as the Union can boast, for a failure in their final accomplishment. She well knew that she did not own an acre of land in the mining region, save primary school lands, and that that region of country was not indebted to her to the amount of one solitary dime. She knew that the only owners of property were the General Government and incorporated companies.

And, in chartering these latter, has she not, to get that one per centum—not the six or ten per centum the United States have got and are still demanding from those who have not purchased their lands—has she not, I say, excepted all personal property from any further taxation, whatever, and all other taxation for State purposes, on real estate? How could her legislators suppose we were going to pay the expense of the district court they ordered established for the four upper counties, and which has been in existence the last two years? Did they make any arrangement for the payment of that judge, prosecuting attorney, sheriff, clerk, grand and petit jurors, or for a court house and jail? None! What provisions did they make for roads and bridges, or for the support of the poor? None!

And yet, sir, this Convention is on the point of appropriating this one per centum annually paid into the State treasury, to "pay the interest upon the primary school, university and other educational funds, and the interest and principal of the State debt!" Yes, sir, when you have sold, up to this year, 125,976 78-100 acres of primary school lands, for $715,486 57, and annually distributed the interest thereof in the lower peninsula, without our having received one cent of it—when you have sold, up to the same time, 20,683 34-100 acres of university lands for $243,679 08, and appropriated the interest without our deriving the benefit of a farthing—when you have had expended in money by the general government, for roads and other improvements in the lower peninsula, $645,724 13, whilst we have had nothing; and when you have taken all the internal improvement lands, and distributed them amongst the counties of the lower peninsula, without allowing us an acre. And let us see how and for what purposes:

Aye, Mr. President, after having received the benefit of all the expenditures and appropriations made by the General Government, having involved the State in debt, the lower peninsula calls upon us, in our infancy, to contribute—no, would force us to pay tribute to relieve her from an indebtedness we have had no hand in creating. Demand of us, after tying us hand and foot by legal enactments, to surrender our claim to any portion of the specific taxes we are paying into the Treasury. Sir, highway robbery would be preferable to this legalized plundering of your fellow-citizens. Let me appeal, sir, to that sense of justice which distinguishes members of this honorable Convention. Let me conjure them to pause and reflect before they put it out of the power of the Legislature to render us some little restitution for the wrongs we have received at their hands. Let us have at least one-half of this one per centum for county and township purposes. Do not understand us as asking alms or craving that which is not morally and justly our own. We stand upon this floor to demand the rights of our constituency, and no sickening show of sympathy, nor artificial display of generosity will be received in exchange for them.

The hardy pioneers of the upper peninsula, who have encountered and overthrown obstacle after obstacle, and broken down barrier after barrier, are your brothers—your sons; they, too, are of the lower peninsula. They are delving deep through the rocky beds of mother earth, disemboweling and upheaving her mineral wealth, to enrich you, to aggrandize our State, and to contribute to the wealth and the reputation of our glorious Union. We eat of your bread, but we pay you for it by the sweat of our brows; and all we ask is, that you extend to us the hand with the same warmth of friendship and encouragement we extend ours to those who come amongst us—that you will except us from this wholesale appropriation; and when the time comes, that you will aid in placing us on the same footing, as near as may be, with the counties of the lower peninsula. Do these things—do us justice—and with renewed energies you will find us standing firmly, side by side with you, on the platform of equality; but, refusing us, we will respectfully petition you to aid us with the general government, in being set off as an independent territory.
